K-State's crops-judging team repeated its first-place finish at the national level for the second year in a row.

Team members Ryan Reiff, junior in agronomy; Rodney Doane, junior in agronomy; and John Kern, senior in agricultural education, won the Chicago Collegiate Crops Contest on Nov. 22. Chad Neill, junior in animal sciences and industry, participated as an alternate.

Members also participated in the Kansas City Board of Trade Collegiate Crops Contest on Nov. 18, taking second place. With five first-place rankings, K-State has placed either first or second in the two national contests since 1993.

With last year's team winning both national competitions and having individuals place in the top three in each competition, members had a large expectation to fill in the fall 1997 season.

"You couldn't ask for any more," said Gerry Posler, agronomy department head and the team's coach. "They came through and did great."

Posler, who hadn't coached the team in eight years, stepped in when the previous coach left. With the help of Kris Young, a team member from last year, the two prepared the team for this season.

The competition consisted of three categories — grain grading, seed analysis, and plant and seed identification.

Team members were tested on their ability to grade grain quality, determine contamination in seed samples of common crops and recognize the plants and seeds of more than 200 kinds of crops and weeds.

Each event had a 90-minute time limit.

Kern said he learned a lot from the experience and plans on teaching students about crop judging as an agricultural education teacher.

"With last year's team winning both competitions, we had big shoes to fill and had to keep the reputation," Kern said.

At the competition in Chicago, Kern was the first high individual, and the third high individual in Kansas City. Reiff was second high individual at Chicago, only 2.2 points behind Kern. He also placed fourth in Kansas City. Doane placed fourth in Chicago.

Members started getting ready for contests last spring. This fall, they practiced every Saturday morning, spending an average of 15 hours a week total, Neill said.

"When we first started, it took us two and a half hours for each event. As we got better and started learning, it got easier and faster," Neill said.

Reiff was an alternate on last year's team. He said it took a lot of work to do as well as they did, but all team members learned a lot.

A LIFE REMEMBERED
JASON CHRISTIENSEN

FAMILY, FRIENDS AND PROFESSORS of Jason Christiensen hold hands and pray at a memorial Thursday night in Danforth Chapel. Christiensen, junior in kinesiology, died Nov. 19 after a battle with primary pulmonary hypertension.

Friends, family gather to celebrate life of K-State student

"It may be hard to live with this disease, but I've seen people with worse. I feel as if in some strange way, I'm lucky."

– Jason Christiensen, writing in his journal seven months ago.

His friends said he lived life to the fullest. His journal attested to his strong Christian faith.

The memory of Jason Christiensen was honored Thursday in Danforth Chapel by family, friends and faculty from the Department of Kinesiology.

Christiensen, junior in kinesiology, died Nov. 19 after a battle with primary pulmonary hypertension.

The altar was adorned with posters filled with photographs of Christiensen with family and friends. His letter from high school sparkled with his achievements in wrestling, basketball and track.

Jayne Thompson, Lutheran Campus minister, read the 23rd Psalm along with passages from Christiensen's journal.

In May he wrote, "It may be hard to live with this disease, but I've seen people with worse. I feel as if in some strange way, I'm lucky." Christiensen wrote he felt as though God had chosen him to have this rare disease.

Friends went one by one to the altar to share their thoughts with the congregation.

"Are we really that unlucky?" Eric Fenton, Christiensen's roommate, asked. "We lost a good friend, but we also had that time with him."

Fenton said he still catches himself referring to Christiensen in the present tense.

"I think it's a good thing," he said. "Just because Jason's gone doesn't mean we should shut the book on him."

Joann Sharp, senior in pre-medicine, said she felt a connection with Christiensen. Sharp has a respiratory condition with some symptoms similar to what Christiensen's were.

"He gave me so much strength," Sharp said. "He'll always be my best friend."

She said he taught her to appreciate the people around her.

"He gave me peace," she said.

Club honors 27 for work as advisers

Chosen for their service to the university, dedication to the teaching profession, and leadership provided in the classroom and extracurricular activities, 27 K-State faculty members and advisers were recognized by Mortar Board at a reception Oct. 20.

Robert Reeves, professor of nutritional science, said advisers provide an academic home base for students.

He said it is a great opportunity for students to have direct and ongoing contact with the faculty. K-State has a high priority for advising of students, and it is important for students to realize this, he said.

He said his biggest responsibility is to be interested in students personally and academically and to help students recognize how the academic program will translate in their later life.

"Advisers are accountable to students and their families to present opportunities to achieve in the best possible fashion while at K-State," Reeves said.

Dale Herspring, professor and head of the political science department, said advising is a two-way street. First, a student has to be concerned enough to ask for help. When that happens, advisers must have the time.

An adviser is responsible for having a knowledgeable background and listening to the needs, desires and interest of the students who are being advised, said Jenice French, assistant professor of elementary education.

"Advisers can't make the decisions for students," she said. "We have to give them the options that are available to them and try to be a resource, but the decision is ultimately theirs."

"It is important to recognize students as the reason the university exists. We must put their interests first," Reeves said.

Honored faculty and advisers are Reeves; French; Herspring; Carol Peak, director of the KSU Community Service Program; Ann Stahleim-Smith, associate professor of biology; Carla Jones, associate dean of student life; Fred Smith, instruc-

Fort Riley to gain 200 new soldiers

AMY BICKEL

Fort Riley will become the home for a new U.S. Army division of active and national guard troops.

The National Guard Bureau has urged the development of two new Active Component/Army National Guard integrated divisions, according to Terry Prosch, Forces Command spokesman. Fort Riley will be one of two division headquarters established in the United States. The second will be in Fort Carson, Colo.

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., recommended Fort Riley for the new division. Fort Riley lost a third of its troops in 1995 base closings.

"What this will mean for Fort Riley is an addition of approximately 200 more active soldiers," Prosch said. "Fort Riley was chosen because it had office space that wasn't being utilized that would support people."

The troops will be led by a major general and will have a forward unit of 15 to 20 troops at Fort Jackson, S.C.

The enhanced separate brigades chosen as part of the first division at Fort Riley are the 30th Mechanized Infantry Brigade of North Carolina, the 218th Mechanized Infantry Brigade of South Carolina and the 48th Mechanized Infantry Brigade of Georgia.

Gov. Bill Graves said the new division will play a vital role in the defense of the nation.

"I am pleased and not at all surprised that our military leaders recognize its importance," Graves said in a news release.

Prosch said the division will be established during fiscal year 1999.

Student Senate approves resolution supporting Anderson expansion

Student Senate on Thursday approved 29-17-3 a resolution supporting the city of Manhattan's plans to expand Anderson Avenue.

After more than four hours of speakers and debate from both sides of the issue, Senate endorsed the project that city officials say will add lanes to the street south of the K-State campus and coordinate traffic signals to improve traffic flow and safety.

Construction, which could begin by spring 1999, would also make significant changes to the area's storm drainage system.

Expansion-area residents attended the meeting and spoke against the project during open period, citing concerns such as pedestrian and bicyclist safety, tree loss and the aesthetic effects of the project.

Gary Conrad, a biology professor who lives in the affected neighborhood, said pedestrian safety should be a higher priority in the plans. Faster moving traffic from lights that coordinate according to vehicle traffic make crossing the street more dangerous, he said.

"There is no other strip of concrete that is crossed by more pedestrians per day. Rather than view it as an expressway, we would encourage you to view it as a pedestrian-way," Conrad said.

"The avenue right next to the university is a very important place to not put an expressway. That would be a totally inappropriate place to put one," he said.

City Engineer Jack Messer also spoke at the meeting and said despite some community concerns, the project is a positive one.

"We wouldn't be doing something if we didn't think in our professional opinion that it was improving the safety. Anderson Avenue is the highest-used street in Manhattan. From a pedestrian and vehicle standpoint, that's very important to note," he said.

Debating the resolution, Engineering Sen. Jason Ross refuted the opposition's safety concerns, saying students should know how to cross the street with traffic signals to avoid injury.

"Roads are for cars. There's a certain kind of elegant logic to that. That's why we make roads," Ross said. "You have crosswalks. You have stoplights. The cars will stop. What more do you want?

"You want to try to run across Anderson? That's your problem, but I feel real sorry for the EMT who's going to have to pick you up."

Expansion opponents also focused on environmental concerns during their presentations. The loss of green space along the Anderson corridor and the destruction of more than 180 mature trees — many more than 1 yard in diameter — is a high price to pay for progress, they said.

Faculty Representative to Senate Bill Muir, also a member of the project's steering committee, told senators they shouldn't make tree conservation more important than drivers' safety. The addition of left-turn lanes and signals will help reduce the number of accidents that

Female Colorado students attacked in incidents that might be related

BOULDER, Colo. — A female student was assaulted on the University of Colorado campus by a man officials say might have attacked another student last month.

Last month a woman was grabbed by an attacker but was able to break free and escape unhurt. In Tuesday's assault, the 22-year-old victim was beaten over the head and then told to run.

Police say the suspect's aggression might grow more violent if he's not stopped.

"I definitely think that if these two incidents are related, he is escalating in the violence," Brett Brough, spokesman for the university police department, said.

The female student said the attack occurred as she walked north toward the CU Student Recreation Center.

The victim told police she saw the suspect walking behind her as she approached the Dal Ward Center, so she stopped to let him pass.

The man stopped to ask her for directions to a store and she offered to walk with him. As they walked on the north side of the CU football field near Boulder Creek, the suspect turned on the victim and hit her on the back of the head with a hard object.

She fell to the ground and screamed while the man struck her several more times. He suddenly let her go and told her to run, Brough said. She ran and called the police.

Wolf Creek production returns to full power slowly after outage

BURLINGTON, Kan. — The Wolf Creek nuclear power plant is gradually being brought back to full power production after its ninth refueling and maintenance outage, plant officials said Wednesday.

Power production resumed on Monday, and at that time was expected to reach full power by Wednesday. However, instrument calibration took longer than expected, and according to a report issued Wednesday afternoon, the plant was operating at 59 percent of capacity.

It said the output would increase slowly, at no more than 3 percent per hour, until reaching full power, expected Thursday.

The power increases will be halted temporarily during the process so tests can be performed.

Toddler fatally shot by 7-year-old

ALTOONA, Pa. — A 7-year-old boy found a key to his parents' locked gun cabinet, pulled out the only loaded rifle and accidentally shot his playmate to death, authorities said.

Karissa Miller, 2, died instantly when the rifle's sole bullet struck her in the abdomen Tuesday night.

"It piqued his interest, and I'm sure he was playing with the gun," said District Attorney William Haberstroh. "It was a play toy to him. It was a fascination to him."

The boy's family was temporarily baby-sitting for Karissa. She and the boy had gone off to play when he spotted a key jutting over the edge of the 6-foot gun cabinet, authorities said.

The boy climbed on to an ottoman, grabbed the key, unlocked the cabinet and pulled out a rifle from among several guns inside. All but the rifle were unloaded, and the rifle had not been used in up to eight years.

The boy's family used the weapons for hunting, Haberstroh said, and no charges were planned against them.

Former Missouri House speaker gets 4 years for bribery in office

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Former Missouri House Speaker Bob Griffin, who pleaded guilty to charges he accepted $5,000 from a lobbyist while in office, was sentenced Thursday to four years in prison.

Before his sentence, the 62-year-old Griffin stood and told the judge in a halting voice: "I did a stupid act. ... I should never have taken that money."

Griffin pleaded guilty in August to federal bribery and mail fraud charges for illegally accepting $5,000 from Cathryn Simmons in 1992.

That money came from Simmons' fee from a business group that hired her — on Griffin's recommendation — to organize the lobbying for legislative passage of an increase in the state's gasoline tax.

Simmons was to be sentenced later this month. Griffin served a record 15 years as speaker before resigning in 1996 as his legal troubles grew.

AUCTIONEERS JONAS STEWART, left, freshman in political science, and Sarah Bailey, sophomore in speech, celebrate the sale of second floor Moore Hall Resident Assistant Mary Cart, sophomore in elementary special education, Thursday night in the lobby of Moore. Cart was auctioned off to take the highest bidder shopping for at least half an hour in Manhattan or Topeka.

Residents raise money for Regional AIDS Project

JULIE LINDAMOOD

Moore Hall residents dug deep into their pockets Thursday night for something other than gifts for the holidays. They raised more than $200 for the Regional AIDS Project by auctioning off their resident assistants.

Hall Governing Board service learning chairwoman Cyndi Mackey, junior in marketing, and Moore social chairwoman Lisa Slagle, junior in accounting, organized Moore Hall AIDS Awareness Week and the RA auction. Mackey said they decided to do the week to help raise awareness about AIDS during World AIDS Month.

"We thought we'd bring World AIDS Month down to our level," Mackey said.

Residents kicked off the awareness week with the RA auction. Mackey said the RAs chose tasks to Commission established to examine health care options for GTAs, GRAs

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

Graduate research and teaching assistants might have a chance to make a change in their health care insurance services.

The Department of Administration for the State of Kansas and the Health Care Commission have a directive to look into how Kansas Board of Regents universities would fund a health care plan that could be created for GRAs and GTAs.

"We are working with two possible options," said Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene Health Center. "One would establish a student component of the current state health insurance plan in which all university and state employees who want to participate in currently do."

If the first plan is selected, any GRAs or GTAs in Kansas attending a regents school would then obligate their university to fund their participation in the plan.

"If they wanted to have their spouse or family covered, they would have to pay extra just like I do," Zweimiller said.

The second option being entertained would place the GRAs and GTAs in the current university-endorsed plan.

Zweimiller said each university has a student health insurance endorsed plan.

"It's either the first component plan, or use the local student health insurance plan," he said.

"I would like to see them implement the local student health insurance plan, because if you use the other, you take the plan and move it to a state bureaucracy. The state bureaucracy then decides what plan is best for the student," Zweimiller said.

Representatives from the health care commission are visiting each health center in the regents system and taking a look to see what is available at each site in terms of student health care services.

"They want to acquaint themselves here at the local level," Zweimiller said.

Zweimiller said health care representatives are meeting next week with a member from the health care commission to discuss the issue, but no decision has been made as of yet.

"They haven't decided what the coverage should be for GRAs and GTAs," Zweimiller said. "They aren't even that far along."

Operation Santa gives toys to needy children

LAURA POPE

Needy children will benefit this holiday season from donations of toys and money to Fort Riley's Operation Santa through Dec. 18.

Toy donations will be wrapped by volunteers and sorted according to age groups. Pick-up and delivery times for the toys will be scheduled for needy families in Fort Riley and the surrounding area for the holidays.

"It's called Operation Santa because in the Army we do different operations," Cpl. James Pritchett, public affairs officer, said. "They used to have a workshop here where they repaired old and broken toys. Someone called it Santa's Workshop once because they were doing work like Santa would have, and the name just stuck."

Volunteers of units, groups and organizations or individuals are needed to wrap presents. A group of 15-20 volunteers is the core of the effort, he said. The soldiers collect, purchase, wrap and deliver the gifts.

Wrapping hours are scheduled from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. at Santa's Workshop in Building 812 on Marshall Field in Fort Riley. Anyone who is interested can call the Operation Santa Hotline at (785) 239-6431.

"Many, many volunteers are needed in all areas," Pritchett said. "It's really a communitywide effort."

Operation Santa began eight years ago and is sponsored by the Directorate of Community Activities and the Noncommissioned Officers Association. The program begins around the first part of November with the planning phase, Pritchett said.

Needy families are identified through the chaplains' office, Operation Helping Hand program, a food certificate donation

Architecture events focus on real-world design opportunities

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The worlds of academia and professional practice rarely meet outside the classroom until students enter the work force.

However, today and Saturday, two College of Architecture, Planning and Design events will allow students to present class projects — not really proposals — on several real-world projects, including the planned K-State alumni center and historic theaters throughout Kansas.

Today from 1:30 to 2:30 p.m., eight students in a senior design course in landscape architecture will present their projects in Seaton Hall outside room 106 in the east wing. The projects are master plans for the southwest corner of campus, including the alumni center, a parking garage and the widening of Anderson Avenue.

Ken Brooks, professor of landscape architecture, said the presentations will begin with some introductory comments and will break up to allow students to sit by their projects and interact with visitors.

"It will be more like an open house," Brooks said.

He said the event is not intended to be lots of comments and debate on the floor as much as it's supposed to allow people to look at the projects and talk with students.

Brooks said the students approached the projects as master plans for university entry projects, similar to how professionals approach the design development stage of a project.

Saturday in the Union Little Theatre, 16 interior architecture senior students will exhibit and discuss their concepts for restoring six historic Kansas theaters. Open viewing is from 9 to 10 a.m. From 10 to 11 a.m., the students will give three-minute slide presentations of their work.

The class theater projects are part of the Renewing Historic Kansas Theaters project, which seeks to propose adaptive-use designs for little-used or abandoned theaters in Abilene, Belleville, Clay Center, Emporia, Grainfield and Topeka.

Jim Dubois, associate professor of landscape architecture, said the objectives of the senior design studio are planning and space issues, adaptive use and historic preservation. He said he developed the theater idea when talking with the president of the Kansas Preservation Alliance.

Dubois solicited theaters for consideration and narrowed the choices down to six historic theaters, most of which are in some process of mounting a restoration campaign.

"It certainly heightened awareness of the projects," Dubois said, referring to a stream of publicity throughout Kansas on the project. "It's too early to tell if they will lead to restoration."

The projects also solidify K-State's mission of community service, something that got President Jon Wefald's attention. Dubois said Wefald has funded a luncheon for invited guests on Saturday and three awards for students, both of which illustrate a commitment to community service.

"This project really reaches to all corners of Kansas — rural as well as metropolitan areas," Dubois said.

The project is sponsored by the Department of Interior Architecture in cooperation with the Kansas Preservation Alliance Inc., the Kansas Chapter of the League of Historic American Theaters, John Hunter at Washburn University and Dudley Toevs, a preservationist from Wichita.

The students will also present their projects to the communities in which the theaters are located.

They will begin Thursday at the Emporia State University Alumni Center (time has not been announced), followed by 7 p.m. Dec. 12 at the Lions Club in Grainfield, 10 a.m. Dec. 15 at the Belleville City Hall, 6 p.m. Dec. 16 at Clay Center's Rex Theatre and ending at 11:30 a.m. Dec. 17 at Topeka's Jayhawk Towers.

Cats should feel honored by either bowl bid

The college sports world is starting to understand there are two Manhattans in the United States, and that the "K-State Jayhawks" are not from Lawrence.

The Wildcat volleyball team plays in its second NCAA Tournament in history tonight. The football team learns Sunday whether it will return to the Cotton Bowl in Dallas or attend its first Alliance Bowl game, the Fiesta Bowl, in Tempe, Ariz.

The football media guide said Coach Bill Snyder was "charged with the mission of stopping a 0-26-1 streak upon his arrival in 1989." Not only has he done that, but he drug a football program in danger of being dropped to Division I-AA play to five consecutive nine-win seasons and five consecutive bowl games.

When the Fiesta Bowl executive director reads its selections at 3 p.m. Sunday on ESPN, don't turn a deaf ear if K-State isn't one of the teams read. An invitation to either bowl is an honor.

Sure, more than 40,000 fans made the trip down Interstate 35 to see the Cats in their first New Year's Day bowl last year. But the Cotton Bowl is one of the most prestigious bowls not in the Alliance and should be remembered as such.

To "Fiesta" brings many opportunities — competing in a highly publicized Alliance Bowl and earning $8 million to be divided within the Big 12 Conference and the various sports programs at K-State. But it also brings No. 15 Syracuse, an opponent that would not help the Cats in next year's preseason polls if they were to beat the Orangemen.

The Cotton Bowl would likely pit the Cats against No. 5 UCLA. If the Cats were to win, K-State would undoubtedly begin the season ranked in the top five.

The question of going to an Alliance Bowl vs. a repeat performance at a New Year's Day bowl was one many Cat fans dreamed about but hardly imagined happening. Show your purple pride, and support the Cats no matter where they spend the New Year's holiday.

Coming Home

Thanksgiving break forces issue of how thick blood is

VIEWPOINT

KELLY FURNAS

KELLY FURNAS is a sophomore in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Kelly at krf5663@ksu.edu

For a moment there, I was actually looking forward to seeing my family.

Just for a moment.

The story is a long one. Lately, my family and I have been rather distant. Ever since I moved out two years ago, our correspondence has consisted mainly of e-mail. While we have no bitter or hostile feelings toward each other, we just aren't as close as most other families.

And for relatives who aren't in my immediate family, the bond has been even weaker. I have aunts and uncles I haven't talked to in years — over the phone or by mail.

The past few months have really made me think about how much I have missed my family. I have not seen enough of my family — whether it be my parents living in Topeka, my sisters living in Minnesota and Wichita or my grandparents living in Oklahoma. A few weeks into the semester, I actually began to miss them, despite the fact that I thought I was incapable of such sentimentality.

Thanksgiving break, I thought, would be an opportune time to see the people I was beginning to miss so much. I had arranged to visit my sister in Minnesota and see my aunt and uncle who also lived there.

Unfortunately, it turned out that much of my anticipation was misplaced. Instead of bonding with the family I cared about or reminiscing, I was stuck in the middle of family bickering and forced to defend other relatives.

I began to question the bond of blood.

Aside from feeling uncomfortable at having to raise my voice to my family, I also felt a little confused as to why I was putting up with any of the conflict. I had not chosen to befriend any of these people. They had not done anything spectacular to warrant my undying respect. Their only connection to me was relation.

I guess I shouldn't have been surprised about all of the family bickering. My sister always complains about my father being a bad parent. My father always complains about how my sister is irresponsible. My aunt and uncle always complain about both my sister and my father. While I care about all of these people a great deal, I hardly think any of them have earned the right to tell me what's wrong with my other relatives.

But the issue is much larger than just handling complaints or defending relatives. I have members of my distant family that I have serious issues with, but just because they are related to me, I am supposed to have some feelings for them. I have relatives who are racist and sexist who for some reason deserve my support, when no one else with such views would even be considered an acquaintance.

If I was not sharing some vaguely similar DNA, I would dismiss these people as losers. I would treat them as examples of what not to be like. Instead, my society and I insist that I defend these loathsome people.

My immediate family is by no means this severe. I think everyone who has lived in my house is a decent person. I have tremendous respect and admiration for my father — both as a parent and as a friend.

My sister and I have been through so much together that I have grown to think of her as a thoughtful and responsible person. But, like anyone else I know, I get tired of even the closest members of my family. My sister thought it would be neat if I spent an entire summer with her in Minnesota — but I can't think of anything I'd rather not do more.

Thanksgiving break was a disheartening and disillusioning week for me. I reaffirmed my feeling that college was an opportunity to get away from my family and stay away from them. I've had my fill of putting up with people I wouldn't even consider friends. At the same time, not a day goes by that I feel an innate responsibility to keep in touch with them.

The time will undoubtedly come when again I start missing these faces from my life. I will again seek them out and try to spend time with them.

Unfortunately, I'm pretty sure that I'll have the same response as I did this time.

Winter break is coming up. I'm staying in Manhattan. I don't have any family here.

College friendships difficult to form, often sticky to repair

"I'll be Bo Duke, you be Luke Duke."

When you're little, it's pretty easy to acquire friends. Just give a verbal invitation to a day of "Dukes of Hazzard" play, and you've got a pal for life.

College is different. College is big. People are scary. They don't want to play "Dukes of Hazzard."

I was scared when I started college. Believe it or not, I'm a little shy around people I don't know. If I say anything, it's usually real dumb and involves many self-deprecating comments. So I was certainly afraid I would never find a niche. Joining a sorority was completely out of the question — I think letting me in breaks all sorts of charter rules.

One day during my first semester, I found myself having a real conversation with two people from my German class. I was giddy. Friendships weren't forged that day or anything, but it was a start.

When I finally got around to making actual friends, I realized the group was by no means of the same magnitude as my group of friends at home. It was a much smaller bunch at college, made up mostly of Collegian cronies. But that was OK with me.

So technically, I've only been friends with these people for a little more than a year. That's not very much time for one of us to do anything seriously damaging the status of the relationship or anything. Good thing, too, because I wouldn't know what to do.

Getting into spats with the people you grew up with is an entirely different matter than getting into spats with your friends at college. At home, we'll yell and cry and make big scenes when we fight with our friends. Then we hug and make up. At least that's how it goes with my large and unruly pack o' pals back in Newton, Kan.

College is different. And just when I realized I wouldn't know what to do, I found a big, gaping rip in one of my better collegiate friendships.

We're adults now, right? We don't yell and cry and make big scenes. Or we're not supposed to.

Not that I'm into making a big scene or anything, but I had no idea what to do with the friendship teetering over the cliff.

VIEWPOINT

BRANDI HERTIG

BRANDI HERTIG is a sophomore in print journalism and English/ creative writing. You can send your e-mail comments to Brandi at blh0377@ksu.edu.

This rip was a nasty one indeed, and the friend was a good one. The cause of the problem was a grown-up one, not something trivial like enchilada stains on a shirt; though that would've been much more convenient, because all you need is a bottle of Shout for stuff like that.

This was just plain old bad news. Luckily, there was Thanksgiving break in the middle of it, which meant more time for things to fester and whatnot.

I tried to think of ways to be nonchalant when the break was over. I was ready to abandon ship altogether, leaving my friend to float on his own.

Then, I started thinking — which, by the way, is always a bad idea and is not recommended or endorsed. Thank you. It's just hard sometimes to forage these friendships, and both of us had put a little effort into the whole thing. We had discussed the hilarity of "The Simpsons" at length, and even exchanged unsolicited advice about our respective boyfriend/girlfriend. It was indeed a full-fledged friendship.

Then, I'm cleaning out what had become a cesspool of a car when I find a popsicle wrapper he left in there last August. (Gross? No. Not as gross as the bowl of ravioli I found under the driver's seat.) That gets me thinking about all the goofy things we've done together. This is not to suggest I get all sentimental over a congealed wrapper, but it was impetus enough for me to mull the situation before I came to any conclusion.

I realized we're grown up now, and sometimes slipping in the eyes of a friend is considered OK when there are greater things to be had. I'm not sure at what age that begins, but I didn't think it happened before at least 23.

The rip now has some Scotch tape on it, and I'm glad for that. But things really won't be the same as they were before. But we can act like it. After all, he's a main component in a pretty small group.

It's not something I'd normally do if the friend were a Newtonian. But when friends are so few and far between when you're usually too busy to even think, what really can be done?

As trite as it is, friends really are important. The only problem is, you have to find someone who thinks that, too.

occur on the street, he said.

"How many more people do we have to kill to preserve trees?" Muir asked. "Anderson Avenue needs improvement. I'm going to endeavor to find the best way possible to do it, but I am not going to sit here and allow myself to vote against improvement for a street that needs improvement."

Ross also said claims by neighborhood residents that their concerns were being ignored were unfounded.

"I suggest that the people who don't like the process simply don't like the fact that the process simply isn't going in their direction," he said.

After more than two hours of presentations by several speakers, Senate voted 31-21 to table the resolution until January, when more information about the project's specifics could be obtained.

But later, the resolution was taken off the table after Governmental Relations Chair Patrick Carney, whose committee wrote the legislation, spoke with Messer by telephone.

Messer, who had been at the meeting until the resolution was originally tabled, told Carney that Senate should take action on the measure during its meeting. Otherwise, City Commission members wouldn't know students' opinion when they discuss the project at their Dec. 16 meeting.

Fawn Benfer, who went to high school with him in Abilene, grinned as she told one of her favorite stories about Christiensen.

She said every time he would come over to her house, he'd be fascinated with a lamp that had oil running down its sides in streams.

"He'd stick his finger in the stream," she said. He would do that for hours, talking about how cool it looked because it looked like the oil was running up.

When she learned of his illness, Benfer said she became angry for Christiensen.

"I was really bitter," she said.

Benfer said he made her feel like there was nothing to be afraid of with his disease.

"He wouldn't let you feel sorry for him," she said. "Jason was real accepting of his disease,"

Because of his positive outlook and happiness, she said took a positive outlook as well.

"I honestly did not think he would die," she said. "I knew he would live. I knew he would get his lungs."

His life was short, Fenton said. But he lived life the the fullest and had few regrets.

"I think he died a good death," Fenton said.

from making cookies to vacuuming rooms.

"I'm going to wrap Christmas presents and load cars before winter break," Sean Neihouse, senior in marketing, said.

Neihouse said he decided to participate in the auction because it is a good way to get the hall involved in AIDS awareness. Slagle said she was impressed with the support the Moore residents gave to their RAs and to the cause.

"We're incredibly happy about the turnout and the amount of money that was raised," Slagle said. "Overall, it was wonderful."

Mackey said there are other activities, such as a movie night starting at 9 on Monday in Moore and, afterward, sleep-outs in each lobby.

"That's kind of our way of tying all of Moore together," Mackey said. "Everybody unites on their floor."

The rest of the week consists of community service night on Tuesday and speakers on AIDS issues Wednesday night, Mackey said. The RAs said they hoped the auction will help everyone become involved in AIDS awareness.

"AIDS is not something just for strangers, it is something that hits everybody," Neihouse said.

"I don't think the understanding of how close it is to home is understood."

We find the news so you don't have to.

Chiefs fans treat holidays as just another pep rally

Here we are in the middle of the holiday season, perhaps my favorite time of the year. Everybody's so festive and happy, and there are plenty of celebrations all over the place for the season.

One of my favorites is the Mayor's Christmas Tree Lighting Ceremony in Kansas City, Mo. As long as I can remember, I've gone to Crown Center the day after Thanksgiving with my family for what has become tradition. We all go out and sing with the choir, light our candles and watch the lighting ceremony. It is an event we all look forward to, and it is one of my favorite memories from my childhood.

This year, the lighting ceremony was different. The past three mayors of the city, along with all the other usual people, were up there speaking about giving to the Mayor's Christmas Tree Fund and helping those less fortunate. That's what the season's all about.

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can send your e-mail comments to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu

The usual master-of-ceremonies, Bob Gretz, who I don't really like but can put up with for 40 minutes, handed things off to this year's special guest, Marty Schottenheimer, head coach of the Kansas City Chiefs.

Of course, Gretz couldn't give up the microphone without saying what a "bee-oooo-tee-ful" tree it was, and how "bee-oooo-tee-ful" Schottenheimer's wife was, and everything else he could describe with his stale, patented word.

Schottenheimer, who spoke last, was the most refreshing of the speakers. He's the only one who didn't base his speech on the Chiefs, make numerous Chiefs references or wear some horrid-looking Chiefs hat like the mayor's wife did.

I was standing there in the red-clad crowd (I hate red, remember) and noticed that somewhere along the line, the Mayor's Christmas Tree Lighting Ceremony became a Chiefs' pep rally. I was sickened.

When did the Christmas holiday, the celebration of Jesus Christ's birth, become just another vehicle for supporting the local football team?

Granted, I don't like the Chiefs at all, and that gives me character and definite uniqueness in Kansas City. See, I, unlike most people, refused to jump on the Chiefs' bandwagon when they became pretty good, and I will refuse to forever.

Just because Kansas City is the city I've called home for all my life doesn't mean that all of the sudden I'll become a fan of the football team I've known as a 4-12 team for a long time. I'm not a big subscriber to the theory that if you live in a city, you automatically have to like all its teams.

In fact, I'd probably like them more if they were 4-12 again.

I don't have all that much of a problem with the team itself, but I root against them simply for all the Chiefs' fans there suddenly are, not only in Kansas City but everywhere. The same goes for Dallas and Green Bay. I didn't see the green and gold very much in 1988, when the Packers were battling yearly for the No. 1 overall pick in the draft.

I can remember when Arrowhead Stadium was barely half full, when Bill Kenney and Todd Blackledge were behind center, when John Mackovic and Frank Gansz patrolled the sidelines and when the Royals were the team to see.

But the baseball team across the parking lot started to lose ballgames and the football team became respectable, and going to Chiefs' games suddenly was the thing to do and Arrowhead was the place to be seen.

But according to about everybody who had the microphone in front of them last Friday, Kansas City fans were the "best in the world," or the "best in the NFL," or something like that.

They're just like everyone else. Supporting the winners, forgetting everyone else. Now, suddenly you can't find anybody who was a Royals' fan in 1985, or who wasn't a Chiefs' fan that same year. That's kind of funny.

Almost as funny as in January 1996, when the 13-3 Chiefs fell to the "lowly" Indianapolis Colts at home, in the Chiefs' first game of the playoffs. I remember watching the local news just to watch people who already had Super Bowl tickets cry as they were leaving the stadium. Literally crying.

I say it serves them right, unless they are just as severe fans of 4-12 Chiefs as they are of 12-4 Chiefs, which is never the case.

In Kansas City, you can't avoid that (insert obscenity here) arrowhead. Even here I can't avoid it. On Sundays, my busiest day in the newsroom, my editor always has this horrible white hat with red and yellow on it. But I can live with that.

Because, come January, those are all the people that will be crying when the Jets come into Arrowhead and squash the Chiefs' championship hopes again. And I'll be laughing at them.

Netters set to make return trip to NCAA Tournament

DAN MERKER

For the second time in the program's history and the second time in as many years, the K-State volleyball team is preparing to play in the NCAA Tournament.

And the Wildcats are six wins away from a national championship.

"Everybody's 0-0 right now," K-State head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

The Cats will take on the University of San Diego, the No. 23 team in the nation. The sixth-seeded Toreros take a 25-3 record into their match against the 11th-seeded Cats in a Pacific Regional match-up in Los Angeles.

K-State and San Diego will play at 7 p.m. Friday, followed by No. 7 USC vs. Morgan State. The winners will play each other Saturday night, with the winner of that match advancing to the regional semifinals.

The Toreros received an automatic bid to the tournament by winning the West Coast Conference. The Toreros lost only one conference match this season, to Loyola Marymount. This is their third tournament appearance, but the school has never won an NCAA Tournament game.

The Toreros are led by Lamanda Mounts, who has 4.25 kills and 3.26 digs per game, and Sarah Gunsaulus, who is averaging nearly four kills per game.

San Diego and K-State will go strength vs. strength — the Toreros' offense vs. the Cats' blocking and digging.

"They look better offensively, but we look better defensively," McLaughlin said.

McLaughlin said San Diego is a good team. K-State will have to play well to win, and the block is the key to the Cats' success. The Cats are lead by middle blockers Val Wieck, an all-conference performer, and Kelle Branting. McLaughlin also said that if it is necessary, he will play Heather Lindell instead of right-side hitter Alexis Shepherd to improve K-State's block.

"We have played our best volleyball when we were blocking a lot of balls," McLaughlin said. "When you get to the Final Four, all of those teams will be the best blocking teams."

The Cats are coming off a 20-12 season, including a 11-9 Big 12 Conference mark. Despite finishing sixth in the Big 12, the Cats made the tournament. Of the six Big 12 teams in the tournament, four are hosting first- and second-round matches, showing the quality of the conference. All the Cats' losses are to teams in the tournament.

Should K-State get by San Diego, they have to turn around and play the next night, probably against USC. That is where McLaughlin won a national title with the men's team, and the

After a 4-0 start, the men's basketball team knows it has a lot to prove after last season's last-place finish in the Big 12. For the coach, the goal at this point is simple.

The Wildcats are set to play their second Carolina school in five games.

Neither the Tar Heels of North Carolina or South Carolina Gamecocks will be in Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday afternoon, but the Coastal Carolina Chanticleers will.

The Chanticleers, hailing from the Big South Conference, will arrive in Manhattan with a 1-3 record. Their one win was against Mercer, a common opponent of the Wildcats.

On Coastal Carolina's home court, the Chanticleers defeated Mercer 68-63 on Dec. 3.

Four days before the Coastal Carolina-Mercer game, the Cats beat Mercer 89-60 in Bramlage.

There are possible reasons for the Cats to look past the Chanticleers. The Cats could be looking forward to avenging the 74-59 loss to Wichita State last year, or to the possible Dec. 30 match-up against Arizona, the defending national champions, in the Fiesta Bowl Basketball Classic.

However, Asbury said he is not going to look past anyone.

"We're not in a position where we can make any assumptions or look by anybody or judge anybody else's talent," Asbury said. "I think we're strictly in a respect-gathering mode."

Aside from the final score, some of K-State's statistics against Mercer are strikingly similar to Coastal Carolina's statistics against Mercer.

K-State shot 43 percent from the

After falling prey to a team at its own tournament last weekend — DePaul at the Moran Realty Classic in Chicago — the K-State women's basketball team will play host to Southern A&M, Wisconsin-Green Bay and Utah on Friday and Saturday nights at Bramlage Coliseum in the Commerce Bank/Wildcat Classic.

"It's going to be a very difficult tournament, and it's going to be another challenge for us," K-State associate head coach Kamie Ethridge said.

Friday night, the Wisconsin-Green Bay Phoenix will face the Utes in the first game at 5:30. The Phoenix is bringing a 4-1 record into the match-up against Utah, while the Utes are a perfect 3-0. Utah is coming off three consecutive trips to the NCAA Tournament and, if the poll was extended, would be the No. 28 team in the nation in the USA Today/ESPN coaches' poll.

Wisconsin-Green Bay is coming off an 18-11 season and a third-place finish in the Midwestern Collegiate Conference. The Phoenix has lost only to Indiana this year and is led by forward Chari Nordgaard, who averages 23.2 points per contest.

Utah finished 15-1 in the Western Athletic Conference a year ago and posted a 25-6 overall record. The Utes are led by guard Julie Krommenhoek's average 17 points per game and forward Angie Thill's 10.7 boards per contest. Krommenhoek has been an honorable mention Kodak All-American the past two years.

The Utes are shooting 41 percent from beyond the three-point arc, and are hitting 77.6 percent of their foul shots.

"They run a tremendous motion offense — maybe one of the best in the country — and they work so hard," Ethridge said.

The nightcap features the Wildcats against Southern A&M in their first-ever meeting. The Lady Jaguars enter their match-up with the Cats at 2-2 and are led by junior Kimberly Hollins, who averages more than 15 points per game, and center Mariah Tatum, who is averaging 9.3 rebounds per contest.

Southern will play an attacking defensive style, similar to the one Grambling State played Wednesday night, forcing 28 K-State turnovers.

"We're limited in possessions that we get offensively, so we have to take care of the basketball," Ethridge said.

Despite those 28 turnovers, the Cats managed to win by a 73-54 score, and four Wildcats scored in double figures.

If the Cats continue to turn the ball over, K-State figures to have to maintain their rebounding edge to have a chance to win. The Cats out-rebounded Grambling 54-33 in Wednesday night's contest.

But K-State head coach Deb Patterson doesn't want to have to rely on rebounding to win. She wants the Cats to stop turning over the ball.

"We've got to understand how important each possession is," Patterson said.

Win or lose, K-State will have to play another game Saturday.

The losers from Friday night's games will meet in the consolation game Saturday at 5:30 p.m., while the winners will meet for the tournament championship afterward.

Track teams seek to come of age when season begins on Saturday

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

K-State's postseason play extends further than football and volleyball. Track and field Coach Cliff Rovelto is convinced many members of this season's team will compete in the NCAA Championships in March.

"On the men's side, we have national caliber-type athletes in practically every event except for, perhaps, the pole vault and the hurdles," Rovelto said. "In this day and age, that's unheard of."

The team kicks off its indoor season at 1 p.m. Saturday at Ahearn Field House in the KSU All-Comers meet. Rovelto said the 17 teams attending make it the largest this particular meet has been in his tenure.

"This weekend's meet is larger than we'd like at this point," Rovelto said. "The quality of athletes will be very good, but many events will probably see typical, early season-type remarks."

At the same time, Rovelto said his young team will reap benefits from the great competitive situation.

"The freshmen and junior college transfers obviously haven't competed at this level yet," Rovelto said. "This will be a good test for them."

The women finished fourth in last year's Big 12 Conference indoor meet and lost three multi-event All-Americans to graduation; Wanita Dykstra, Belinda Hope and Karissa Stewart, as well as javelin throwers Kirsten Schultz and Staci Lowe.

Although Rovelto said these losses threaten the upcoming season, the women will compete with the top echelon a year from now.

"We're probably below a little from where we we've been," Rovelto said. "But, in a large part, that's due to a conscious effort."

NCAA regulations stipulate that the track team is allowed only 12.6 scholarships a year. Rovelto said he had a lot of talented athletes returning and held back from handing out scholarships.

"We wanted to see what the Big 12 had to offer," Rovelto said. "We didn't want to give out 10 scholarships and have that unbalance."

Rovelto called the Big 12 Championship a "mini-national meet in most events," saying conference com-

Outburst earns Sprewell NBA-record suspension

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OAKLAND, Calif. — The Golden State Warriors fired him. And now the National Basketball Association doesn't want Latrell Sprewell playing anywhere else in the league for a year.

Commissioner David Stern suspended Sprewell on Thursday without pay for a year — the longest suspension in NBA history — for assaulting Coach P.J. Carlesimo at practice and threatening to kill him. Stern's action followed the unprecedented one taken Wednesday night by the Warriors, who terminated Sprewell's four-year, $32 million contract.

Sprewell

"A sports league does not have to accept or condone behavior that would not be tolerated in any other segment of society," Stern said.

The suspension is effective immediately and will end on Dec. 3, 1998. Sprewell was already serving a 10-game suspension without pay imposed by the team.

The league's penalty also prevents Sprewell from playing for another NBA team for a year — even if he was claimed on waivers.

Also Thursday, Converse said it fired Sprewell as an endorser and spokesman for the shoe company.

Stern said Sprewell assaulted Carlesimo twice at Monday's practice. "First he choked him until forcibly pulled away," Stern said. "Then, after leaving practice, Mr. Sprewell returned and fought his way through others in order to commit a second, and this time clearly premeditated, assault."

Sprewell admitted he made a mistake in assaulting Carlesimo at practice. But he did not apologize to him and said the incident was a result of repeated verbal abuse from the Warriors' new coach.

It was the first time in the 51-year history of the NBA that a player's contract was terminated for insubordination. Two players, Roy Tarpley and Richard Dumas, had their contracts voided because they violated league drug policy.

"Outrageous misconduct by players in professional sports has been tolerated for too long," said Garry St. Jean, the Warriors' general manager. "We are drawing the line. Some things are more important than winning or losing games."

Golden State dropped to 1-14 after losing another game Wednesday, this one to the Cleveland Cavaliers.

A star at the University of Alabama, Sprewell, 27, was in his sixth season with the Warriors. The three-time All-Star and the team's leading scorer with 21.4 points per game was notified of the termination in a letter sent by St. Jean earlier Wednesday.

Before the team's decision was announced, Sprewell said he was prepared to play outside the NBA.

"I want to apologize to my fans, my family and friends of mine who saw this. It's definitely not something that I condone, but it did happen. And that's a mistake I made," Sprewell told KPIX-TV. "I just couldn't take the verbal abuse that he's been giving all the guys over the past month or so."

Some NBA players have a personal conduct clause in their contracts that prohibits teams from terminating them based upon behavior. Sprewell had no such protection.

The incident also focused attention on Carlesimo, who was hired by Golden State in June, less than a month after he was fired by the Portland Trail Blazers in that team's attempt to change its playing style.

Carlesimo was hired by Portland in 1994 but his no-nonsense, autocratic intensity aggravated some players, prompting some to demand trades. He was fired with two years left on his five-year contract.

The game against Cleveland was the first game of Sprewell's suspension and the loss left the Warriors winless in six games at their newly remodeled Oakland Arena.

"We've got a lot of work to do," Carlesimo said. "Perhaps we have more work to do now."

field, and Coastal Carolina shot 46 percent from the field. The Cats had 15 assists and 10 steals, while the Chanticleers had 12 assists and eight steals. Each team had 11 turnovers against Mercer. The leading scorer for the Cats, forward Shawn Rhodes, and the leading scorer for the Chanticleers, guard Rodney Dupre both had 22 points.

As for the differences, Coastal Carolina was outrebounded by Mercer by two, and they only grabbed 12 offensive rebounds. The Cats crashed the boards against Mercer, outrebounding them by 18. They pulled down 26 offensive rebounds in that game.

Although the Cats' field goal percentage was only 43 percent against Mercer, they made 33 shots.

The Chanticleers shot 46 percent from the field against Mercer, but they only made 24 shots.

Asbury said playing a team that is supposed to be a lesser opponent can't hurt you unless you lose.

"Unless somebody can prove it to me differently, these games count all the same amount," he said. "They're all one win or one loss. I haven't seen them weighed or skewed or anything of that nature.

"I know one thing. If you loose a game to a team that's ranked below you in the computer rankings, it certainly hurts your postseason opportunities, but from a coaching standpoint, we certainly don't weigh them," he said.

The Cats are coming off a Wednesday night 71-50 win over the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

Rhodes again led the Cats' with 12 points and eight rebounds. Forward Marcus McCollough chipped in 10 points and led the team in assists with five.

The Coastal Carolina game will be the first time the Cats have played twice in the same week.

"It's time for us to start playing a little bit more frequently because they're tired of hammering on each other," Asbury said. "I don't mind it from a coach's perspective, but we have to get all those games in at some point in time."

petitors Nebraska and Texas will be teams the Wildcats strive to beat. But this year, Rovelto expects that to happen on the men's side.

"I think our men's team is probably the best we've ever had here," he said. "With the limited number of scholarships, it's been the trend that schools pick and choose what events to focus on — they decide to be a throwing school or a distance school, etc. This year, we can cover virtually every event."

This is different than in years past, Rovelto said.

"The women have traditionally been very strong, but by our standard, the men weren't where we wanted them to be," he said.

Newcomers Rovelto expects to have an initial effect on this year's team include sprinter Randy Melbourne, Austrian decathalete Thomas Weiler (who will arrive at semester break), runners John Martin and Matt Davis, and high jumpers Charles Burney and Nathan Leeper.

On the women's side, All-Americans Vanitta Kinard and Renetta Seiler will lead the young team. Kinard has only the indoor season remaining eligibility-wise in hurdles and relays, and will contribute there as well.

Rovelto said the team is ready to get started, and postseason thoughts could enter the picture as early as this weekend.

"Nathan and Charles may be the two most talented high jumpers we've had here, and I'm comparing them to Olympian Ed Broxterman, three-time Big 8 champion Itai Margalit and Percell Gaskins," Rovelto said. "Charles has already jumped 7-4 and three-fourths in practice. Those two could qualify for the NCAA this weekend."

Women of Troy are the No. 3 seed in the Pacific Regional, finishing the season at 21-5. They tied for second with a 13-5 record in the Pac-10, which also qualified six teams for the tournament.

"People think we're the second-strongest conference behind the Pac-10," McLaughlin said.

USC is led by Jasmina Marinkovic, who is hitting .407 for the season, Jennifer Kessy, who has more than 400 kills and more than 300 digs, and middle blocker Alaina Kipps, who recorded 1.63 blocks per game.

USC advanced to the third round of the 1996 tournament, before losing to eventual national champion Stanford 3-0.

The only common opponent K-State and USC have is Colorado, a team that beat K-State twice this season. USC downed the Buffaloes in their only meeting.

McLaughlin wants to make sure the Cats don't put too much pressure on themselves.

"We just have to prepare the way we're used to preparing," he said.

Stubborn All-Stars return to ska scene with rhythm-based CD

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Music Review

The Stubborn All-Stars are most definitely back.

"Back With A New Batch," that is.

This New York City-based ska supergroup is composed of members of Skinnerbox, the Slackers, the Insteps, Agent 99 and the Pietasters. Led by Jeff "King Django" Baker, the All-Stars issued one of 1995's best albums with its debut "Open Season" album.

The band has avoided the dreaded sophomore slump with "Back With A New Batch." It's a more rhythm-based album than "Open Season" was with less horns, but it's still one fine ska record.

Pop this compact disc in your player, sit back and prepare to be schooled in the art of true ska. Step aside Goldfinger, the All-Stars are here to show you how it's really done.

The title track kicks everything off in fine fashion with a slower, more reggae-sounding feel. It's got Baker's distinctive vocals flying all over the place. I love his well-placed shrieks, I guess you could call them, throughout the song.

This song prepares you for one helluva record.

"Pick Yourself Up" features an unknown movie sample starting it off. Samples from the same movie are scattered throughout the album.

This song has monstrous horn arrangements, similar to an old big band record. It also features backing vocals from Dicky Barrett of the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, as well as Lars Frederiksen, Tim Armstrong and Matt Freeman of Rancid. Vic "Lord Sluggo" Ruggiero's organ riffs rock my world. The positive message of working hard and keeping your spirits up sticks out.

Baker writes some of the best love songs in ska music, and "Glimmer Of Hope" is no exception. It's a catchy, poppy love song. It is just wonderful.

One of my favorite songs on the CD has to be "Tired Of Struggling." An earlier version of the song appeared on the 1996 Moon Records compilation "Spawn Of Skarmageddon." This version is completely revamped, retooled and improved. Yet again, Baker injects it with a positive edge with lyrics such as, "I've got to drag myself into action cause I'm so tired of struggling."

Track five is "Because Of You," a song that sounds like an old New Orleans soul tune. It's a rollicking, fun song with huge soulish horn arrangements.

It also has Sledge from the Toasters contributing vocals and his trumpet style to the track. If you don't dance to this, then something is definitely wrong with you.

The members of the All-Stars honor their hardworking promotions guy Dave Helm with a song all about him. It's even got Helm covering vocals about himself.

The saxophone solo by "Disco" Dave Hillyard and the trombone solos by Baker on this one are great. Baker proves again why he is my favorite songwriter in ska music with "I Can't Touch You." It's a brilliant love ballad about long-distance love.

Baker hands the lead vocal microphone over to Ruggiero for "Thankful," a bass- and organ-driven song with a killer sax solo.

"Crop No Drop" has a nice rocksteady tempo with Dave "Hahn Solo" Hahn's guitar deservedly upfront. Hahn is an amazing player.

The second highlight of the record, behind "I Can't Touch You," is "Struggling Version," which is a dub mix of "Tired Of Struggling."

Jack Ruby Jr., of the Toasters, contributes his unique toasting vocals to the track. His freestyling is just incredible. Baker plays harmonica very well on it, too.

The album is closed by an instrumental version of "Pick Yourself Up" with a muted trumpet covering the vocal parts.

The Stubborn All-Stars are headlining the NYC Ska Mob Tour, which makes a stop in Lawrence tonight at the Bottleneck. Doors open at 5 p.m. and the show starts at 6 p.m. Tickets are $8 in advance. Skinnerbox and the Slackers are also appearing.

Do not miss this show. All three bands share lots of members, so watch out for some cool jamming to go on, as well as some other cool things. This will be the ska show of the year.

STUBBORN ALL-STARS will perform tonight in Lawrence.

nutcracker the ice ballet

The Nutcracker
Sunday, December 7, 3 p.m. and 7:30 p.m.
Public: $28, $24, $20 Seniors: $26, $22, $18
Students: $14, $12, $10

It's Christmas eve -- and a young girl dreams of a frightening Mouse King, her heroic Nutcracker, a kindly Sugar Plum Fairy, and a kingdom of delicious sweets. Tchaikovsky set this ETA Hoffmann tale to a memorable score in 1892 -- and his ballet has been delighting audiences ever since.

You may have seen it before, but when performed as an ice ballet, Nutcracker sparkles with a special grace and beauty.

Don't miss the troupe the Manhattan Mercury praised for its staging and athleticism: "The show may not have been ballet, but it was the best damned ice dancing show I'm ever likely to see."

Give the gift of the Nutcracker ice show performance for Christmas and purchase a McCain gift certificate. Great for people of any age!

EGYPT: TERROR ON THE NILE

KEVYN JACOBS
special to the Collegian

I had a bad feeling about going to Egypt. When we arrived at the mouth of the Suez Canal on Nov. 14, I listened to the British Broadcasting Corp. on the radio to find out what was going on in the world.

The top story was that Rami Yousef had been convicted of the World Trade Center bombing the day before, and fearing reprisals, the U.S. State Department had issued a warning for Americans traveling in the Middle East to be extra cautious.

We were all a little apprehensive about being in Egypt, but we hoped everything would be fine. I only wish our fears wouldn't have turned out to be so justified.

We spent a day sailing up the Suez, from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean Sea. It was a surreal experience, being on a ship as it moved through the desert. I looked out my cabin window and saw nothing but sand on both sides of the ship.

To the left of us was Egypt proper, irrigated in places by water brought in from the Nile, and to the right was the Sinai Peninsula, a desert with little vegetation.

I also had a profound sense of connection to history as I looked out over the Sinai. Here was where God is said to have given Moses the Ten Commandments, and here was where Moses led his people out of Egypt. Here was the land Mary, Joseph and the baby Jesus crossed to escape Herod, and where Lawrence of Arabia crossed to go to Cairo to get support for his Arabian freedom fighters.

To my left, the land of the Pharaohs. One of the oldest civilizations of our species was there, to whom American civilization owes much.

Yet we had been warned, be prepared for a country that was desperately poor, incredibly overpopulated and considered a developing nation. It is strange to think of the cradle of civilization as a developing nation.

That evening, I went for a walk in Port Said. I saw a city that was very Western, and for the most part, modern. Some women wore veils, but most did not, and except for the ubiquitous writing in Arabic, you might think you were in the Western world.

The next morning, I boarded a tour bus for Cairo. We were escorted by police vehicles, so we knew there must have been safety concerns. It was a 2 1/2-hour ride from Port Said, and as we traveled through the Eastern Desert, we went through something I never expected to see in Egypt: thick fog. It irritated me a bit because it blocked my view of the desert. As I learned later, this fog turned out the be a lifesaver for Semester-at-Sea students.

In Cairo, we visited the Egyptian museum where I got to see the fabled treasures of Tutankhamen. All my life I had heard about these treasures — the golden mask, the solid gold sarcophagi, the beautiful jewelry inlaid with lapis lazuli. I had even studied them in Louann Culley's Survey of Art History class at K-State. It was amazing to see them with my own eyes.

After a splendid lunch at the Nile Hilton with a spectacular view of the Nile, my friend Mara and I ditched the tour group and decided to spend three days on our own in Cairo. We found a funky old hotel near the Nile as a place to crash during our stay. The place had seen better days. Most of Cairo seemed that way — a place of faded glory and long-ago elegance now degenerated to dowdiness.

FELUCCAS ON the Nile.

That evening we took a taxi and went to a nearby Egyptian bazaar. We walked through spice markets, browsed clothing shops and ate at little cafes. I tried on two dozen Galabias, the customary robe of desert dwellers in this part of the world. Being the big guy I am, I couldn't find one that fit and resigned to having one custom-made.

The bazaar was an incredibly lively place, full of tiny, twisty little passages and stalls where you could buy almost anything you wanted. It was, for me, the quintessential Egyptian experience, and one I will not soon forget.

The next morning, we hired a car and driver for the day and drove to Giza to visit the pyramids. I was astounded to discover the city had grown right up to the pyramids. From pictures, you'd think the pyramids were way out in the desert somewhere, far from any settlement.

The buildings did not actually run right up to the pyramids. At least a few hundred meters of desert was left around the structures, but as I stood and looked at the pyramids through the city smog, which was thick, I couldn't help but wonder what the Pharaohs would think if they could see what had become of their monuments.

We hired camels to take us to the pyramids — the desert was still there, just significantly reduced in size — and saw the Sphinx. We couldn't get too close because of the massive reconstruction. The Sphinx, made of limestone, is eroding away in the acid smog of Giza. Egypt is desperately trying to save the deteriorating monument.

We walked up to the middle pyramid, Chephren, and went inside. The climb up to the king's burial chamber was difficult, especially because the ceiling is so low. I had to crawl on my hands and knees at places. But at last, Mara and I sat in the very center of one of the great pyramids of Egypt.

After we exited the pyramid, we boarded our camel again and rode around the pyramids. It was a magnificent sight. Despite the smog, despite the encroaching urban landscape, they still retained their majesty. It was worth it, this whole voyage, just to be at Giza and see this.

During the rest of our time in Cairo, we walked along the banks of the Nile, visited the Museum of Islamic Art and browsed the famous Khan al-Khalili bazaar. Then we boarded a bus for Port Said. I really enjoyed my time in Cairo and would love to return.

Back at the ship, we learned our fears had come true. A terrorist attack had taken place that morning in Luxor, and 60 or so people were dead, mostly tourists. We were all in a panic because a large tour group of Semester-at-Sea students was at Luxor at the time the attack took place.

Some reports said that, as yet, no Americans had been identified as dead, but that was little comfort to us because so many of our students are from other countries. All trips for the rest of our visit to Egypt had been canceled, and everyone was being recalled to Port Said.

The next day we learned that all of the students on the Luxor trip were OK, much to our relief. The fog I mentioned earlier had delayed them at the Cairo airport for several hours, so they were not where they were supposed to be. They were scheduled to be at the temple in Luxor when the attack occurred.

So the rest of our stay in Egypt, we pretty much stayed around the ship. It was sad that our visit to Egypt had to be marred by the events in Luxor, but at least we were all safe.

I loved my time in Egypt. It is a wonderful place to visit, and the people are very kind. Someday, when things aren't so tense there, I'll be back.

Ma'a salaama, Misr.

Jiffy Boy kicks out the finest chicken core around

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Music Review

They're punk. They're drunk. They've got a compact disc.

That's right. Manhattan's own chicken-core heroes, the members of Jiffy Boy, have finally released their debut CD titled "More Songs With ..." on their own Chicken Core Records.

It was recorded at Mercy Studios by engineering king Robert Rebeck, and as a result, it sounds incredible.

Jiffy Boy isn't afraid to tackle important issues such as suicide, politics, organized religion and racism.

The album is kicked off by a rooster crowing and then slams right into the first song, "Red Dick." It opens at breakneck speed to get you up to speed in a hurry. It's a great song to kick off the album.

Lead vocalist "Vegan" Chris Balsiger and guitarist/backing vocalist Jeremy "Rat Bastard" Sturgell trade dual vocals throughout the song.

The song takes on the issue of suicide and the pain of it all.

Balsiger sounds like the singer of Grimple and El Dopa at the end with his shrieking and growling vocal style.

"Dead Girl" finds the band venturing off into emo territory a bit with the most adventurous song Jiffy Boy does. It's punk but not punk.

I really like the harmonics and melody in this one. It sounds kind of Lagwagon-esque.

My favorite Jiffy Boy song has to be "Genocide Next."

It's got a ska-sounding intro and some killer bass riffs from Scott "Scoot Train" Griffin that sound a lot like Matt Freeman of Rancid's bass riffs.

As the title suggests, this song is about Pepsico Inc.'s exploitation of the country of Burma. It made me feel guilty as I drank my Diet Dr Pepper as I wrote this review.

Balsiger even appropriates the popular Sprite commercials for his own use with "Thirst is nothing. Obey humanity."

"Penchant" is a more mid-paced song than the others on the CD. It's all about Jiffy Boy's favorite pastime. Drinking, that is. It's a poppy, catchy tune that will get you out of your seat and bopping along.

The lyrics lift a quote from Dick Lucas, vocalist for the Subhumans and Citizen Fish. That's a good thing to do.

"Tuff Song" definitely fits its title. It's tough, that's for sure. It doesn't even sound like them. It sounds more like something Grimple or Logical Nonsense would do with its fast, crust punk attack. It's an anti-organized-religion song as well.

The vocals sound nothing like Balsiger at the beginning or end, but they do in the middle with the melodic breakdown. "Reverend" Jed Eropkin's drumming is at light speed.

The song "Obvious" is a leftover from Jiffy Boy's early days as a band. It's a straight-up pop-punk song with awesome sing-along choruses. I guarantee the choruses will stick in your head for days after hearing this song just once.

I liked the stop-start rhythms and pick slides throughout the song.

"Obvious" provides a nice contrast with the rest of the album. Its silly lyrics are all about meaning nothing, while the other six songs on the CD have meaning.

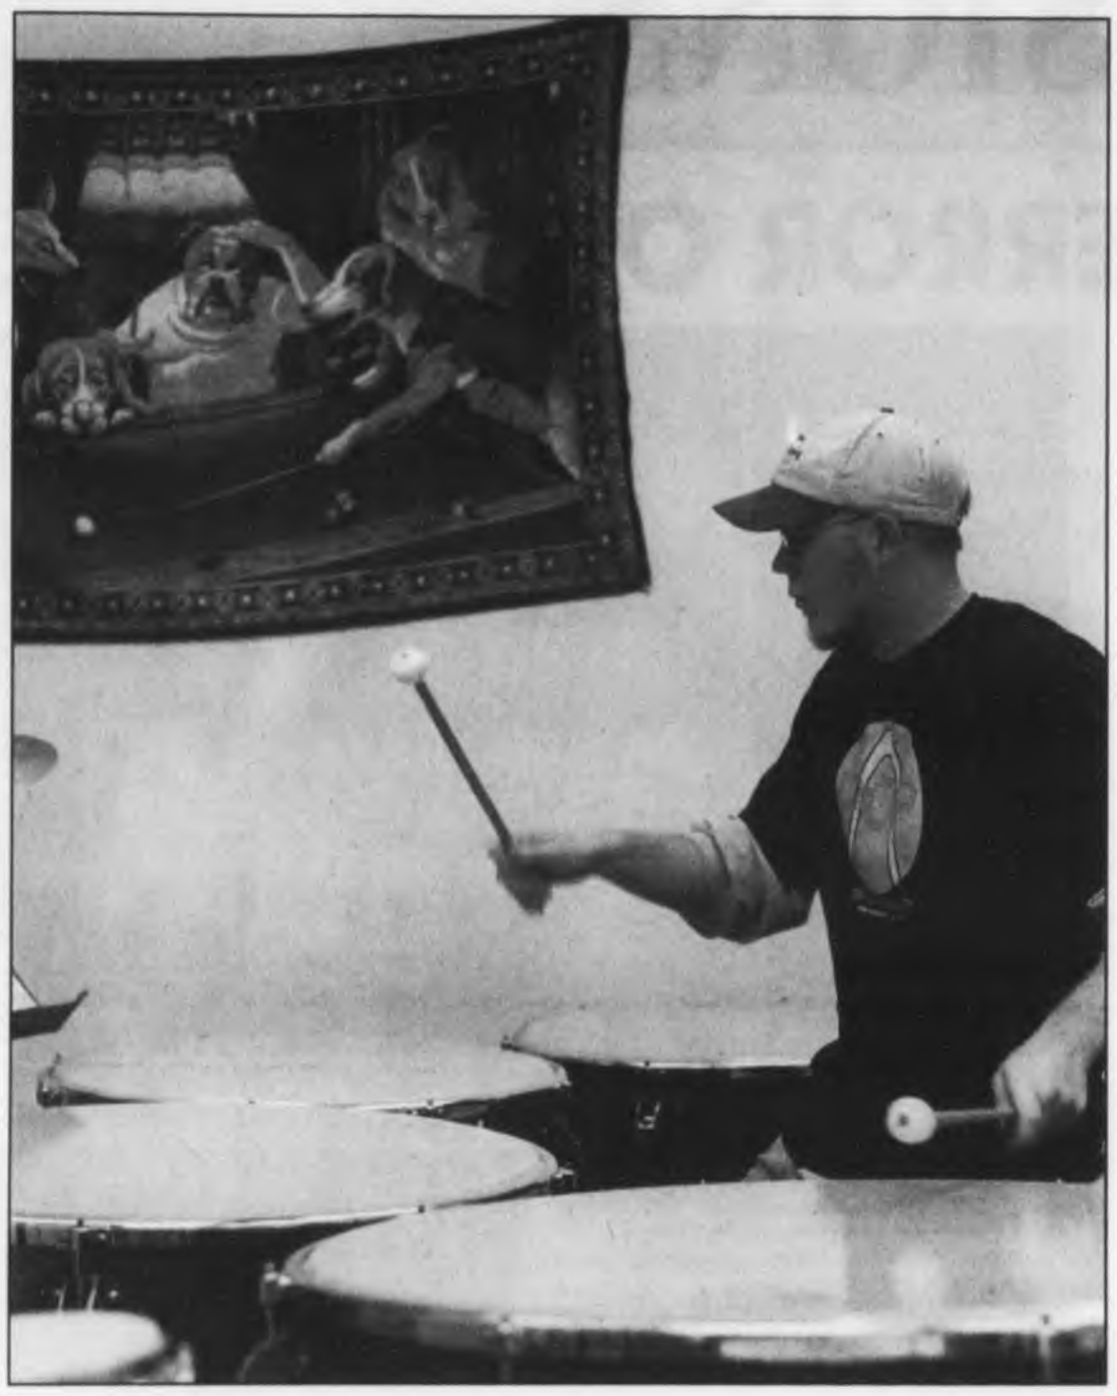
"Yo Hablo, No Tengo, No Se" closes out the CD with its powerful ranting about the evils of racism and ethnocentrism.

The title is Spanish for "I speak, I don't have, I don't know."

Yet again, the chorus will stick in your head. You'll be singing "I don't want it. You can have it. You can take it. Take it all away" for days.

I also liked the dueling guitar riffs between Sturgell and rhythm guitarist Marc Johnson and the galloping bass line provided by Griffin.

My only complaint with this CD is it is way too short. There's only seven songs and it lasts about 20 minutes. I want more Jiffy Boy, dammit.



Support your scene. Buy this CD. Go see Jiffy Boy live.

Committee plans trip to DC

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

K-State Governmental Relations Committee members would like to try to advance the K-State agenda by taking a trip to Washington, D.C., the committee chair said.

"It is an overall attempt to broaden government issues at the state level," chair Patrick Carney said. "We already take a great interest in local issues and want to broaden it to the federal level."

Carney said the trip is still in the preliminary stages of planning.

If it is approved it will take place in fall, said Elizabeth Gregory, committee member.

Elizabeth Gregory

Carney said he thought the resources for the trip would come from the Student Governing Association, other groups or students attending.

Gregory said the committee decided not to present its proposal to Senate this semester because committee members wanted to look for alternative forms of funding.

"With the mood of Senate, we knew we wouldn't get the funding and we would have to go to outside sources," she said. "None of us had the time to look into that, so we will consider it again next year."

Student leaders have gone previously to discuss issues with Kansas senators, Carney said. If the trip is approved, student leaders will meet with U.S. senators Sam Brownback, R-Kan., and Pat Roberts, R-Kan., to discuss issues faced by K-State.

"I think it's important for the Governmental Relations Committee to interact with all levels of government," said Greg Cleaver, committee member. "It is much easier to interact on the local and state levels, but from time to time, we need to go and speak with federal leaders as well."

Carney said there is a great deal of interest now with President Clinton's focus on Federal Grant Loans and the reauthorization of the National Education Act.

The initiative is to be taken by K-State to go and speak with the leaders, Cleaver said.

"We will be discussing K-State issues because that is who we are here to represent," Cleaver said.

Gregory said she feels the focus would be trying to get legislators to understand what college students want.

"They make a lot of decisions regarding what issues concern students in higher education," she said. "Many of them have been out of college for at least 10 years. They make a lot of decisions that affect us, and we want them to know our concerns."

The number of students to attend has not yet been set, but Carney said two to six might go. Cleaver said the likely attendants would be the governmental relations chair, student body president and Senate chair.

"A few of the more prominent student leaders would be going to touch base with the federal leaders," Cleaver said.

Students can beat holiday weight gain

KRISTIN BOYD
staff writer

Resisting food during the holiday season can be difficult. The Kansas Department of Health and Environment and dietitians say there are ways to win the battle of the bulge this season.

Amy Huelle, dietitian at Lafene Health Center, said the average person usually gains seven to 10 pounds during the holiday season.

"The main reason students gain weight is because they are around certain foods only once a year, so they think it is OK to eat them. It is OK to eat them, but you don't have to pig out on them," Huelle said.

Huelle also said it is important for students not to skip meals during the holidays.

"The best advice I can give to students is for them to not say to themselves 'I am not going to eat all day and then save it up for one huge meal.' Usually, they gorge out and have a tendency to overeat," Huelle said.

Huelle said students should try to maintain good nutrition during the Christmas season as well as every day.

"Students should to try to eat a balanced meal that includes milk and fruit. The important thing is to exercise, even if you are just Christmas caroling," Huelle said.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment offers these healthy habits to follow during the holiday season:

- Be prepared. Enjoy a small snack such as a dinner roll or an apple before leaving home to curb your pre-party appetite.
- Socialize. Because it's rude to talk with your mouth full, avoid the buffet table, and participate in a variety of conversations.
- Indulge yourself occasionally. Cookies and candies are important holiday traditions. Enjoy small portions and balance them with low-fat items.
- Cut down on fat in recipes by substituting applesauce or dried fruit puree for oil.
- Take walks with the visiting family members or friends. Include dancing in your plans. Park far from the stores and walk to shop whenever possible.
- Know when to say no. Listen to your body. If you're full and you're offered another helping or a drink, politely decline. Compliment the host on the first serving.

K-STATE FOOTBALL COACH BILL SNYDER laughs during a press conference Sunday at Vanier Football Complex. It was officially announced Sunday that the Wildcats will play in the Fiesta Bowl on Dec. 31 in Tempe, Ariz.

K-State gets 1st ever Alliance bid to Fiesta Bowl in Arizona

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Those watching ESPN's Alliance Bowl show at 3 p.m. Sunday heard it first — K-State will make its first-ever appearance in an Alliance Bowl on Dec. 31, when the No. 9 Wildcats meet the No. 14 Syracuse Orangemen in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

Fiesta Bowl executive director John Junker announced to ESPN broadcasters Chris Fowler, Lee Corso and Kirk Herbstreit — as well as the ESPN viewing audience — the bowl committee's reasons for choosing K-State.

Junker said the football team is one of the few in the top 10 with a 10-1 record, and it has a tremendous fan base that he hopes will follow it to Tempe, Ariz. Coach Bill Snyder said he talked to Junker for the first time at about 2 p.m. Sunday and was not surprised by the invitation.

"I've known for some time that barring any change of heart, this would be the probable choice," Snyder said.

A change of heart might have occurred if No. 2 Nebraska or No. 3 Tennessee, the Orange Bowl's projected selections, had lost their respective conference championships Saturday. Nebraska won its game handily, defeating No. 20 Texas A&M 54-15. But Tennessee scraped by Auburn, coming from behind to win 30-29. However, the outcome of the SEC Championship game didn't worry Snyder.

"I didn't believe it would affect us," Snyder said. "I didn't watch the ball game, and I didn't know when the lead changed."

ESPN's Fowler did a satellite interview with Snyder after the announcement, pointing out K-State's weaker non-conference schedule and suggesting the country would be introduced to the Cats for the first time in this Alliance Bowl game. Fowler suggested this game would be the Cats' first experience in a big-time, nationally televised game.

Davis arrested for DUI

senior staff writer

Duane Davis, who has been the starting point guard this year on the K-State basketball team, was arrested early Sunday morning for DUI.

Davis

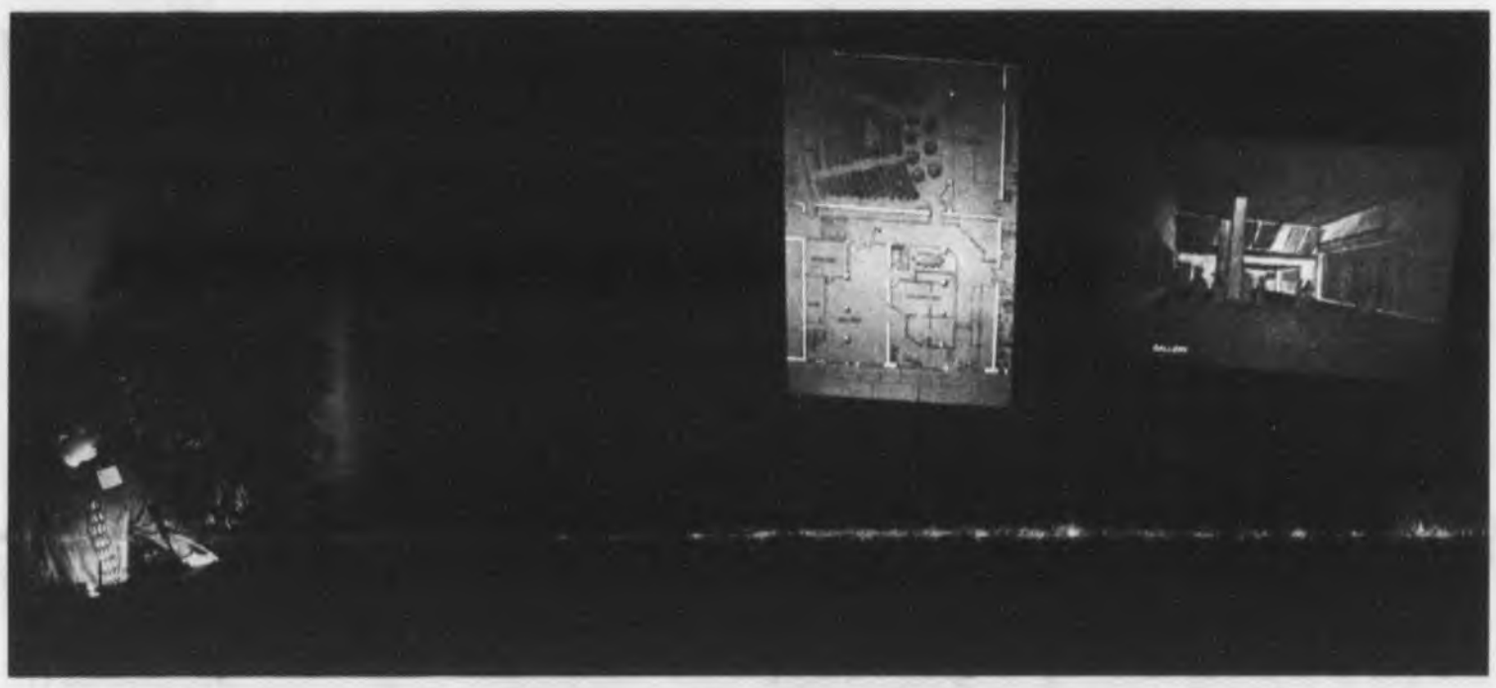
Sgt. Kurt Moldrup said Officer Jack Boggs pulled Davis over on North Manhattan Avenue at 2:07 a.m. for allegedly driving 51 in a 30 mph zone.

Moldrup said after Boggs pulled Davis over, Boggs asked him to take a breath test, and Davis refused the test.

Davis was then arrested for DUI and issued a citation for refusing the test. He was also issued citations for speeding and driving on a restricted license.

Moldrup said Davis was asked to take another breath test later, but refused the second test also.

Davis' bond was $1,000. Bond for a DUI is usually $500, and Moldrup said though he couldn't say exactly when it was, Davis must have had a previous DUI conviction at some time within the past five years.



Moldrup said Davis has a date set for a first appearance in front of a judge, but couldn't say what the date was. He said if convicted, Davis could have his license suspended for one year.

Kent Brown, director of Sports Information, said he hadn't heard about Davis' arrest, but said whether Davis is punished if convicted is up to Coach Tom Asbury.

"That would be a team disciplinary matter between the coach and the player," he said.

Davis sat out the 1996-97 season after coming to K-State under NCAA rules, and has three years of eligibility left at K-State.

Attempts to reach Davis by telephone were made, but he was unavailable for comment.

JEFF MEYER, fifth-year senior in interior architecture, describes the slides dealing with one of six theater restoration projects proposed by K-State students. The proposals are made by students in Jim Dubois' fifth-year interior architecture studio.

Students focus on restoring theaters

The show must go on.

That theatrical adage has inspired several Kansas towns and cities to begin restoration projects on theaters and opera houses that have been under-used or dormant for decades.

On Saturday, students of Jim Dubois' fifth-year interior architecture studio presented their semester projects, each of which focused on proposals for rehabilitating six historic Kansas theaters. The presentations, followed by an awards luncheon, created a time for students to reflect and talk with design professionals and theater representatives about their projects.

The projects ranged from such large theaters as the Jayhawk Theatre in Topeka to the Grainfield Opera House in western Kansas. In some cases, students were working within distinct parameters and with specific objectives. In other cases, as in Grainfield, the field was left open for a new vision.

Melissa Sturgeon, fifth-year senior in interior architecture, said this was the first project she's done in historic preservation. She developed a scheme for the Jayhawk Theatre, working independently in a group of three other students working on the same theater.

"We can really see this project is going to be built," Sturgeon said. "I'm excited to see what's going to be done."

Sturgeon said the main thrust of the project entailed establishing a program, which requires a demographic study, site information, history, an existing conditions study, code and regulation research, and project goals.

"We tried to focus most of our time on the design," she said.

In the next two weeks, the students will create a cost estimate and then present their designs to the proponents of the various theaters.

Doug Jernigan, a Topeka veterinarian and a board member of the Jayhawk, said the students have been a big help with the project.

"The big advantage is they don't come in with any of the perceived realities of the project," Jernigan said. "They can see things with a fresh perspective. The second advantage is it's fun."

The Jayhawk, which opened in 1926, has a rich history including performances by Laurel and Hardy, the debut of Gypsy Rose Lee, and several political announcements, including Alf Landon's presidential bid. The adjacent Jayhawk Towers is a Topeka landmark, having been among other things the site of Jim Slattery's announcement for his bid for governor in 1994.

Jernigan, who is a 1970 K-State graduate, said the board hoped to use the students' work to show the mayor's office, the Jayhawk's downtown neighbors and the Topeka media the ins and outs of the project goals. He said a significant fund-raising campaign will not begin until six or eight months down the road.

Campus planners takes new angle with forum

The title of K-State's new capital projects master plan, "Campus Planning: People, Principles, and Process," perhaps best reveals the new direction campus planning is taking.

In the past, the process could sometimes be a confusing web of deans' council meetings, administrative decisions, facilities planning, departmental projects and a few student leader sessions. Now campus-planning leaders have set a new course with the introduction of campus forums on university projects.

The first forum is from 3:30 to 5 p.m. Tuesday in Kedzie 106. The forum will begin with an introductory presentation by Dick Hayter, chairman of the Campus Development Committee and associate dean of engineering for external affairs.

Hayter said the forum will be a time to explain how K-State goes about making changes to buildings and the campus and also to solicit suggestions for progress.

"The purpose is to let people know that this process is a public one," Hayter said. Hayter served seven years on the Manhattan Regional Planning Board as well as the City Commission.

Helen Cooper, assistant director of facilities planning, said the forum is only one of the committee's first steps in developing a more comprehensive planning process.

For the past three years, the committee, which met Thursday to shore up details for Tuesday's forum, has been writing a master plan. The committee plans for that document, the one that now stresses people, principles and process in its title, to be finished and distributed by the end of the academic year.

"This particular document, rather than a coffee-table document, we pretty much want to be alive," Cooper said. "It should be a stable document, not a static one."

Cooper stresses, as does Hayter and Director of Facilities Planning Jerry Carter, that the committee didn't want to create a map of campus development, but a new philosophy.

"Some of these things we have been doing forever. It's just putting them down on paper," Cooper said. "It also builds on previous planning documents."

The full development of the document has been delayed at least a year, because the development committee concentrated its efforts on crumbling classrooms projects last year. Those projects are the smaller ones occurring in nearly every corner of the campus, such as the current project of adding an elevator to Kedzie Hall.

K-State student receives Rhodes Scholarship

staff writer

Jonathan Winkler, a senior in physics, mathematics and English, is the sixth K-State student to be named a Rhodes Scholar since 1986.

Winkler

Winkler was one of only 32 Rhodes Scholars selected nationwide. The scholarship allows the opportunity for two years of study at Oxford University and is valued between $40,000 and $60,000.

Criteria for the award include scholarship, leadership, service and a minimum grade point average of 3.75.

In a press release issued Saturday by News Services, Beth Powers, K-State scholarship adviser, said, "I'm really delighted for Jonathan. He has distinguished himself in all three of his majors. I am thrilled that he is going to have the opportunity to study at Oxford."

Winkler was named a 1995 Goldwater Scholarship winner and received the Clark M. Brink Essay Prize in 1994. He has also been the recipient of several scholarships through the KSU Foundation, including the Lois Holderbaum Scholarship, the Basil and Mary Curnette Scholarship, the Friends of Mathematics Scholarship and the KSU President's Scholarship.

An honor roll student throughout his college career, Winkler is also active as webmaster of the Physics Club and as secretary of the College of Arts and Sciences honors council. Other campus involvements include Math Club, K-State Classical Society and the K-State Atomic Physics Group.

Winkler served as an intern at Duke University/North Carolina Engineering Research Center for Emerging Cardiovascular Technologies as well as a summer researcher at the NASA Goddard Space Flight Center.

He is employed by the Collegian as a columnist.

"All of us at K-State are thrilled that Jonathan Winkler, a K-State senior from Wichita, Kansas, has won the Rhodes Scholarship," said President Jon Wefald, in a News Services press release. "This is an extraordinary event for Kansas State University because the Rhodes is quite possibly the premier scholarship that an undergraduate can win in the United States today."

NAACP award winner donates anti-slavery books to library

staff reporter

The 1997 winner of the Kansas Chapter of the NAACP Community Service Award has made his mark.

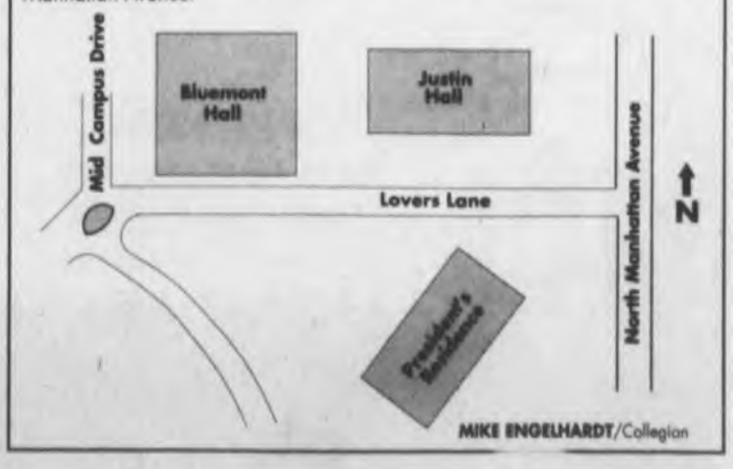
Richard Scott Price, a Fort Riley community relations officer and local military historian, has given Hale Library nearly 100 books to begin an anti-slavery collection.

"After having a heart attack last May, I had time to consider how I wanted to be remembered," Price said. "I had all these books that I had been collecting since I was young, but no one could get their hands on them."

Price first offered the collection to the Kansas State Historical Society twice during the past two years, but he never received a response.

Still looking for a home for his collection, he decided to try again in Kansas before sending them east.

"I contacted John Fairman, K-State's vice president for university relations, and I offered the collection to the library. In less than 24 hours the books were transferred to Hale," Price said.



Excited by the collection's new home, Price said he believes it was important to keep the books in Kansas and for students to have access to them.

"This collection needs to be where young men and women can read them.

Weekend fires kill 11 in Missouri
KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Seven relatives gathered for a birthday party were killed Friday in one of the worst residential fires in the city's history. Investigators said it could have been prevented if the smoke detectors in the house had had batteries.

Five other people in the house were injured.

Firefighters said the batteries had been removed from two smoke detectors in the small, two-story house.

Friday's fire started near a mattress just inside the front door and was reported by a neighbor at 5:41 a.m., Fire Department spokesman Brad Humston said.

One of the women was found dead downstairs near the front door. The four children and the second woman died upstairs, most likely from smoke inhalation, Humston said.

A man also died Friday evening at a hospital after suffering burns over 90 percent of his body.

Investigators had not determined the cause by Sunday.

In addition, an early-morning fire in Pineville, Mo., raced through a mobile home Saturday, killing a couple and two of their children. The couple's 8-year-old daughter escaped.

Firefighters arrived about 7:02 a.m. and found the father with his arms wrapped around the boy, about three feet from the back door, officials said.

The blaze apparently was sparked by a wood-burning stove in the front of the home, though the exact cause remained under investigation, authorities said.

Eight-year-old Kristlin Bratton escaped after her mother told her to go to a neighbor's house across the street and alert firefighters, authorities said.

'Twas the night before Christmas' manuscript sells for $211,500
NEW YORK — "Twas the night before Christmas" was on the block and all through Christie's auction house, big bidders were stirring, pushing up the price.

A handwritten, 1860 manuscript of the classic Clement Clark Moore poem drew a high bid of $211,500 Friday, going to buyers who immediately put it on display for Christmas.

The Moore manuscript went to dealers Joseph Maddalena and Seth Kaller, who put it on display for the holidays at Kaller's American Gallery, in Macy's Herald Square.

Justice Department presents case against Microsoft to district court
WASHINGTON, D.C. — It's now up to a federal judge to decide if Microsoft Corp. violated a consent decree by requiring computer makers that want to use its Windows operating system to accept its Internet browser as part of the package.

The Justice Department is seeking an unprecedented $1 million-a-day fine for continued violations.

Microsoft and the department argued their cases Friday before U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson, who adjourned the hearing in his crowded courtroom without ruling in the dispute.

The government has asked Jackson to rule quickly on whether Microsoft is in contempt of court for violating the 1995 agreement aimed at preventing anti-competitive practices.

Microsoft attorney Richard Urowsky denied that the Redmond, Wash.-based company is forcing computer makers to accept its Internet Explorer browser as part of its Windows 95 operating system. Instead, he said, the two systems are integrated and not separate programs that have been tied together.

Santa Claus impersonator steals undisclosed amount in robbery
IDAHO FALLS, Idaho — A man dressed as Santa Claus held up a bank, and police suspect he also might have called in a false bomb threat to a school as a diversion.

He hit the Bank of Commerce about 11:30 a.m. Friday, displaying a gun he had carried hidden in a manila folder, police Detective Ken Brown said.

Police wouldn't disclose how much money was taken. Witnesses gave conflicting accounts but authorities believe he fled the scene in a white car.

"No one was hurt except for a lot of nerves," said bank president Tom Romrell.

Minutes before the holdup, a caller said there were three bombs set to detonate at noon at Skyline High School, said school district spokeswoman Dorothy Mandiloff. The school, with 1,200 students, was evacuated for about an hour while police searched the building.

"It seems like it (bomb threat) was probably used as a hoax to draw police away from the area," Brown said.

IAN ANDERSON, senior in landscape architecture, discusses his design for Anderson Avenue expansion and K-State parking with Chip Winslow, professor of landscape architecture. The discussion took place in a display area in Seaton Hall as part of an open house.

Design students present plans for southwest corner of campus

senior staff writer

The southwest corner of the K-State campus has become one of the most hotly contested parcels of land in the city.

The city's plans to widen Anderson Avenue have resulted in some residents starting a campaign to stop it. Three years ago, Student Senate fought to keep the administration from planning a parking garage inside Memorial Stadium.

On Friday, students of Ken Brooks' fourth-year design studio in landscape architecture presented their final projects, which were master plans for the aforementioned land area, to a crowd of nearly 30 people.

Chad Goetz, senior in landscape architecture, said he and his classmates did not have the choice of whether to include a parking garage or an alumni center in their plans. As part of the project description, all of the master plans had to include the city's plans to widen Anderson, a parking garage and the alumni center.

Goetz said the current entrance to the university needs improvement.

"It doesn't present the appropriate image of the university," Goetz said. "There's just that one sign and then a sea of parking lots."

Goetz said the expansion of Anderson, which will remove the existing entrance, would be a good chance for the university to do something new.

Ian Anderson, senior in landscape architecture, said the existing situation needs work if the university is to build an alumni center there.

"Seventeenth and Anderson is considered to be the grand entrance to K-State, and obviously it's falling short," Anderson said.

Several students criticized the university's plans for a parking garage and the city's plans for Anderson, especially from a pedestrian perspective.

Kathy Kootz, fifth-year senior in landscape architecture, said she wouldn't like to see a parking structure placed on the parking lots south of the K-State Student Union.

"It would narrow that street down," she said. "However, in the light of progress, to get more people to K-State and to get more people from this area, you're going to have to accommodate this."

Daniel Siemsen, senior in landscape architecture, said the proposed turning-radius increase on Anderson to 45 feet and the increase in street width to 72 feet is unacceptable for pedestrians.

"That's ridiculous," Siemsen said. "I don't think they thought it out very well."

Many of the design proposals included skyways connecting a parking garage to the Union. Others connected the Union, a garage and the alumni center. Nearly all of them provided for more public and green space and an entrance gate feature.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, was on hand to view the student projects.

"I think there's some nice concepts," Taussig said. "This is essentially the main entrance to the campus because of the location of the Student Union there. In that way it is very significant. The university will want to give it a grandiose image."

At this point, the student projects and any plans by the university are just talk. The city has made some concessions to the university, such as rebuilding a limestone wall and moving campus gates when it widens Anderson.

Brooks said the drawings will be made available to the city manager's staff and to K-State facilities staff.

"One of the reasons we think this is useful to do project work is that it gives the public decision-makers a chance to see things without having to commit themselves one way or another," Brooks said. "It's a safe way to view ideas.

"We hope over time good ideas begin to influence and educate decision-makers to pursue these intelligent kinds of projects."

PLANNING

Carter, also the university architect, said the document will probably be a draft its entire life. He said the document would be provided to architects and designers working on campus so they would understand the distinct design approach the campus has set for itself.

The document reads like a visionary executive summary — a map of words that lays groundwork for smarter, not necessarily more, development.

The scope of the document, which is still just a draft and has not been made available to the public at large, is written to be "not a preconceived, idealized, finalized statement of a future campus. Rather, it promotes a methodology for becoming aware of the whole canvas that is our University while anticipating building enhancements which reinforce and complete the essence of an ever changing University."

The document also lays out broad principles to guide future development, such as preserving "comfortable, friendly and close clustering of buildings while maintaining the openness of our pioneer heritage." It addresses four significant components of the campus: buildings, open space/land use, circulation/parking and utilities/infrastructure.

It further stresses a promotion of new technology, teaching and research methods, and continuing opportunities for change and innovation.

Some of the document's points might be fairly obvious, such as the need for buildings to respect the scale of the campus, value the need for green space, preserve historical features and landmarks and to meet codes or standards for comfort, safety and accessibility. However, never before have these considerations been included in such a broad document and recognized as a master plan for campus.

"My predecessors never produced a codified document," Carter said. "There were planning guidelines and principles the committee had reasonably communicated, but had never written down. We reconstituted the Campus Development Committee and worked over the past three years to take a lot of these ideas and develop this document. With Dick's help, we've really made a push to get things finished."

The Collegian editorial board has criticized the planning process in the past, particularly pointing out a sometimes apparent lack of widespread student involvement in campus construction projects. However, the feedback from faculty and students in past years has not been ignored by campus planners in the development of this document and the forum.

"What we haven't had in the past is an aggressive role in seeking input from the students, faculty and staff," Carter said.

Tuesday's forum will be followed up this spring with another forum in March to discuss priorities. That is followed by the April or May submittal of the revised five-year capital improvement plans to the Kansas Board of Regents.

"In the spring term, I hope the committee can take this draft document and really begin to flesh out its goals and principles and really get into some detail," Carter said.

"I want to avoid the perception that Moses is going to come down from the mountaintop with a plan for the university," he said. "This is the university's plan for the university."

FIESTA

Snyder mentioned playing in the nationally televised Cotton Bowl, as well as the fact that unfortunately the Nebraska game received national attention.

"It just tells me that Chris Fowler doesn't know much about Kansas State," Snyder said. "Obviously, somebody out there knows we're here."

No. 5 UCLA and No. 7 North Carolina were left out of the Alliance Bowl picture, and Snyder said playing in the Big 12 Conference fell in K-State's favor.

"We played in a conference that plays against five top-25 teams," Snyder said. "Not that North Carolina is not deserving of an alliance bid, because they are."

The other concern at the moment is the thought that the well-traveling Cat fans might be the reason K-State received the invitation.

"I know that that perception is out there," Snyder said. "We have great fan support, and I'm proud of it. The way I see it, it's up to us to prove we're worthy of our bowl game."

The Cats are getting ready to do so. The team practiced Tuesday through Friday last week and Sunday, drilling fundamentals. The team will start breaking down Syracuse's team this week.

"I was at home on Thanksgiving break and I watched the Syracuse/Miami game," senior left tackle Todd Weiner said. "I was impressed with what I did see."

Weiner is from Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and grew up watching the Big East teams such as Syracuse and Miami.

"They're a team that plays hard, and they're on an eight-game win streak," Weiner said.

The Orangemen, 7-0-1 in their past eight bowl games, are also competing in their first Alliance Bowl.

"From what we know, they're big up front, with good team speed, and they run to the ball and make plays on defense," senior running back Eric Hickson said. That's the tip of the iceberg concerning what the Cats need to learn about the Orangemen. And on Tuesday, the Cats begin that learning process.

THE FIESTA BOWL
The official announcemen was made on Sunday. Now don't miss the rest. Get th eight-page special section or Wednesday in the Collegian.

"We're always working on getting better," Weiner said. "Bowl-game preparation gives us a great opportunity to do that."

Architecture students help Kansas' struggling art image

It's the end of the year and students are busily finishing up class projects they have put off all semester.

Not so with fifth-year interior architecture students in Jim Dubois' design studio. They've been working on proposals for renovating six historic Kansas theaters since the beginning of the semester.

On Saturday morning, the students presented their projects to friends and representatives of the theaters. In a week, the students will take their projects to the theaters' cities and present them to townspeople and potential benefactors.

This project, called "Renewing Historic Kansas Theaters," is being done in cooperation with the Kansas Preservation Alliance and the Kansas Chapter of the League of Historic American Theaters. And it is an excellent example of how the world of academia can have a positive influence on Kansas.

Many of these grass-roots theater projects needed an extra boost to get townspeople interested and willing to commit time and money. To now have visual representation of how the theaters would appear if restored will help kick start larger fundraising campaigns to help the theaters realize their former glory.

Grand old dames such as Topeka's Jayhawk Theatre and the Spanish colonial revival whimsy of Emporia's Granada Fox Theatre need to be acknowledged as significant contributors to the state's cultural livelihood.

As Kansans — residents of a particularly picked-on state in the Union when it comes to high art — we often forget we have an enormous cultural heritage. This is mainly because we have not preserved it.

It's encouraging to see young Kansans, especially K-Staters, contributing to the betterment of the state. We also salute President Jon Wefald for recognizing the importance of this project and offering to fund Saturday's luncheon and three student design awards given by a jury.

With visionaries like Dubois and his students, towns across Kansas can hope to reclaim their pasts while firmly planting their feet in a creative future.

Commonality, not differences, causes separation between campus groups

VIEWPOINT
MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu

Sometimes, if you close your eyes, the world makes more sense.

While I was walking through the Stateroom in the K-State Student Union with a friend, he asked me an interesting question. "Why do the black students sit together here?" No one had ever just come right out and asked before, even though I am sure almost everyone has noticed. I admit I have noticed a number of black students usually sit together in a particular place in the Stateroom. But I didn't have an answer as to why.

Not knowing why bothered me for quite some time. Is the seating voluntary segregation? Is it some kind of involuntary segregation? Just the thought of the "s" word made me nervous. The "s" word always leads down a path to another more uncomfortable word — racism. My mind ran through a number of possible reasons.

Maybe this seating is a result of racism of other students. The other, namely white students, in the area are unwelcoming of black students and they are forced to sit apart.

Maybe it is racism of black students. Those black students are purposely separating themselves from other students because they feel they are superior.

Maybe it is tradition. Black students have always sat in that section of the Stateroom. But that train of thought brought me back to the racism of other students and had me running on the assumption that white students would have shunned black students in the past.

Then one day while leaving the Stateroom with the habitual biscuits and gravy, I stopped to talk to some friends of mine sitting together. After a few words of conversation, the answer to why hit me.

All of my friends at the table happened to be liberals. You can't tell by looking at them, but every one of them voted for Democrats in the past elections. All of them are pro-choice. All of them support women's equality. All of them think Jesse Helms is evil.

A table or two away was occupied by seven women, all members of the same sorority. You couldn't tell at first glance. But upon closer inspection, you could see the jackets from this year's Homecoming. They spoke a foreign tongue of Greek letters. Eavesdropping, I could tell they were talking about an upcoming formal something or other.

A few tables behind me, I could make out the conversation of a bunch of computer science majors. They spoke in a language all their own I recognized only from conversations overheard in the basement of Nichols Hall and my fiance's mumbling in his sleep.

And there, at the tables in the corner by the exit, was a group of black students. They were laughing, talking and studying like everyone else in the room. For a moment, I closed my eyes. I swear to the gods, I closed my eyes.

I could hear the distinctly different conversations of the computer science guys, the sorority women and my friends (who at this point thought I was losing my mind, standing in the middle of the Stateroom with my eyes closed). I could pick out each group. They all had something in common.

Black students who sit together in the Stateroom aren't segregating themselves or being segregated by others. They are sitting with people they have something in common with. We all chose to be with people we have something in common with. The difference is when the "thing" a particular group has in common is something you think you can spot from a distance.

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

If a group of students gets together to study computer science or organize a political campaign and those students happen to be black — all we (white middle America) will see is a group of black students. That's racism, folks. It is making assumptions on the color of someone's skin and not being able to see anything else.

We notice black students because they look different than the white people we grew up with. We notice students with physical disabilities because they look different than most of the people we see day in and day out. We notice a gay couple in a grocery store because they aren't the man-woman couple we have seen all our lives.

I've been writing columns for two years, and after reading them over I have come across a theme. The moral of the story is everyone is unique yet we all have common wonderful, happy experiences. Find those things, laugh together and get over yourself.

Be happy and blessed be.

Campus sidewalks comparable to 'Gladiator' gauntlet

VIEWPOINT
CHRISTOPHER McLEMORE

CHRIS McLEMORE is a sophomore in political science and speech. You can send e-mail to Chris at clm1182@ksu.edu

Other college students have to worry about muggers, attackers and the occasional binge drinking while on campus.

Here at K-State we have other worries — our sidewalks.

There's nothing like my daily workout on the obstacle course we call campus. I feel like I have entered the "American Gladiators" gauntlet. I'm not faced by Nitro and Freeze, but rather Frisbee golfers, bicyclers and cutthroat "go-cart" operators. All are members of a dangerous gang that has been created to maul pedestrians as they leisurely walk on paths from class to class.

There's nothing that will lure a prospective student like suddenly becoming part of a bike path. And the learning environment is certainly fostered by maintenance crews putting around in off-road vehicles. Ah, the college life.

There's nothing more vexing in my cross-campus walk than getting the evil eye from some of our all-star university athletes. No, not the cross-country team, but the devoted Frisbee golf players. What have I done to prompt such frowns upon their faces?

Apparently, I'm the villian for walking through their "fairway." Let's just face it — between 12:20 and 12:30 on a Friday afternoon there will be people walking through your "course" using, dare I say, the sidewalk. Can we pencil this into the Frisbee golf etiquette book?

I'm sorry I'm using the concrete path between Anderson and Nichols halls, but that's just the way it is. What annoys me even further is the players' apparent possessive nature. I can be casually walking by a freshly thrown disc when the Frisbee equivalent of Tom Lehman screams out, "Don't touch that!"

First of all, this isn't the Frisbee golf "Skins game," and there isn't $60,000 riding on this hole. Second, I have no interest in your glow-in-the-dark WHAM-O. I might covet your wife, but never your Frisbee. Thanks.

Of course, this doesn't describe all the golf players on campus. Many are pleasant. I've even enjoyed a game or two myself. However, the diehards out there need to realize this is a "pedestrian-friendly" campus and it wasn't created explicitly for flying discs. Try the Wildcat Creek putt-putt course.

Another campus obstacle is the ever-present bicycler. I understand many of the cyclers are always in much more of a hurry than I, so I take kindly to being pushed out of the way by the front tire of a BMX.

Don't mind me.

I'm sure navigating through large crowds at high speeds is just a practice in two-wheeled dexterity, but most of us pedestrians can really do without it.

If it is really so important for you to risk the life and limbs of yourself and others please join the K-State bicycling team — a team that performed terrifically at a national competition. Bicycles definitely have a place on campus. That place, however, does not include my left foot or torso.

If cyclers would use some generosity (and most do) it would really help. No, the dismount zone is not where Mary Lou Retton practices getting off the uneven bars. It is a high-traffic area that would be a better place if all who entered would get off their bicycles.

Riding a bicycle on campus isn't bad. Riding that bicycle into people is. The distinction is huge.

Finally, what's the deal with the drivers of those wacky university go-carts? You know, those apparent maintenance vehicles that roam campus with an obvious vendetta. I thought crossing Anderson Avenue was dangerous. Now I've got to deal with vehicles on campus driven by those obviously suffering from road rage, and I don't even have the benefit of a crosswalk.

Speeding down the walkway in front of me is probably a fast way to get to your seemingly important destination. However, I happen to be walking here, guy.

I realize the land-speed record is now somewhere near 760 mph, but the sidewalk by Seaton Hall is not the appropriate place to let your itchy foot test the limits of your glorified golf cart. Moving about the campus in a more cautious manner would really help. Let's take the demolition derby somewhere else.

I don't mind Frisbees, bicycles or university vehicles. A problem arises when these items become obstacles (potentially injurious ones). A campus that has been self-dubbed a pedestrian-friendly campus should not assume that that role begins and ends with automobiles. This friendliness should extend beyond that.

We need to watch out for others, specifically our fellow students, on campus.

Spread the love folks, and while you're at it, keep the Frisbees to yourself.

Students should not be charged for doctor visits

Editor,

I'd like to address some issues regarding the Student Health Fee. Surveys show the majority of students use Lafene Health Center and find its services satisfactory and necessary.

Lafene also provides exemplary services in comparison with its peers, as verified by its professional accreditation board.

Lafene should have the resources to continue to provide quality services benefiting the student body. In order to do so, the Student Health Fee must increase. This is a natural result of inflation and equipment needs. Keeping the fee the same as it is now actually means a decrease in Lafene's services.

Some student senators have proposed a $5 charge for doctor visits instead of raising the health fee. While $5 seems harmless now, there is more to this plan than meets the eye.

A charge for Lafene visits is a fundamental change in K-State's philosophy on access to student services. Five dollars could easily escalate to $10, $20 and $30. Eventually Lafene would be as expensive as a private doctor.

Sick students would no longer be able to afford care. Lafene would no longer be able to provide services. User fees should be researched comprehensively before being implemented.

We need to see what the long-term effects will be before we risk Lafene's financial stability and the health of students. Student senators should not follow the motto, "Cut fees now, research implications later." Call 532-6541 and find out the name of the senators from your college. Then call them and tell them how you feel before they place your vote on Thursday.

Holidays are prime time for college-age suicides

Editor,

Suicide is a national problem. With the coming holidays, we all need to be aware of the issue. For the 15-24 age group, suicide accounts for 14 percent of all deaths. This unthinkable action is the third-leading cause of death among college students.

In the past 35 years, the youth-suicide rate has tripled. For adolescent black males, suicide has increased 165 percent since 1980. Rates for children 10-14 years old has increased 120 percent.

Most suicidal people desperately want to live. They are just unable to see the alternatives to their problems. Understanding suicide must become a human priority. Many things about suicide are unknown. We have parents and children committing suicide. We have siblings committing suicide.

Treating suicide as a taboo or some strange enigma will not solve the problem. People should not feel ashamed to be suicidal. We cover up, hide and even deny friends or family who have taken their own lives.

Speaking of suicide from a casual distance has become common. When we don't get what we want, we say, "I could just kill myself." This acknowledges that the problem doesn't exist.

Suicide rates indicate our social problems. The increasing rates serve as a direct indicator of our social errors. Who are we leaving out and forgetting? Please be aware of how you treat the issue in your daily habits. You could save a life.

Farmers, researchers discuss sustainable agriculture

staff reporter

Agriculture that works within the ecological system is how agriculture can be viable in the long term, a rural sociologist said Saturday.

"Conventional agriculture isn't sustainable in the long run," said John Allen, rural sociologist from the University of Nebraska and a part-time rancher. He was the keynote speaker at the fourth annual Sustainable Agriculture Roundup.

As third-world nations move up the economic ladder, their use of non-replenishable resources, such as oil, becomes more intensive, eventually exhausting the supply. Allen said a low-input sustainable agriculture, replenishing nutrients in the land non-artificially, was an alternative.

Allen said conventional agriculture tries to control the system by replacing artificial resources with resources that could be produced on farms.

Agriculture is tending toward larger and more concentrated operations, so it is not ecologically friendly or economically viable in the long term because of the pull on resources. It also has negative social implications resulting from the mechanization of agriculture that doesn't require many people to run a farm, he said.

Sustainable agriculture differs from conventional methods in that it is a whole-farming approach that includes social, profit and environmental issues, Hans Kok, associate professor of agronomy, said.

An example of this type of agricultural practice would be fertilizing fields with manure instead of anhydrous liquid nitrogen.

"It is substituting management for inputs," Kok said.

Other examples include strictly controlling crop rotations or growing a variety of alternative crops, which, because of different growing seasons, would control weed growth.

People in sustainable agriculture also like a strong rural community's quality of life.

"They strongly believe communities need to survive and that they are an integral part," Kok said.

The sustainable agriculture concept is particularly strong in California and Wisconsin, Allen said. However, profitability will be the key if it is to grow.

"Entrepreneurs in sustainable agriculture will be successful if they pay attention to the market," he said.

"We need to think about market awareness," he told a group of farmers. "Identify where to sell products and make a profit."

"Forty percent of consumers are willing to pay to contribute to sustain a family farm," Allen said.

Kok agreed that sustainable agriculture's specialized product must find niche markets.

Agricultural profit margins also drive farms to become larger, making the small sustainable farm rely on creative marketing to survive.

One example of this is a program called Community Supported Agriculture in Lawrence. Consumers pay $200 to $300 to receive baskets of produce throughout the summer.

It supports moving back to self-sufficiency and supporting local agriculture, Kok said.

For selling large quantities, groups of sustainable agriculture growers such as Kansas Organic Producers in northeast Kansas formed to market soybeans and corn for the 30 to 40 producers and have done fairly well, said Mary Fund, communications director at the Kansas Rural Center.

Allen also suggested that land grant universities should put more money into exploring sustainable agriculture practices. However, he said that was unlikely because large companies wouldn't support the research.

The meeting was sponsored by the Kansas Rural Center, K-State and Heartland Sustainable Agriculture Network and was attended by 175 people. Kok said it brought research, extension and farmers together to discuss issues, network with people, and exchange information with one another and researchers.

Graduate's death inspires groups to help with bone-marrow drive

staff reporter

With just two tablespoons of blood, you could give someone hope.

If a donor's tissue matches someone who needs a bone-marrow transplant, the donation can give life.

Mike Meier, K-State graduate, needed a bone-marrow transplant. However, he died in 1992 because a compatible donor had not been found. In his memory, Meier's family set up a fund to allow more people to become donors.

The regular $45 needed for people to have their blood tested will not be underwritten. A bone-marrow drive in April will be fully funded by the Michael W. Meier Memorial Fund, said Heather Lansdowne, assistant director of alumni programs.

Lansdowne said the early stages of planning for the drive have just begun, but already about a dozen student groups are interested in helping with the drive.

She said these groups range from greek organizations to academic and service groups on campus. Members will help coordinate the drive, which includes the publicity before the drive and staffing the day of the drive.

By having their blood tested, students and members of the community will have their names put on a registry of possible donors. This doesn't mean they have to donate bone marrow if a match is found.

"Finding a match is very difficult," Lansdowne said. "When they find a match, you get called and asked. Then you have the opportunity to save someone's life."

Lansdowne said some ethnic groups are federally funded for the blood tissue test because of a shortage of registered donors. There is a greater need for donors who are American Indian, African-American, Asian Pacific Islander and Hispanic.

"There is a particular need for people in multicultural groups because these groups are under-represented in the community," she said. "They are more likely to find a match with certain biological groups who have the same characteristics."

COASTAL CAROLINA'S GREG SMITH, bottom, scrambles with K-State's Duane Davis for a loose ball Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. K-State defeated Coastal Carolina 101-72.

K-State shreds Coastal Carolina 101-72

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

On paper, the Wildcats were a better team than the Coastal Carolina Chanticleers. On the court, the Wildcats were a much better team than the Coastal Carolina Chanticleers.

The Cats played physical defense en route to a 101-72 victory over the Chanticleers.

It was the first time the Cats had reached the century mark since Dec. 2, 1995, when K-State defeated Marshall 106-88.

"We just ran our offense and took what their defense gave us," Coach Tom Asbury said. "I don't think it's a whole lot more complicated than offensive execution and making good decisions."

The Cats shot 33-of-50, or 66 percent from the field, and kept the Chanticleers to 33 percent shooting from the field. In the first half, the Cats set a K-State record for the highest field goal percentage in a half with 76.9 percent.

After starting the game on a seven-minute 23-4 run, the Cats never looked back.

Cat guard Ayome May got the ball rolling with a 15-foot jump shot from the corner a minute into the game.

At the 17-minute mark, Cat point guard Duane Davis hit the first of his six three-point shots of the game off a feed from Shawn Rhodes. A half-minute later, Davis again connected from behind the three-point line off a pass from Josh Reid to make the score 12-0.

> "I DON'T THINK WE COULD HAVE HAD DONE THIS KIND OF EFFORT LAST YEAR UNDER ANY SITUATION."
> • Tom Asbury, K-State head coach

Chanticleer forward Nigel Berghan scored his team's first points with a three-point shot 5 1/2 minutes into the game.

Cat forward Manny Dies made two three-point plays during the run. Both times he was fouled on the shot but got the ball to go in, and he sunk the ensuing free throws.

"Manny is finishing well," Asbury said. "He's doing much better than he had previously."

Coastal Carolina was down but not out as it stormed back with a three-minute 13-2 run in the first half.

Chanticleer center Brent Johnson grabbed an offensive rebound and put it in to start the run at the 13-minute mark.

With 10 minutes to go in the first half, Chanticleer center Marcus Stewart scored to make the score 25-17.

Dies answered with a shot from the paint, but the Chanticleer's Berghan came right back and hit a three that pulled his team within seven.

On the Cats' next possession, Davis made another three-point shot to make the score 30-20, and the Cats kept a double-digit lead for the rest of the contest.

The Cats had a 57-39 lead at halftime.

Davis scored 26 points off six-of-six shooting from behind the three-point line, seven-of-eight from the field and six-of-seven from the free-throw line. The six-of-six shooting from three-point range was a K-State record for the highest three-point percentage in a game. Steve Henson had the previous record with five-of-six three-point shots

UCLA hardly hottest team in country now

Dec. 7. The Day.

Forget about that freezing thing, God loved Kansas on Sunday.

As if you didn't already know, but what a great day Sunday was, perhaps the greatest day in the history of sports.

Chiefs win, Broncos lose, Kansas loses at basketball and UCLA gets shut out of the alliance. Not that there's a big K-State-UCLA rivalry, but with all the trash-talking going on this week, you just have to hate California.

Oh yeah, and there's that thing about the Wildcats spending some time this winter in the desert.

Sure, it's old news by now, but the Cats will spend a week in Arizona, playing in the Tosititos Fiesta Bowl.

For once, K-State finally got what it deserves — an Alliance Bowl berth.

VIEWPOINT

SAM FELSENFELD

SAM FELSENFELD is a senior in print journalism. You can send your e-mail to Sam at sef8701@ksu.edu

And no, the fans didn't get the Cats there — the players did.

The only people who almost kept the Cats out of the alliance were the news media. Not me, but everybody else who's anywhere near a coast and pushed for 9-2 UCLA over 10-1 K-State, which makes keeping the Bruins out of the alliance almost as sweet as going to the Fiesta Bowl.

• The media said UCLA should have gone to an alliance game because they're the hottest team in the country.

No, not totally true. The Cats won their last game, 28-3, while the Bruins only managed a 31-24 victory.

Edge, not UCLA.

• But what they really mean is UCLA is the hottest team in the country because of its nine-game winning streak.

No, not totally true. Michigan is riding an 11-game winning streak, while Nebraska is 12-0 this season. The Cornhuskers actually have a 13-game streak dating back to last season.

Edge, not UCLA.

• But UCLA only lost to really good teams.

Well, OK. It lost to No. 7 Washington State and No. 3 Tennessee, not too bad. Of course, that's not quite as impressive as K-State's one loss, which came to the No. 2 Huskers.

Edge, not UCLA.

• But UCLA is winning much more impressively than any other team considered for an at-large alliance berth.

No, not totally true. During the past nine games, UCLA's so-called "hot streak," the Bruins have outscored their opponents by an average of 43-17. K-State, in its past nine games, which includes a blowout loss to Nebraska, has outscored its opponents by an average of 35-15.

Close — 43-17 to 35-15 — especially considering the Bruins score their points in the WAC-10, airing the ball out against thin defenses, while the Cats play in the Big 12, a lower-scoring, power-running conference. Take away the loss to Nebraska and the Cats average 36 points a game while holding opponents to less than 10 points.

Edge, not UCLA.

• But UCLA is playing against tougher competition.

No, not totally true. Sure, Washington is a decent team. The Huskies are ranked No. 23. But of all the teams the Bruins have faced in the past nine games, only the Huskies are in the polls right now. Meanwhile, the Cats' opponents in the past nine weeks included No. 2 Nebraska, No. 19 Texas A&M and No. 20 Missouri.

Edge, not UCLA.

• But UCLA is ranked No. 5 in the polls.

Oh sure, those voters know what they're doing. Before the season, the same sports writers put Notre Dame, Texas and Miami in the top 10, left Michigan out of the top 15 and some even voted Colorado No. 1 — pretty smart.

Meanwhile coaches, who put in long days and don't focus on teams they're not preparing for or those outside their conference, honestly admit they don't know enough about all the teams to accurately vote.

Edge, playoff system.

• But No. 5 must be good for something.

What do you want, an ice cream cone? A sticker? A new toy?

• But UCLA must be hotter than K-State somehow.

OK, OK. At the time of the announcement, it was 32 degrees in Manhattan — freezing. The forecast in Los Angeles on Sunday was for a high of 64, definitely hotter. But that's not good enough for one of the two at-large alliance bids.

The University of Miami had a high of 69 degrees Sunday, definitely hotter than UCLA. And beating them both was a school that reached 78.

Edge, Hawaii.

CATS FALL IN FINAL OF TOURNEY

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

When a basketball team plays host to an early-season tournament, the host can usually take the championship to the bank.

But when one of the opposing teams is coming off a conference title, an NCAA Tournament bid and is 3-0 entering the tournament, that championship is no sure thing.

On Saturday, the K-State women's basketball team couldn't take a win to the bank in the third annual Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic, falling to Utah 68-57 in the championship game.

Utah advanced to the championship game by overcoming a 26-23 halftime deficit in its first-round game vs. Wisconsin-Green Bay. The Utes shot only 34.5 percent from the field, but took advantage of 16 second-half free throws to win 61-55. Utah guard Julie Krommenhoek, tournament MVP, contributed 25 points toward the victory.

K-State advanced to the finals by dismantling Southern A&M 82-38 Friday night. The Wildcats used a 21-0 run interrupted by halftime to coast to victory. K-State outscored Southern 47-17 in the second half.

Six Wildcats scored in double-figures for K-State, led with 17 points by center Angie Finkes. The Cats shot 59.3 percent for the game, holding the Lady Jaguars to 21.6 percent from the field.

"We played very well tonight on both ends of the floor," K-State coach Deb Patterson said. "Tonight, we came out and took care of our responsibilities and executed very well on the offensive end of the floor and good things happened."

Wisconsin-Green Bay kept Southern to 17.4-percent shooting, four field goals and 11 points in the first half to cruise to a 71-44 win in the consolation game.

The championship game between K-State and Utah was closely played for most of the contest. Neither team led by more than six points in the first half, and Ute guard Tiana Fuertes nailed a three-pointer as time expired in the half to knot the score at 29 going into the break.

"I think it gave them a lot of momentum and confidence going

Volleyball team falters in 1st round of NCAAs

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

In any given tournament, half of the participating teams lose in the first round. K-State's volleyball team fell victim to this rule in the NCAA Tournament, losing to the University of San Diego 3-1 at the Lyon Center in Los Angeles.

The No. 23 Toreros took off to a fast start, taking an 8-1 lead in game one. The Wildcats, however, responded to score 10 consecutive points. K-State took the first game 15-11, led by outside hitter Dawn Cady's 10 kills.

The teams played the first game rather evenly, each hitting .245 for the game, although San Diego made 10 hitting errors to K-State's seven.

San Diego got off to a fast start in game two as well. The Toreros jumped out to a 5-0 lead to start the game, but K-State battled back to trail 6-4. The Toreros again went on a 5-0 run to take an 11-4 lead. The Cats earned three points on a service rally by middle blocker Kelle Branting, but that was as close as they would get, losing 15-10 to even the match at one game apiece.

The numbers were not as even in game two as they were in game one. San Diego hit .310 in the second game, while the Cats hit .217.

K-State started off the third game better than it had the first two. The Cats scored the first point of the game and were down 6-5 early, but San Diego scored seven points to lead 13-5. San Diego ended up winning the game 15-7 to take a 2-1 lead, hitting .244 to K-State's .095.

The Toreros used the momentum they had from winning games two and three by taking early 3-0 and 6-1 leads in game four. K-State was never closer than five points away from the Toreros from that point on and lost the game 15-6 to close out its season. The Cats made a match-high 11 attack errors in the game, hitting .079 to San Diego's .290 in the final game.

"I thought we were more consistent in the first game," setter Devon Ryning said. "We did the things we were supposed to do. In the last three games, we were definitely more sporadic and that hurt us in the long run."

K-State head coach Jim McLaughlin said San Diego's defense, which kept the Cats to a .171 attack percentage for the match, was the key to victory. The Toreros had 63 digs to K-State's 54.

"Give San Diego credit," McLaughlin said. "Their defense dug a lot of balls, and that frustrated us. But we still have to take care of things on our side of the net. They played well, but we were not consistent."

The loss ended the season for the Cats, and ended the collegiate career of K-State's two seniors, Ryning and defensive specialist Val Phillips.

Ryning had 50 assists for the match to end her career as K-State's all-time assist leader with 5,206. She is only the third player from any Big 12 school to have more than 5,000 career assists.

"Devon helped put this program on the map," McLaughlin said. "There's no way Kansas State is where it is today without her."

After reaching the NCAA Tournament for the second-consecutive year, the Cats ended the season with a 20-13 record, while San Diego improved to 26-4, advancing to a second-round matchup with No. 7 USC.

The Toreros took games one and two on USC's home court, but couldn't finish out the match. The Women of Troy won the final three games to advance to the regional semi-finals, where they will face Nebraska.

Of the other four Big 12 teams in the tournament, three remain. Texas A&M beat Hofstra and Michigan, and will face BYU in the next round. Colorado beat Tennessee Tech and is facing Oral Roberts, while Texas beat Steven F. Austin and South Carolina. Oklahoma lost to defending national champion Stanford in the second round after beating Houston.

Tracksters qualify for NCAA meet

Two K-Staters automatically qualified for the NCAA meet while two provisionally qualified at the KSU All-Comers meet Saturday. Junior Charles Burney won the high jump, with a career-best 7-4 1/2.

Junior Renetta Seiler took home first place in the women's weight throw, with an automatic NCAA qualifying mark of 67-4. Sophomore Nathan Leeper also recorded a provisional qualifying mark in the high jump, at 7-3.

Senior Vanitta Kinard leaped 41-9 3/4 in the triple jump, setting a meet record, as well as an NCAA provisional qualifying mark. Joining Kinard in setting a meet record was junior Kevin Lewis in the 1,000 meters with a time of 2:31:63.

Several other Wildcats took first in their events. Sophomore Zach Davies captured gold in the 3,000 with a time of 8:29:59. Coming off of her NCAA cross country appearance, freshman Annie Wetterhus captured the women's 3,000 meters with a time of 10:07:41.

against Vanderbilt on Dec. 10, 1988.

"I had some good looks because they had to guard my teammates," Davis said. "Early on in the year I was doing some of the intangibles. Today I did some of those things, and I scored."

Dies pitched in 25 points with seven-of-nine shooting from the field and 11-of-13 from the free-throw line. He also had five rebounds.

May finished with 10 points and three rebounds. Reid had four assists, seven rebounds and six points.

Although the Chanticleers shot only 33 percent from the field, they made 11-of-26 three-pointers for 42 percent.

"I think we can do a better job of defending, but we don't want to foul on a three," Asbury said. "A lot of times we've had our hands in our pockets when we're out there guarding at the three-point line."

Asbury might not have been entirely pleased with his team's defensive effort, but he said the offense has picked up considerably.

"We are improved offensively," he said. "I don't think we could have had done this kind of effort last year under any situation."

JAYHAWKS LOSE TO NO. 23 TERRAPINS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — It was hardly a recipe for an upset. Maryland blew a 15-point second-half lead, lost its two top players to fouls and didn't score a field goal in the last 4:10.

Yet the No. 23 Terrapins made seven-of-eight free throws in the final two minutes to beat No. 2 Kansas 86-83 on Sunday in the first round of the Franklin National Bank Classic.

Rodney Elliot had 21 points and 12 rebounds for Maryland (4-2), but fouled out with 3:58 to play. Laron Profit had 13 points, but was gone with 2:11 left. Sarunas Jasikevicius also had 21.

Paul Pierce overcame a bad ankle to lead Kansas (8-1) with 26 points, but he also fouled out. Raef LaFrentz had 24 points and 16 rebounds.

It is the first time in Roy Williams' 10 years at Kansas that the Jayhawks have failed to make the championship game of a holiday tournament.

The Kansas comeback was spearheaded by Pierce, who twice left the game limping after aggravating the sprained right ankle that caused him to miss the Jayhawks' last game. Pierce scored the three-pointer that tied the game at 78 with 2:58 to play, then fouled out with 1:30 left.

Obinna Ekezie made one-of-two to make the score 84-81, and Kansas' Ryan Robertson was wild with a three-pointer that would have tied it with 3.8 seconds left. LaFrentz put in the rebound, but Maryland's Terrell Stokes made two more free throws with 1.9 to go to complete the scoring.

Maryland got its biggest lead, 15 points, on Ekezie's basket to start the second half. But the Terrapins were unable to sustain the high-octane play that got them 54 points on 56 percent shooting in the first half. They started missing the shots they had made, and Pierce and Kansas slowly whittled away the lead.

The high-scoring first half was fueled by defense, with the Terrapins' half-court trap forcing turnover after turnover in a frenetic 18-0 run that created a 42-29 lead.

By halftime, the score was 54-41, the highest scoring half of the season for Maryland. Kansas had 16 turnovers at the break, and Pugh had four fouls.

CHIEFS WIN AGAIN

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — So complete was Kansas City's domination of its oldest archrival — the Oakland Raiders — that the Chiefs were able to do some old-fashioned scoreboard watching on Sunday.

The Chiefs (11-3), while cheering for Pittsburgh to beat Denver, outgained the Raiders 418-93 and piled up 27 first downs to five for Oakland (4-10) during a 30-0 victory.

While beating their old rivals for the 15th time in 17 meetings, the Chiefs amassed 214 yards rushing and allowed just 36.

The victory was especially sweet for Kansas City because halfway across the country Pittsburgh was beating Denver 35-24.

That put the Broncos and Chiefs in a tie for the AFC West lead, with Kansas City owning the tiebreaker advantage for home-field advantage in the playoffs with two games to play.

The Raiders, who came into the game tied for third in the NFL with 37 touchdowns, got close to scoring only once, when James Jett dropped a pass in the end zone. Then Wayne Simmons sacked Jeff George for a 10-yard loss on fourth down.

The Chiefs, who also kept San Francisco without a touchdown last week, recorded their first shutout since a 34-0 victory over Cleveland in 1990. The Raiders had not been shut out since October 1995.

The Chiefs also have not given up a touchdown in the second half in nine-straight games.

Kansas City jumped to a 20-0 halftime lead and never let the visitors, who've lost six of their past seven, get back in the game.

Rich Gannon, 4-1 in relief of the injured Elvis Grbac, ran for one touchdown and passed for another, and Pete Stoyanvich, running his consecutive field goal string to 16, hit two in the first half and one in the second.

After a scoreless third quarter, the Chiefs took a 23-0 lead on Stoyanovich's 40-yard kick in the fourth period. Then, with 6:42 to play, Gannon capped a nine-play, 84-yard march with a 2-yard touchdown toss to Tony Richardson.

LOOKINGback

1963: Frank Sinatra Jr. was kidnapped in Lake Tahoe, Nev., this day. He was set free four days later. It was discovered that Sinatra Jr. cooperated with his abductors in their plot. Dad was neither proud nor pleased. Frank Jr. went on to conduct the big band for Frank Sr. and all is well. A ring-a-ding-ding.

1980: John Lennon was shot and killed outside of his New York City apartment house, known as the Dakota. A deranged, obsessed "fan" asked Lennon to autograph an album, then shot him as Lennon started to comply. The man was apprehended quickly by others gathered at the scene, and remains in prison to this day.

CEREAL KILLERS

'MIDNIGHT' FILLED WITH Savannah pleasantry

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

It's another case of the book vs. the movie.

John Berendt's book, "Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil," was such a phenomenal best seller (three years on the best-seller list) there was no doubt it would eventually be turned into a movie, this one directed by Clint Eastwood. The book's rich, lush presentation of the elegant houses and genteel society types of Savannah, Ga., is a kind of love letter that will forever be associated with the city.

The true story recounted in the movie and book — call it one of those gray areas between fiction and a memoir — is one of Jim Williams (Kevin Spacey), a well-to-do antique dealer who resides in the landmark, opulent Mercer House. Williams, though not old money, has managed to find a high place for himself among the city's elite. He throws the annual Christmas party, an invitation being a confirmation of status.

In 1981, when John Kelso (John Cusack), a New York writer for Town and Country, drops in to cover the party, he ends up staying much longer after Williams shoots his lover, Billy Hanson, in self-defense. A trial follows and Kelso agrees to help Williams and his good-old-boy lawyer Sonny Seiler (a grand Jack Thompson) discretely investigate town gossip that could help Williams in the trial.

So Kelso dives into Savannah society, meeting movers and shakers and some of the most memorable characters you'll ever know. Like the transvestite performer Lady Chablis, played by none other than the real Lady Chablis. In the book, she is more of an unbelievable character who dishes the dirt on others without the pretenses of the ladies who lunch. But John Lee Hancock's script uses her to much greater effect (artistic license, is it?).

Chablis eventually becomes the star witness who testifies on Williams' behalf, revealing Billy Hanson to be a roughhousing, drug-doing hustler. Needless to say, Chablis steals every scene her curvaceous body is in, slipping easily through this movie while giving it a comic edge. (When told her antics at a debutante ball are giving someone a seizure, she replies, "Well stick a spoon in her mouth because we're not leaving.")

And Eastwood's movie needs every bit of outrageousness Chablis can muster. Instead of the book's four separate trials, Eastwood condensed it to one that seems to drag on as long as four. Outside of Chablis' testimony, the trial is a sleeper. Eastwood is a classy director; he's not one to shove things in your face, but he's always creating a rich mise en scene full of sumptuous Savannah detail set to a signature jazz score.

The movie has been deeply criticized for its slow pace (nearly 2 1/2 hours) and for its plot changes from the book, but it's really for the better. There is no need to trash the book or movie at the other's expense. They complement each other quite well.

The film succeeds brilliantly in casting. Spacey seems born to play the highly calculated, refined homosexual Williams who is sharply cut with a crisp mustache while also framed in the swirling, intriguing smoke of his King Edward cigarillos. Cusack, whose facial expressions range from dumbstruck to disbelieving, saunters through the movie without much to do except provide a reason for us to meet the other, more interesting characters like Minerva (Irma P. Hall), the voodoo witch helping Williams cast off the demons and win the trial.

Alison Eastwood, the director's daughter, rounds out the cast as Mandy Nichols, Kelso's friend Joe Odom's girlfriend. Nichols and Kelso hook up for no other reason than every Hollywood movie needing a love story of some kind. She's a fun tour guide for Cusack.

Supporting the characters' charades is the moss-covered murkiness of Savannah, a town full of polite isolationists with odd traditions. This isn't always the charming South of convention, but one couched in intrigue and mystery — on paper or celluloid.

Highly publicized BirdHouse concert exceeds expectations

SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
staff writer

Packed house. With good reason.

After hype for more than three months, singer-guitarist Patty Larkin arrived at the Manhattan Center for the Arts along with finger guitarist Richard Gilewitz to more than justify the anticipation. And they were modest as well.

Music Review

The Saturday concert, marking the last for BirdHouse's '97 fall season, began at the traditional 8 p.m. time with Gilewitz playing to the crowd of 173. For his session, Gilewitz played seven numbers, all instrumental. The notes were flowing and his quick taps on the guitar neck created pings strangely like music box tones that complemented each other nicely for a sound completely his own.

However, despite or perhaps because of Gilewitz's skill, the songs are so circular that the audience is a little confused when there is an ending or just a dramatic pause. They wanted to applaud generously but didn't know when.

Actually he can sing, Gilewitz said after the show, but has yet to decide exactly what to sing about. The Florida native said he preferred an all-instrumental song instead of lyrical, comparing instrumental to a book that allows readers to get their own impression and lyrical to a movie that sets every detail up.

Strolling to the stage, Larkin brought along 20 years of eclectic musical experience that has been touted by everybody from People weekly magazine to The Boston Globe. She was here on a 45-stop nationwide tour to promote her newest compact disc "Perishable Fruit," all without drums and her first work as a producer.

Larkin's background from rock 'n' roll to Celtic was simply evident, because one couldn't tell what she'd do next for her 15 songs. Her skill looked so easy. All the audience could count on was this: She would be playing the guitar, she would sing and it would be worth listening to. Slow or fast, triumphant or tragic, urban or "down home," it was good.

From the wild chaos of "Wolf at the Door" to a soft dedication for fellow musician Michael Hedges (Hedges died in an auto wreck this weekend), Larkin made it work. Voice and guitar were almost inseparable as she stepped lightly with the red stage lights hazy behind her.

An entertainer at heart, one of Larkin's most successful numbers that night was about a Saturday trip to the mall. The catch was that she did so while simultaneously "channeling" the spirits of Marlene Dietrich, Carmen Miranda and Ethel Merman. Granted, this might actually been the only guitarless song of the performance, but the audience loved it as Larkin re-created asking for a cigarette at the drive-through and hummed through her nose as backup.

The two musicians share many common threads. Larkin and Gilewitz have both played Kansas before, but this marked the first Manhattan performance for each. As a result, both were sort of "strangers in a strange land" in a community unaccustomed to much musical exposure.

"This kind of music is very regional," Larkin said, "It's outside of the mainstream and not accessible to a lot of people. It's the kind of music, if people hear it, I think they'll like it."

Gilewitz said Midwest audiences are some of the best. "They're not jaded to the music," Gilewitz said, "You're not a piece of candy corn in a candy store. I can come here and be more like a malt ball."

The next BirdHouse concert will be the opener for the spring tour featuring Anne Hills and Michael Smith on Jan. 31.

Speaker's presentation rehashes old ideas about drug culture

TERRY WELCH
staff writer

When Larry Rodgers, head of the Department of English, introduced a presentation Thursday by saying, "Let's get on to the good stuff," he should have expected a few snickers.

The topic, after all, was LSD.

Russell Reising, the presenter of the "multi-media extravaganza," entitled "Tripping Toward the Millennium: LSD and Culture Since 1947," said the drug ignited the most significant revolution in popular culture, and he had the music to prove it.

After prefacing the talk with an audio clip of "Psychedelic Shack" by the Temptations, Reising launched into a roll call of acid freaks that included NASA and Pentagon officials, Harvard psychologists, Timothy Leary, Cary Grant, former Pittsburgh Pirates pitcher Doc Ellis, Aldous Huxley, Robert Kennedy and John F. Kennedy among them. Reising said these people accepted the "invitation" of psychedelic drugs sung about in a number of songs that he had edited into bite-sized portions.

Commentary

Thus began the multimedia portion of the presentation. Reising clicked through slides of late '60s album covers (until the projector bulb broke), spouted quotes from famous acid experimenters and played videos without sound underneath. It began to seem that while the criteria of the term "multimedia" had been met, it fell far short of the status of extravaganza.

The structure of the presentation was as follows: Reising said acid caused in intellectuals an "awakening." He quoted Leary. He quoted a priest. He played portions of 13 psychedelic songs. Reising said some acid-using songwriters were writing "critiques of normal existence," even though they had moved beyond it. He played excerpts from nine psychedelic songs. You get the picture.

In all, there were seven such song breaks — containing bits of 70 or so songs — from artists ranging from Sly and the Family Stone to the 13th Floor Elevators to Elvis Costello. Reising attributed everything in these songs to LSD, without backing up these assumptions. I'm not a professor of English or a member of the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame's Educational Board of Advisers and I would never use the term "surreal apocalypses" in polite company, but it seems to me that LSD might not have been the only impetus behind Marvin Gaye's writing "What's Going On?"

You have to see his point to some extent, however. The drug, invented by accident by a German chemist in the '40s as a cure for migraines, has had more social effect than say, Fen-Phen. It did influence a number of musicians, artists and authors. But the presentation itself seemed nothing more than the stringing together and rehashing of ideas.

The most interesting — and amusing — statement made was just before Reising began a laundry list of things that are obviously worse than LSD. "This is not an endorsement," Reising said.

Rescue workers search for bodies

ASSOCIATED PRESS

IRKUTSK, Russia — Hundreds of rescue workers searched for victims in freezing weather Sunday after a cargo jet crashed into an apartment building, exploding in a massive fireball that engulfed surrounding homes and killed dozens of people.

Sixty-two bodies had been recovered more than 24 hours after the mammoth plane — carrying two Russian fighter jets — crashed into a neighborhood of this Siberian city 20 seconds after takeoff.

Rescue officials at the crash site said 24 other people were missing and rescue teams with search dogs were searching the debris for more bodies. Some 1,400 emergency workers and soldiers worked through the Siberian winter night in temperatures of 22 below zero.

"There was fire. Flames. There were no people. Nothing but flames," said Galina Dmitrovna, one of the first emergency workers to arrive at the scene of Saturday's crash.

Crying relatives of missing people watched the rescue operations. One woman, whose husband was missing, sobbed as she pointed at the wreckage of her apartment.

"All I can find are my kitchen knives," she said, begging people to find her husband.

Thirteen people, including eight children, were hospitalized with severe burns after the crash of the jumbo jet-size An-124, officials said.

Leonid Ismailov, deputy director of the Irkutsk Rescue Service, said officials did not know what caused the crash.

"The pilot, the crew, they were lying right there," he said, pointing at where the crew's bodies were found. "Only two of them were in uniform."

The cargo jet of the Russian air forces' transport command was carrying 23 people. The pilot radioed the control tower seconds after taking off, saying power had been lost in two engines, the Interfax News Agency reported, citing unidentified sources.

Russian news reports suggested poor fuel might have caused engine failure during takeoff. Other possible explanations were that the plane's cargo had shifted or pilot error. The plane's black box flight recorders were recovered and sent to Moscow.

President Boris Yeltsin ordered an investigation and sent Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin to the crash scene. Russian military prosecutors opened a criminal investigation to determine if there had been negligence or other offenses.

The An-124 crashed after taking off from a factory airfield in Irkutsk, where it had picked up a cargo of two jet fighters being exported to Vietnam. It plowed into a five-story apartment building and its wing clipped a neighboring orphanage.

The plane had about 100 tons of aviation fuel in its tanks and the resulting explosion enveloped surrounding buildings. Pools of aviation fuel littered the crash scene on Sunday and the stench of burned wood and fuel hung over the area.

Residents sorted through the rubble of their homes, looking for belongings. Many of the gutted apartments were covered in ice after water from firefighters' hoses froze.

The crash happened at about 2 p.m. local time, when many residents were out doing weekend shopping, averting a higher death toll, officials said.

Russia and other nations of the former Soviet Union have been plagued by a series of deadly air crashes in recent years. Experts have blamed poor maintenance, safety violations and cost-cutting for persistent problems.

However, Russian aviation officials said recently that aircraft safety was improving after attempts to boost inspection standards.

System allows 24-hour broadcasts at DB92

JOHN FRANSON
staff writer

The doors might be locked, the disc jockeys might be home in bed and the station might be empty and silent, but K-State's student-run radio station will still pump out the rock 'n' roll.

Thanks to a new computer system that automates the broadcast, KSDB-FM 91.9 now plays music 24 hours a day. The broadcasts began during Thanksgiving break and have continued nightly from 2 to 6 a.m., playing the "commercial alternative" format the station focuses on. Len Potillo, DB92 station manager, said the system was necessary because it was too hard to find anybody to work so early in the morning. In addition, the system allows the station to operate when a DJ is unavailable.

"We can run it at any time," he said. "All the last DJ has to do is hit the button and lock the door."

Potillo and the station's chief engineer, Gary Pettet, spent three days before Thanksgiving break installing the system.

"I basically lived at the station for three days," Potillo said. "Our engineer installed the system and got it working, but it's my job to learn it."

Rather than playing compact discs, the system plays songs stored on the system's eight-gigabyte hard drive. This allows the computer to access the songs quickly and to schedule breaks for underwriting spots and station identification, "pretty much the way a DJ would do it," Potillo said. The system can also be used for some production work, but not while the automated broadcast is running.

> "There's still that fringe element of people that will bash DB92 for not playing a certain type of music."
> Len Potillo
> DB92 station manager

The system, called Wave Station, cost about $1,500 for the software and $2,800 for the system to run it. Potillo said another local rock station paid about $80,000 for its system.

"That's the rumor," he said.

The Wave Station is the newest piece of equipment in the station, Potillo said.

"Most of our stuff's from the '70s and '80s," he said.

Potillo said the station wants to upgrade and get some new equipment. One thing he wants is more memory and more disk space for the new system, because the songs, which must be encoded from CDs, take up a large amount of disk space. However, he said the station's budget won't allow for many new expenditures.

"We get $35,000 (from student government) for the whole year to run a radio station, which is kind of absurd. Hopefully, that'll increase."

Wave Station is not the only new thing at DB92. Potillo said that in a month or a month and a half, the station plans to broadcast in real time on the Internet, 24 hours a day. He hopes this will bring in some extra revenue for the station.

"We're trying to develop the Internet to be competitive with advertising," he said. He also noted that the Internet allows the station to say things and show ads that wouldn't be allowed on the air.

"On the Internet, we can say what we want," he said.

One area the station won't be changing is its format and program line-up. The station changed to a more commercial format at the beginning of the semester.

"There were a lot of people that came on board that were excited at what they heard," Potillo said. "There's still that fringe element of people that will bash DB92 for not playing a certain type of music. A lot of times people will criticize us because we're not playing the kind of music they like."

Potillo said most of the less-mainstream music has been moved to shows such as the Underground, the Vault (which might be renamed Radio Free Kansas) and Sonic Farming. These shows will remain on next semester's schedule.

"Right now, everything is going to stay mostly the same," Potillo said.

Company reviews unusual products

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CINCINNATI — "Microbrewed" beer shampoo, caffeine-laced orange juice and cherry-marshmallow toothpaste got panned. Pre-stuffed tortillas and special mittens that remove unwanted body hair got raves.

"It's like a movie review," said Michael Soltes of Noah Products, whose "Lumident Chewbrush" was relegated to the AcuPOLL Precision Research survey's worst-product list.

Cincinnati-based AcuPOLL takes it upon itself to measure response to often offbeat business ideas, including edible chocolate-lined straws and a brushless toothbrush you chew like bubble gum.

AcuPOLL shows a photograph and brief description of products to a group of 100 consumers — all women from across the Midwest who were the primary shoppers in their households — and they decide whether they would buy the product. A different group of women was surveyed for each product.

The company sorted through many of the nearly 25,000 new products introduced on store shelves in 1997 to come up with its annual list of 400 of the best and worst innovations.

Among this year's losers: Pete & Pam premeasured toothpaste strips for kids, which comes in flavors such as cherry-marshmallow, and JUICED orange juice, which is laced with caffeine.

Also disliked was Back to Basics, a "microbrewed" beer shampoo that puts "a head on your head," featuring Honey Wheat Pilsner, Peach Amber Ale and Cherry Stout. Another was Yohay cookie straws, cookie tubes lined with chocolate.

They join a long list of past losers that includes barbecue-flavored dried vegetables, gloves filled with hand cream and frozen iced tea on a stick.

"I'm always just kind of awed that people believe that some of these products will be successful," said Steve Phelan, vice president of AcuPOLL. "You gotta love the optimism and the creativity ... but I just feel bad sometimes that they don't do a reality check along the way and research if anybody will buy these things."

Of course, being rated good or bad isn't necessarily an indicator of market success. For example, Soltes has sold 30 million Chewbrushes in Europe and is hoping for similar sales in the United States.

"We're getting rave reviews," Soltes said of the mint-flavored, chewable tooth cleaner that doesn't require toothpaste or water. "Handicapped people love them. So do campers."

AcuPOLL avoids liability by basing the ratings purely on consumer feedback.

Winners this year included Hair-off Mittens, which makers say will make "sharp razors and harsh chemicals a thing of the past" by quickly and easily removing hair from women's legs with its "SilCoat finish." People also liked Old El Paso Tortilla Stuffers, pre-filled microwavable tortillas.

TWA explosion causes scrutiny about aircraft

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The huge, costly examination of the explosion of TWA Flight 800 could bring lasting improvements to aviation safety, even if the disaster's cause is never identified, federal investigators said.

Nearly a year and a half after the Boeing 747 blew up over the Atlantic, killing all 230 people on board, public hearings are scheduled to start today in Baltimore, providing an in-depth look at the largest investigation in the history of the National Transportation Safety Board.

"We are anxious to put our factual reports on the public record which, because of the FBI criminal investigation, we were not able to do until now," NTSB spokesman Peter Goelz said.

The FBI announced two weeks ago that it was suspending its $14 million to $20 million criminal investigation after failing to

Japanese minor to be offered during spring

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

A Japanese minor will be offered beginning in fall 1998. The proposal was approved by the faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences.

The program has seven courses, Japanese 1 through Japanese 7. The classes deal with speaking, writing, listening, reading and understanding the Japanese language and culture. In the minor program, K-State students must take 26 hours of Japanese classes in a three-year period.

"The new curriculum is designed for students who have no Japanese background," Kyoko Mizuno, Japanese instructor, said.

By the time students finish Japanese 6 or 7, they can achieve proficiency at an intermediate level, which is considered the highest attainable level without actually living in the country.

K-State students now can take Japanese classes and learn the language, but they cannot have it recognized as a minor.

"I wanted to acknowledge the students' accomplishments and efforts with a Japanese minor," Mizuno said. "It shows they have committed themselves to learning the language."

Mizuno said a lot of companies want graduates who can deal with people and cultures from different parts of the world.

The Japanese program officially started in fall 1992. A special course called "Japanese, Culture and Language" was offered for the K-State football team, as part of its preparation for a trip to the Coca-Cola Bowl in Tokyo in December 1992. The course was a basic introduction to the Japanese language, with lessons on history, geography and Japanese culture.

More than 470 K-State students have enrolled in Japanese classes since the program's induction. K-State students have done well at Japanese speech contests, and some students have ventured to Japan to work or study.

Darin Davis, senior in finance, said he was applying to work in Japan through the Japan, Exchange and Teaching program.

"The more time you put into learning the language the more you'll get out of it," Davis said. "You need to take time every day to study the language because there are so many different forms of words that have completely different meanings."

The purpose of the exchange program is to teach English to citizens of Japan, and in the process gain a valuable cultural experience.

"It has been a fascination of mine to speak the Japanese language since I was a child," Davis said.

Understanding the Japanese language can be rewarding, but it does take time to learn.

"The language is not hard to learn, but mastering it takes time," Mizuno said. "I want students to know they can speak Japanese and enjoy using the language without being a native speaker."

Two Japanese instructors, including Mizuno, teach classes at K-State.

"I don't think of the language as difficult to teach, but I do enjoy teaching it to K-State students," Mizuno said.

Emergency Shelter seeks contributions

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

The holiday season is here, and with it comes an increase in the number of people the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. will help.

The shelter is looking for contributions to help support it. It has experienced cutbacks from federal, state and local funding sources.

Junell Norris, executive director of the emergency shelter, said the shelter has seen many cutbacks in funds from local groups and a federal-state block grant, which decreased its budget.

"There are so many needs and not enough time, funding, support services and care to spread around," Norris said.

The shelter provides lodging, meals, clothing, personal hygiene items, job searches and counseling classes. Some of the classes offered are basic nutrition, cooking and life skills, budgeting, parenting, personal health and drug-alcohol awareness classes.

"These classes help them work on their budget or expenses in order to adjust to living in the community," Norris said. "We figure that in order for them to make it in the community they need to have at least $800 in their pocket and a steady job."

Norris said the shelter expects all guests or those who use their services to set goals, accept responsibility and work toward renewed independence.

The shelter works in conjunction with the Sunflower Transitional Living Program, which helps those in need to make the transition from the emergency shelter to community living. Less than 3 percent of individuals and families who apply for assistance at the Manhattan shelter will return for future assistance.

"We provide a quality service for the city of Manhattan," Norris said.

Norris said you don't see individuals or families with children sleeping in alleys, parks or on the streets in Manhattan.

"This can be attributed to the emergency shelter, which tries to get people back on their feet. But since it is the holiday season and we're short on funds, we might not be able to help everyone," Norris said.

The emergency shelter is looking for donations or contributions to continue to provide services.

"We are looking for churches or groups to help with budget line items, like a food or clothing budget," Norris said.

Contributions will be accepted by mail or at the shelter. The emergency shelter's address is P.O. Box 896, 831 Leavenworth St., Manhattan, Kan., 66505-0896.

Committee previews '98 legislative session

LANCE SCHOEN
staff reporter

Governmental Relations Committee members talked on Sunday about issues on the Kansas Legislature's spring docket that will affect K-State.

Hale Library funding was one issue discussed during the meeting. The committee would like $2 million of the approximately $250 million surplus in last year's state budget to be allocated to the library for periodicals and books, committee chair Patrick Carney said.

Carney said that probably won't happen, but K-State could possibly see $500,000.

Another program discussed by the committee was the a state scholarship program. Through this program, high school students who graduate from a Kansas high school with a 3.0 grade point average or above would receive about $1,200 a semester from the state as long as they maintain at least a 2.7 college grade point average. This would not only pertain to Kansas Board of Regents universities but any Kansas college.

Also before the Legislature is a bill that would give K-State Police the authority to pursue a suspect off campus. Conversely, the Riley County Police Department would be given the authority to pursue a suspect onto campus. This would alleviate jurisdiction problems between the K-State and Riley County departments.

A similar bill directed to help prevent violence on campus is called the Defendant on Campus bill. According to this bill, if convicted felons apply to regents schools, the board of regents can review their record and if they are deemed dangerous the person will not be allowed to attend, Carney said.

The takeover of Washburn University and the community colleges by the regents has been debated for several years and might be addressed during this year's legislative session. Carney said if Washburn is brought into the system, other regents universities could suffer financially.

"If Washburn is brought into the system, we (K-State) will lose money," Carney said.

Other issues set to hit the legislative agenda are a technology fund, which would be set up to fund new computers and software systems to keep schools updated on technology; faculty salary increases; and a credit card solicitation law, which would limit or make it illegal for credit card solicitors to market credit cards on campus. It would also make it illegal for universities to give students' names to credit card companies.

into the half," Patterson said.

The teams traded baskets early in the second half, and the game was tied at 31, but Utah scored nine consecutive points to take control of the game. It would not hold a lead of fewer than seven, and eventually extended that lead to 17 a couple of times.

The Cats put up a few comebacks, but fell short, losing 68-57. K-State's record dropped to 5-2, while the Utes improved to 5-0.

Patterson said perimeter turnovers by K-State were particularly harmful and took the Cats out of their game. Shooting was the difference in the second half. The Utes shot 67 percent from the field in the second half, while the Cats shot only 32 percent. This was the first game all year the Cats didn't shoot at least 50 percent in the second half.

"I think they really took the game at us in the second half," Patterson said. "We let them take control of the game. It was a lock of our defensive adjustments that really was critical in this game."

K-State guard Brit Jacobson said Utah's aggressive defense was important to their win.

"Utah did a great job. They took it at us," she said.

Four Wildcats scored in double figures, led by guard Kim Woodlee's 15 points. Krommenhoek and forward Angie Thill led the Utes with 16 apiece.

The Cats don't return to the court until Saturday, when they travel to Columbus, Ohio, to play Ohio State.

presents an entirely different set of design circumstances.

Jeff Barnes, fifth-year senior in interior architecture, said he and the other students assigned to Grainfield were literally working from the ground up.

"It was basically up in the air about what you could do," Barnes said.

The Grainfield is a three-story structure that is in bad condition mostly because a former owner stripped its architecture and sold it off. The Grainfield Lions Club bought the theater and is working to restore it.

Barnes said support for the theater isn't too wide, although he thinks it will increase as more is accomplished on the project.

Other theater projects by the students include the Granada Fox Theatre in Emporia, the Blair Theatre in Belleville, the Plaza Theatre in Abilene and the Rex Theatre in Clay Center.

The projects were part of a semester-long program, "Renewing Historic Kansas Theaters," that involved the students, the Kansas Preservation Alliance, the Kansas Chapter of the League of Historic American Theaters and statewide preservation leaders.

Three jurors judged the projects Saturday and awards were given at the luncheon. First prize went to Greg Nelson (Jayhawk), second to Jim Lehman (Grainfield) and third to Travis Key (Rex).

Dubois, associate professor of interior architecture, saw the projects as visions. "That's the main intent we are trying to do with these communities. That's all we can do — provide a vision," Dubois said. "What that theater might be, not what it will be. Hopefully, 10 years down the road students will be able to travel to your communities and see a live performance."

More words of wisdom to the students were given by Malcolm Holzman, a juror and principal of the New York firm Hardy Holzman Pfeiffer, which recently completed a successful renovation of Disney's 42nd Street Theater in New York.

turn up any evidence of a terrorist bomb or missile. That means most of the NTSB's material is no longer considered confidential as potential evidence.

The NTSB, which said its investigation cost $26 million, said Baltimore was chosen for the hearings because it could provide a large meeting hall with plenty of reasonably priced hotels for witnesses, victims' families and the media.

NTSB Chairman James Hall said his investigators still can't cite a likely cause for the fuel-tank explosion that destroyed the plane minutes after it took off from Kennedy International Airport for a flight to Paris.

But Hall said the hundreds of investigators working tens of thousands of hours have helped determine how to protect planes from future fuel-tank explosions. And the NTSB is learning more about the danger of flammable fuel fumes like those that filled Flight 800's near-empty center fuel tank, he said.

"Two things are driving our investigation," Hall told The Associated Press. "We want to know the ignition source on TWA Flight 800. Secondly, we want to know what steps need to be taken to prevent an accident like this from recurring in the future."

The NTSB's investigation is expected to continue well into next year.

Hall said the NTSB, the Federal Aviation Administration and the airline industry have people "working night and day to make sure a rare event such as caused TWA Flight 800 to explode doesn't happen again."

A year ago, the NTSB recommended to the FAA that steps be taken to ensure that center fuel tanks are not left filled with highly flammable fuel vapor.

The FAA has instead looked at eliminating ignition sources around the tank. For instance, the FAA now requires airlines to inspect and replace silicone insulation inside fuel pumps because it could disintegrate and cause a fuel leak.

Fuel pumps are among the possible ignition sources the NTSB has studied since TWA 800 exploded. Most of the plane's debris was recovered from the ocean floor off the south shore of Long Island, but a small fuel pump from the center tank is still missing.

Investigators also are studying the possibility that faulty wiring or static electricity might have been involved, and whether a burst of high-voltage electricity might have entered the center tank through low-voltage fuel gauge probes.

On Wednesday, the FAA said it has begun acting on one of the NTSB's recommendations, to add new safety equipment to flush hazardous fumes from fuel tanks and insulate the tanks from heat sources.

The NTSB recommended reducing the flammability of fuel-air mixtures in tanks immediately by requiring airlines to add cooler fuel from ground tanks when possible. It also proposed installing fuel-temperature monitors and filling empty tanks with inert gas to prevent formation of explosive fuel-air mixtures. Nitrogen gas already is used in fuel tanks on military planes.

In a letter to Hall, FAA Administrator Jane F. Garvey said an advisory committee is being directed to identify ways to fit Boeing 747s with such nitrogen inerting systems and insulation between heat-generating equipment and fuel tanks.

Goelz, the NTSB spokesman, said the FBI's withdrawal from the case allows the NTSB finally to place in the public record 6,000 pages of mostly technical information.

"This has been the most extensive and closest examination of an aircraft accident in history," he said.

Kansas was born in the blood and in the battle of slavery," Price said.

With the help of friend Gilbert Hammond Sr., the state communications director for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, this important part of history will be available for student and faculty use in the library.

"There are so many people that don't want to deal with color and race, but we have to deal with it because it is a part of history," Hammond said. "America is great because of all of us. We don't want to be excluded in Kansas history. We need to deal with the problems and be inclusive with everything. It's about us coming together as one."

The majority of the books donated are reprints of rare anti-slavery books published in America and Great Britain from 1776 to the early 1990s. The collection, called the Major Scott Price Anti-Slavery Collection, has a value estimated between $3,000 and $5,000, Hammond said.

"Everybody should be able to look at each other as brothers," Hammond said. "Mr. Price is white and I am black and we are brothers. Students need to read these materials to see what went on in Kansas and to better understand Kansas history."

Being from Kansas, Price said he was glad K-State wanted to make a permanent home for this important collection.

"My home is in Kansas," he said. "My kids have been educated in Kansas schools and will attend universities in Kansas. It's good to know this part of Kansas history will be remembered, and not lost to generations to come."

Online privacy issues challenged by e-mail users

Shawnee Mission teachers' union grapples with lack of e-mail privacy at school

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SHAWNEE, Kan. — Since the advent of e-mail and the Internet, the warning to workers has reached red-alert status: Don't use e-mail to send messages you wouldn't want your boss — or the world — to see.

Such privacy is at the core of a dispute in the Shawnee Mission public schools, where the teachers' union says a district policy allowing administrators to peek at e-mail violates teachers' professional integrity and their right to privacy.

▶ Find out what the Collegian thinks
The editorial board tackles the issue of e-mail privacy on the Opinion page today.

Shawnee Mission's two-page policy says users "shall have no expectation of privacy" and that district administrators reserve the right to monitor and have access to all passwords. The policy, aimed at curbing communication on district phones or computers that isn't work-related, was on the school board's scheduled agenda Monday night.

"As a demonstration of faith, the employer should agree to respect e-mail and phone mail as private communications," National Education Association president Carol Allen said. "Employees should not be dehumanized, nor should they give up their rights to privacy when they walk into a school."

Superintendent Marjorie Kaplan said she disagrees.

"This is not your home computer," Kaplan said. "You should have no expectation of privacy."

This is what worries teachers: When an e-mail user deletes messages from their screens, those messages aren't really gone. They're merely routed to the district's technology center, where they're stored until a system's worker deletes them.

E-mail, voice mail and the Internet have revolutionized workplace communications. All branches of the federal government have internal e-mail, as do many private businesses.

Although there are few laws specifically addressing questions of e-mail privacy in the business world, courts have tended to side with private employers' right to snoop.

But legal experts say the union might have a case.

Kim Dayton, a law professor at the University of Kansas, said wording of the district's policy might be illegal.

"In my view, the district is walking on thin ice," said Dayton, who teaches a course on cyberspace law. "It's like saying a filing cabinet in an office is subject to opening. (The policy) asserts up front that there's no reasonable expectation of privacy. That's a constitutional concept. That's not something that a district can say."

Public school teachers are protected by the Fourth Amendment, which guards against illegal search and seizure, Dayton said. Private employees don't have that protection.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that electronic interception of communications violates the Fourth Amendment. That includes wiretapping telephone calls and could include reading e-mail, experts said.

At K-State, a new policy governing e-mail use has been read and re-read, Vice Provost Beth Unger said.

Although the policy says the university encourages use of e-mail and respects users' privacy, it also says that in specific instances, e-mail can be intercepted. The policy lists six specific instances, such as troubleshooting system problems and complying with legal requests for information.

The policy also says users shouldn't expect that messages stored on university equipment are private or confidential because they're vulnerable to outside access.

"It's really a new area that needs to be explored," Unger said. "We're being very, very careful about people's rights to privacy in all this."

K-State e-mail subject to observation by staff

JENNI EVANS
staff writer

Privacy is an important issue to many K-State students. E-mail is considered private by many, but there are certain cases when Computing and Network Services can check students' accounts.

The most common reason for checking accounts is for troubleshooting hardware and software problems as well as preventing unauthorized access and system misuse.

"People shouldn't expect privacy," said Kenneth Conrow, interim director of CNS.

When retrieving business-related information, investigating reports of violating university policy and/or state or federal law, as well as complying for legal requests of information, systems administrators need approval to search accounts.

Approval must be obtained from the vice provost of Academic Services and Technology. Access is then limited to what is reasonably necessary to acquire the information.

Senators to vote on student health, counseling fees

BENJAMIN YODER
campus government editor

Nearly $3 million in student privilege fees will be voted on during Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

The Privilege Fee Committee recommended that the Student Health Fee be continued at the present level of nearly $2.5 million each year for the next two years. The Committee also recommended that the University Counseling Fee be increased to $446,110 from $420,000.

▶ Be involved
Student Senate will meet at 7 p.m. Thursday in the Union Big 12 Room. The meeting is open to the public.

The fees compose more than one-third of the privilege fees collected from K-State students. The total Student Governing Association budget is $8.4 million.

Privilege fees support services such as Lafene Health Center, KSDB-FM 91.9, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and Student Publications Inc.

Students enrolled in 12 or more credit hours pay $251 in fees each semester this year.

When voting on fees, the Privilege Fee Committee can send fees to Student Senate with a favorable recommendation, an unfavorable recommendation or no recommendation.

Privilege Fee Committee members voted 6-3 to send the University Counseling Fee to Senate without a recommendation. However, members voted 6-3 to send the Student

Television viewers participate in provost lectures

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

Students have it rough, with homework, tests, and the cost of tuition and books. However, teachers don't have it that easy, either.

In fact, in addition to grading all the homework and tests, most professors are required to do research in their fields, and there is much pressure on them to be published, said Tom Grimes, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

"Students and taxpayers often don't realize most professors are under enormous pressure to produce research that will make a cultural or economical difference," Grimes said.

He said this is the reason for the Provost Lecture Series. The idea of the series is to make it easier on professors in the area of scholarship.

"The lecture series is designed to help faculty better do their jobs," Grimes said. "This is highly stressful, highly complicated and difficult research."

The subtitle of this year's Provost Lecture Series is "New Directions in learning and teaching" and features the deans of each college in the university except for the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The lecture by Ron Marler, former dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, was canceled because Marler is no longer at the university.

Because the lectures often take place while professors are teaching, this year the lectures are being aired on television with a follow-up round table discussion.

The TV audience can take part in the discussion by submitting their questions or comments via the Internet through the provost's home page, www.ksu.edu/provost/.

Provost James R. Coffman is the host of the round-table discussion group. It is moderated by Grimes and features the dean who last lectured and various guests invited by the provost.

The lectures and discussions will be aired on TCI of Kansas, channel 19 and K-State's Low Power Television, channel 21 at 7 p.m. Thursday and 9 p.m. Sunday the week after the live lecture.

The lecture series is sponsored by Coffman, the chief academic officer of the university, who is in charge of maintaining high teaching productivity, Grimes said.

Grimes said the reason the scholarship is so important at K-State is that much of the state's and country's research comes from the universities, especially the land-grant universities.

He said it is also important to the world because much of the world's research comes from the United States.

John Lankford, assistant to the provost, said the purpose of the lecture is to maintain high teaching productivity, research productivity and scholarly productivity.

He said the first two years of the lecture series sparked an ongoing dialogue about a new way of teaching and learning, but it has progressed some this year, which is the third year of the lecture.

"Now there has been a shift in the focus slightly to what goes on in each particular college," Lankford said. "It has made the logical progression from one point to the next."

Lankford coordinates the operation of the series and takes suggestions from faculty and administration about the series. He said the round-table discussion and TV broadcasts seem to have been successful.

"The feedback has been quite positive," Lankford said. "Everyone seems to be quite interested and quite positive."

University loses appeal to shield discipline records from newspaper

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — An Ohio university seeking to shield its student disciplinary records from public scrutiny lost a Supreme Court appeal Monday.

The justices, without comment, let stand a ruling by Ohio's highest court that forces Miami University to release the records — with names deleted — to the school's student newspaper.

In the disciplinary records dispute, the newspaper, The Miami Student, wants to use the information to track student crime trends on campus.

"Crimes and other student misconduct are escalating at campuses across the nation," the Ohio Supreme Court said last July. "For potential students and their parents, it is imperative that they are made aware of all campus crime statistics and other types of student misconduct in order to make an intelligent decision of which university to attend."

The state court added: "Likewise, for students already enrolled in a university, their safety is of utmost importance. Without full public access to disciplinary proceeding records, that safety may be compromised."

In the appeal acted on Monday, lawyers for the university argued that releasing the information under Ohio's open-records law puts the Oxford, Ohio, school in jeopardy of violating the federal Family Education Rights and Privacy Act.

The federal law bars the release of "education records" that can be "personally identifiable."

In a friend-of-the-court brief, Ohio Attorney General Betty Montgomery urged the justices to study Miami University's case.

She said Ohio's 12 public universities and two freestanding medical schools "have an untenable choice: they may comply with the federal mandate to protect student disciplinary records from disclosure ... or they can follow the Ohio Supreme Court's current mandate."

But lawyers for the student newspaper said no such conflict exists. They said the state court order "did not require Miami to disclose records ... that contained any personally identifiable information."

The state court's order said the school must release only records that reflect "the general location of the incidents, the age and sex of the students (which do not identify the student), the nature of the offense and the type of disciplinary penalty imposed."

The state court ruled by a 5-2 vote that the sought-after information — which does not involve academic performance, financial aid or scholastic probation — did not meet the federal law's definition of "education records."

The university's lawyers contended that the state court was wrong, and that its decision "requires Miami University to violate ... constitutionally protected privacy."

Woman pleads guilty to aiding in kidnap, assault of molester

DELAWARE, Ohio — A woman pleaded guilty Monday to kidnapping and sexually assaulting her son-in-law, a convicted child molester who she feared would abuse the same child again.

Mary Franks, 44, faces at least three years in jail on attempted rape and kidnapping charges. It was not immediately clear when she would be sentenced.

Franks was one of three women, along with her daughter Jewell Hosler and sister-in-law Vicki Coulter, charged with sexually assaulting Rodney Hosler with a cucumber on July 26. The women wrote "child molester" with black marker on his body, then drove him an hour away and dumped him clad only in a blanket outside a pizza parlor.

Hosler, who filed for divorce after the attack on her estranged husband, and Coulter had already pleaded guilty to related charges. Hosler, who was sentenced to two years in prison, had agreed to testify against her mother.

Hosler's attorney, David Yost, told The Columbus Dispatch she was prepared to testify that her mother planned the attack because she feared Hosler was molesting the now-7-year-old child again.

Rodney Hosler, 27, was released in January after serving two years in prison for molesting the child.

Hosler told police he was watching television when the women entered his apartment, shaved his head and pubic hair, sexually assaulted him with a cucumber and put a heat-producing ointment on his genitals.

3 killed when planes collide

BOZEMAN, Mont. — Despite clear weather, two single-engine airplanes collided and fell to the ground, killing both pilots and the only passenger.

The identities of the victims of the Sunday afternoon crash were not immediately released.

One plane apparently sheared off the tail section of the other, Gallatin County sheriff Bill Slaughter said. One plane landed near two subdivisions about two miles north of Bozeman. The other hit the ground about three-quarters of a mile away.

Tow truck driver Joe Johnson, who was with a highway patrol officer at a nearby accident scene when the planes collided, said one aircraft hit the ground "like a backward rocket" at about a 45-degree angle. The other was missing a wing and just floated to the ground, scattering debris as Johnson and the deputy took cover.

Witnesses said there were clear conditions and cloudless skies at the time of the crash.

Elementary school fire allegedly planned by 6th-grade student

DALLAS — An elementary school moved classes into the auditorium, the gym and the cafeteria Monday after a fire allegedly planned by at least one sixth-grade boy who didn't want to attend class.

Police arrested two 12-year-old twin boys on suspicion of arson after the fire Sunday at Dan D. Rogers Elementary School. The fire caused $175,000 in damage. Firefighters wouldn't say how it started.

"What we heard (Sunday) was that these kids were out bragging around the neighborhood that they wouldn't have to go to school in the morning because the school burned down," fire Capt. David Caughran told The Dallas Morning News.

At least one of the boys faces a juvenile charge of arson, Caughran said.

School officials said they suspect the boys also set fire to a portable building at the school about two weeks ago.

RAMON GUTIERREZ, professor of history and ethnic studies and director of the Center for the Study of Race and Ethnicity at the University of California, San Diego, discussed the American Indian slave experience in Spanish colonial areas in the Southwest United States.

His lecture, which was at 3:30 p.m. Monday, dealt with a variety of different historical aspects of American Indian slavery and how some remain today.

Gutierrez focused on the historical evolution of slave religion, slave towns and the slaves' place within the social structure of New Mexico between 1500 and 1846.

Gutierrez said many towns in New Mexico today were originally slave towns set up by the Spanish to act as a first line of defense from invading groups of Apache, Comanche and Navajo Indians. -cutline by Landon Trawny

Nuclear weapons could be used to deter chemical attack on U.S.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — As fears of an all-out nuclear war fade, the Clinton administration is shifting its focus on using nuclear arms to deter attacks on the United States and American forces with chemical and biological weapons.

A new Presidential Decision Directive provides the most detailed assessment to date by the White House of the ways nuclear weapons and the threat of nuclear attack could be used to prevent rogue states such as Iran and Iraq from unleashing chemical or biological arms.

"We're all more attuned to the threat of chemical and biological weapons," Robert Bell, a senior member of Clinton's National Security Council staff, said Sunday in response to reporters' questions.

"The (directive) requires a wide range of nuclear retaliatory options from a limited strike to a more general nuclear exchange," Bell said, and it makes clear that those options include a nuclear strike in response to a chemical or biological attack.

Approved last month by Clinton, principal elements of the directive were first reported Sunday by The Washington Post. In many respects, the document follows longstanding policy on nuclear weapons, including continued support for the nuclear "triad" — bombers, land-based missiles and missile submarines — and basic reliance on nuclear weapons as a mainstay of national security.

The document breaks new ground by abandoning the concept that the United States should plan for a protracted nuclear war that it could win and by allowing an expansion of the list of potential targets that could be struck in China in the unlikely event of war with that nation.

"We felt that the concept of protracted nuclear war never had a great deal of credibility," Bell said. Such a possibility was outlined in a 1981 Reagan administration directive. "There was an anomaly," Bell said. "The president's own guidance to the Strategic Command ... was unrealizable."

Senior military officers have warned that arms reduction agreements no longer make such a conflict even feasible, let alone able to win. As a result, Clinton ordered his reassessment last February.

Worries about all-out nuclear war have been replaced by concerns that an adversary such as Iraq might use chemical or biological weapons against U.S. forces. As a result, Bell said, Clinton's directive discusses in far greater detail than in past directives responses the United States should have available.

President Carter said in 1978 that the United States would not use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear states unless those states fought in concert with a nuclear power or defied the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Iraq's suspected defiance of the treaty allowed the Bush administration to threaten Saddam Hussein with massive retaliation if the Iraqi president ordered chemical or biological weapons in the Persian Gulf War.

"That was something that many people took to be a clear nuclear threat," Bell said.

In April 1993, early in Clinton's presidency, the Joint Chiefs of Staff issued a document called JP-3-12, or Joint Doctrine for Nuclear Operations. It described the use of nuclear weapons in response to attacks involving weapons of mass destruction, which could include chemical or biological weapons.

"U.S. nuclear capabilities must confront an enemy with risks of unacceptable damage and disproportionate loss should the enemy choose to introduce (weapons of mass destruction) in a conflict," the doctrine said.

In 1995, the United States, along with the other significant nuclear powers of Britain, China, Russia and France, reiterated the Carter administration's pledge against nuclear strikes on non-nuclear countries. The pledge retained loopholes that could allow the United States to strike back.

Bell said the 1981 Reagan directive on nuclear weapons policy barely contemplated the kind of chemical or biological attack from a rogue state that occupies so much of U.S. defense planning today.

"We needed to be very clear in what we were instructing," Bell said. "There is more discussion of it, more ink, if you will, in this document."

John Pike of the Federation of American Scientists, an arms control advocacy group, argued Sunday that the presidential directive represents a far sharper official policy shift than the Clinton administration would admit. The White House, he said, was bowing to strategies already set by the military.

"What they are retroactively doing is attempting to realign national policy with what the operational policy has been for some time," Pike said. "The colonels and lieutenant colonels figured out what they wanted to do, and you've just now got the White House catching up with that."

College of Business Administration experiences

Growing Pains

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

The College of Business Administration is attempting to accommodate the growing number of students enrolling.

Yar Ebadi, dean of the College of Business Administration, said the college's enrollment has increased 8.4 percent this fall and had increased 10 percent in fall '96.

David Andrus, head of the Department of Marketing and International Business, said the growth is due to the leadership of Ebadi and the quality of the faculty.

"The faculty we have is top quality, very student oriented and are experts in their fields," Andrus said.

The Department of Marketing and International Business has increased by 121 students this fall.

Ebadi said many students are attracted to the College of Business Administration at K-State, because it is student-focused.

"We have a quality program, excellent students and job opportunities are great," Ebadi said.

Because of the strong economy, Andrus said there are a large number of job opportunities and K-State's program has a high job-placement rate.

"There's a tremendous number of jobs, and they are high-paying. The average starting salary is $30,000-$31,000 in marketing. It's even higher in accounting and management information systems," Andrus said.

Ebadi said there are new companies that come to K-State each semester to offer students jobs because the company has heard from others about the quality of the students. He also said many companies repeatedly come back to K-State to recruit students because they have had great success in the past.

"Companies want to come back. Word gets around that we keep our curriculum updated and vigorous so students will succeed," Ebadi said.

Dave Donnelly, professor of accounting, said companies from Houston, San Francisco and Denver have started to become active in recruiting K-State students.

Although the success of the College of Business Administration has been great through recent years, Ebadi said it has come with a price.

There has been additional pressure on faculty, because the number of instructors has not increased in proportion with the student increase. Ebadi said the college is always trying to get more faculty to solve the problem.

"We have constantly been talking to the central administration to keep the quality of the program high," Ebadi said. "One new position has been promised, and we will speak with them in January about additional positions."

Using master's students to teach classes helps alleviate some of the pressure, but limited financial resources restricts how many master's students can teach, Donnelly said.

The College of Business Administration has also tried to lift some of the pressure by setting a minimum 3.0 grade point average before students can be admitted into the program.

Donnelly said this has helped to keep the program's quality high. However, he said the GPA requirement has been a temporary solution to the high rate of enrollment, because so many quality students apply to the program.

"In three or four years, the quality of the program could suffer if the faculty isn't increased," Donnelly said.

Ebadi said the College of Business Administration expects student enrollment to continue increasing. Faculty have done a great job in handling the current increase, but additional faculty will be necessary in the future, he said.

Rules need to be clarified for e-mail censoring

So you feel like letting a pal know how you'd just like to kill that President Clinton. You do this in a jocular fashion via e-mail. The systems manager of your e-mail server intercepts the message before your friend.

Next thing you know, you've got federal agents dumping out your underwear drawer in search of evidence that you were actually plotting to assassinate the president.

Is sending e-mail like sending a letter through the U.S. mail? No. While it's a federal offense to open someone's mail, managers of e-mail systems usually reserve the right to rifle through the e-mail of their users.

E-mail is usually looked through when there is a just cause, such as suspicion of child pornography. This is a good thing. After all, does anyone really want kiddie porn sent to them?

However, rules about what is acceptable and not acceptable for e-mail is a little hazy. The rules should be drawn far above what is considered good taste for some. The rules should include only what's illegal, such as child pornography or presidential death threats.

For instance, e-mail between two consenting adults, even if it may be crass, shouldn't get someone kicked off the server. Now, if the two consenting adults were volleying illegal things, that would be another thing altogether.

Computing and Network and Services can see what's in your e-mail account, but only with permission from the vice provost of academic services and technology. In the K-State e-mail policy, it states "the university encourages the use of electronic mail and respects the privacy of users."

Your e-mail may be accessed for trouble shooting and software problems; preventing unauthorized access and system misuse; retrieving business-related information; investigating reports of violation of university policy or local, state or federal law; complying with legal requests for information and rerouting or disposing of undeliverable mail.

A good rule of thumb to follow might be to write your e-mail as though your mother were standing over your shoulder.

Or President Clinton.

AHHH... COLLEGE LOVE!! AINT IT GRAND?

'Saved by the Bell' Mario López makes a pretty poor teacher

VIEWPOINT

JON KURCHE

JON KURCHE is a freshman in physics. You can send e-mail to Jon at jsk6609@ksu.edu.

It was because of a conversation I was having a few nights ago that I came to the conclusion I am the world's biggest dork.

You see, in high school, I was so unpopular I used to put "kick me" signs on my own back.

One time when I was feeling particularly unpopular, I gave myself a wedgie, stuffed myself into a locker and stole my own lunch money. I always figured I would save anyone else the trouble. User-friendliness and all that.

Needless to say, I didn't get out nearly enough, so I sat at home on weekends, reading the dictionary a few times, and that's why I use big words like "melba toast," "conflagration," "psychologically dysfunctional" and "tree." The result is that I didn't get much training in social stuff. However, the dictionary paid off — me talkie good.

And now we get to the topic of this column, which is, namely, Mario López, or, as he's more popularly known, A.C. Slater on television's "Saved By the Bell." He must have an easy time finding dates. After all, he was with Jessie Spano, played by Elizabeth Berkley, who we all remember from "Showgirls," which means he couldn't have done that badly.

In any event, it was on "Saved by the Bell" where I learned what it would be like to be a teen-ager before I got the zits and the new hair and the cracking voice and the body odor.

It is unfortunate that I got this information from that particular TV show instead of some other, more realistic source, like "Baywatch." "Saved by the Bell" taught me that it was easy to get into relationships with a myriad of beautiful women, and I have decided that this is a blatant fallacy. The truth about men and women is a little more sinister.

I look at my history of dating, and I'm certain that right around third grade things took a drastic turn for the worst. Think about it:

In preschool, if you liked a girl, you threw sand at her, and then you went and played with a G.I. Joe. That was good. It was a highly effective way of showing affection, primarily because you knew that things were going well as long as you never ran out of sand, and throwing sand doesn't leave you emotionally vulnerable.

Then there was elementary school, where girls you liked could check a box under the question "Would you like to go out with me Y, N ?"

But it was in junior high that things got really weird. Instead of skate parties we had dances, and while it was OK to skate a few laps during a slow song with a girl, dancing was a whole different ball game. For starters, none of us had the first clue how to dance, let alone with (gulp) girls. As a result, the guys would stand on one side of the room and mosh to AC/DC while the girls would stand on the other side and do girl things.

There were a few of us who would cross the border in an attempt to communicate — unsuccessfully. We accepted this and decided not to try any further crossings. It was the big awkward.

High school was different, and actually a little better than junior high. At least we were finding our identities. At least we had cars and had stopped going to the mall.

But my problem was always that I couldn't talk to girls I liked. Being the dork that I am, I would see the object of my affections, and then the connection between my brain and mouth would short-circuit.

GIRL: "Hello, Jon, how's it going?"

JON'S BRAIN: "Why, things are delightful. How exciting it is to see you. You look beautiful. Are things going well in your neck of the woods?"

JON'S MOUTH: "Hi, huh-huh, huh-huh. Pretty."

GIRL: "Uhh, are you all right, Jon? Do you need help?"

JON'S BRAIN: "Gracious, no. Please forgive that embarrassing outburst. I just felt the need to express my affection in some manner. I seem to have gotten a bit muddled, dash it all."

JON'S MOUTH: "Hi, huh-huh, huh-huh. Pretty."

Welcome to college, which for all intents and purposes is still just as awkward as junior high, because we still can't dance, we still mosh to AC/DC, and we still keep away from the opposite sex, except now we have alcohol to raise our confidence, so we don't need to avoid each other as much physically. Mentally, things are different. You can have a few drinks and think you're Don Juan. In reality you're a little bit off.

GIRL: "Hello Jon, how's it going?"

JON'S BRAIN: "Beer!"

JON'S MOUTH: "Beer (burp)!"

Well, that's a little better, I suppose.

Truth be told, it's probably best to keep your mouth shut. If that's the case, then Mario López must do pretty well. I don't have the looks to meet the requirement, but by the same token a group of my friends met López in New Orleans, and he hung out with them for about 40 minutes, laughing and talking, offering to buy them drinks. When they accepted his offer, he ordered the drinks then skipped out before they arrived, pointing in the direction of my friends and saying: "These chumps have the bill."

Nice guy. I can see why so many women like him.

I have a feeling that most of the folks out there are dorks like me, though, and less like López, so it's probably my best bet to keep the sand pail on standby.

Nations meet to discuss greenhouse gas emissions

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in physics. You can send e-mail to Jonathan at jnw@ksu.edu.

In Kyoto, the countries of the world have been meeting to discuss cutting greenhouse gas emissions. Although this conference is similar in topic to the environmental summit at Rio de Janeiro in 1992, to which the United States did not send any delegates, it is more urgent.

The expected result of the meeting is a treaty that will be binding upon the negotiating countries and will commit them all to reducing greenhouse gas emissions in one way or another.

This conference is also a chance for 150 other countries to throw pies at the United States. Unfortunately, we deserve it. With only one-twentieth of the world population, we produce one-fourth of the annual increase in greenhouse gases.

Although we have implemented strict emissions controls on our cars, which create a large fraction of the greenhouse gases that the Kyoto conference seeks to regulate, we have kept gas prices low. So low, according to some estimates, that they are lower in real terms than in 1949. The American consumer has felt free to shift to gas-wasters such as sport-utility vehicles so the average fuel economy per vehicle in this country has dropped in the past 10 years.

Although the United States is now the biggest greenhouse gas headache on the planet, it will soon be supplanted in that role by China. Chinese consumers — with a lot more cash in their pockets due to double-digit economic growth — want the same standard of living as their Western counterparts.

This means replacing the "iron rooster" — the train system — and bicycles with automobiles. It would take about 40 years for the street systems in its largest cities to catch up with the increasing automobile traffic load. Until that happens, the Chinese can look forward to gridlock, fuel waste and smog. The greenhouse gases from a billion or so automobiles operating on congested roadways would far exceed the United States' current greenhouse emissions.

So what to do? Should we just say no to the Chinese consumer? This would be hypocritical and impractical, even if the Chinese government were willing to listen to us — and it seems to expect us to listen to them, instead. A better way — especially since the growth of automobile use in China and other developing countries is inevitable — is for American and European automobile manufacturers to use China as a proving ground for their new, fuel-efficient technologies. The Chinese are not yet as used to heavy, powerful and silent cars as Americans, so they do not demand them to the point where it becomes impossible to produce economy cars due to small-volume inefficiencies.

Chinese consumers can be expected to want cars that does not put a drain on their increasing, but still-meager, resources. The large Chinese market would give American manufacturers a chance to experiment with new fuel-saving technologies, such as continuously variable transmissions or engines that can be shut off while waiting at lights in city traffic, while producing such cars in enough volume to turn a profit. Refined versions of these ideas — cutting noise and increasing power without subtracting weight or fuel efficiency — could then be put in cars for the American market, where, if equipped with luxury-car amenities, they'd probably find buyers.

But we can't afford to dawdle. The South Koreans and Japanese have the same idea.

Student thanks Commerce Bank for good service

Editor,

I am writing to you about the fine job the Commerce Bank office in the K-State Student Union has been providing in service to students.

Although I arrived in Manhattan just a few months ago, I have had several enjoyable experiences with the fine people of our campus Commerce Bank office.

An incident that highlights the services of Commerce Bank occurred when I recently changed my account. I was surprised at how easily the transition was made and felt completely comfortable with the help offered to me by Mina Glenn.

Glenn was especially helpful and answered all my questions relating to the change. In typical Commerce Bank fashion, I was treated politely and with the utmost respect throughout the entire process, making my account change all the more easy.

I have heard reports that Commerce Bank has been perceived as unhelpful or even hostile toward some students. I have found nothing of the sort with my experiences.

I'm sure there are numerous other students who share my positive experiences with the fine people of Commerce Bank.

Undefeated Cornhuskers, Wolverines fight for title in polls

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Unable to match the top two teams in the nation, the Orange Bowl on Sunday went for the next best game — No. 2 Nebraska vs. No. 3 Tennessee and Heisman Trophy hopeful Peyton Manning.

With No. 1 Michigan playing No. 8 Washington State in the Rose Bowl on Jan. 1, the Orange Bowl could turn into a national title game only if the Cougars (10-1) upset the Wolverines (11-0).

The Orange is this year's top bowl alliance game and went for the highest-ranked teams available.

The Sugar Bowl will match No. 4 Florida State (10-1) against No. 9 Ohio State (10-2), while the Fiesta went for No. 10 K-State (10-1) vs. No. 14 Syracuse (9-3).

"It was a very close decision," said Keith Tribble, the Orange Bowl's executive director. "We had an undefeated and No. 2 Nebraska, and we needed to get the No. 3 team and that was Tennessee."

But just barely. The Volunteers (11-1) got four touchdown passes from Manning to edge Auburn in 30-29 in the SEC title game on Saturday night. The result allowed the Vols to retain the No. 3 ranking over the Seminoles.

"It was an outside chance we had anyway," Florida State coach Bobby Bowden said of getting into the Orange Bowl. "But we're just happy to be playing Ohio State in the Sugar Bowl. It should be a great game."

Automatic bowl alliance bids go to the ACC, Big East, Big 12 and SEC champions, with two at-large bids available.

The conference title winners were Florida State (ACC), Syracuse (Big East), Nebraska (Big 12) and Tennessee (SEC). Ohio State, second in the Big Ten, and K-State were the at-large picks, with No. 5 UCLA and No. 7 North Carolina left out of the alliance.

"There will always be a little controversy, but I'm not sure that controversy shouldn't be a part of this game," said Roy Kramer, the bowl alliance coordinator and SEC commissioner. "That's what makes it great. We'll have a little bit of that, but most years we've always ended up a consensus No. 1 vs. No. 2 and we've seen that in the last two or three years and I think we'll have that in the future."

Next season, the Rose Bowl and Big Ten and Pac-10 conferences become part of the alliance. If that were the case this season, a true national title game would have matched No. 1 Michigan against No. 2 Nebraska (12-0).

But for the second-straight year, the top two teams will play games 3,000 miles apart.

Last year, Ohio State beat Arizona State 20-17 in the Rose Bowl and spoiled the Sun Devils' national title hopes. The result also turned the Jan. 2 Sugar Bowl into a true title game when Florida, ranked third at the time, beat a No. 1 Florida State 52-20 for its first national championship.

This time, it's the No. 1 team that has to lose in the Rose Bowl to give Nebraska or Tennessee a title shot.

Huskers coach Tom Osborne, whose team is 59-3 the past five seasons with national titles in 1994 and 1995, knows all about the twists and turns of winning a championship.

"In 1994, we were fortunate to be voted No. 1 and Penn State was undefeated and didn't get that opportunity," Osborne said. "Sometimes it happens that way, and all we can control is our own level of play and hope we play well on January 2 and then see what people think when it's finished."

A look at the rest of the bowl lineup, with several spots still not filled, includ-

Davis finds out life on, off court pose different challenges

Tom Asbury's eyes said it all. He stood in front of the podium at his Monday press conference. Everyone knew he didn't want to be there.

Less than 68 hours before, he praised his starting point guard, Duane Davis. Davis scored 26 points Saturday. He made three pointers like he was practicing on a Nerf hoop at home. Each time the same motion. Each time the perfect feel. Swish. Six three-pointers in all, and he broke former K-State great Steve Henson's record for three-point percentage in a game.

He could do no wrong.

A wide-eyed Davis was surrounded by reporters after the game. Although his five-foot-11-inch frame looked up to foreign faces who popped off questions, for the moment, everyone looked up to Davis. They looked at the magical hands that could do no wrong.

What was it like to hit six three-pointers without missing a single one?

He stood and talked in front of TV cameras, in front of the writers present who would reveal to the folks back at Fairfax High School in Los Angeles that their former Los Angeles High School Player of the Year did well.

Oh, his former high school coach, Harvey Kitani, would be so proud. Somewhere, Arizona State was slapping itself for letting a player like Davis slip though their fingers.

Ten hours later, Davis was arrested for his second DUI charge in 10 months and 20 days.

And Tom Asbury stood in front of cameras and reporters Monday, nursing a black eye for K-State and NCAA basketball.

This was no P.J. Carlesimo vs. Latrell Sprewell incident. This was Asbury and Davis. Calvin and Hobbes. Seinfeld and Kramer. Asbury even joked about yelling at his point guard during games, saying, "he's an extension of me and since I've used up my eligibility, I'm not going to yell at me."

Davis totaled his 1996 Toyota 4-Runner during his first incident at 11:28 p.m. Jan. 18 in Manhattan. He hit two vehicles and ran over some shrubbery. He was arrested for reckless driving and released on $500 bond.

At 2:07 a.m. Sunday morning, Davis was pulled over for his second DUI. This time, he didn't bother to take the breath test. He was arrested. He went to the police station. He refused to take the test again.

SOPHOMORE SENSATION

Randy Moss doesn't play for one of college football's most prestigious schools, but one thing is certain: This Heisman candidate is a big-time player.

HUNTINGTON, W.Va. — When Randy Moss showed up at Florida State, Coach Bobby Bowden was almost giddy about his new wide receiver.

"He can run, he can jump, but what he does best is run like a scalded dog," Bowden said before Moss ran afoul of the law and was kicked off the team.

A year and another school later, Moss hasn't stop running. And no one can catch him.

"Nobody in America can cover him," Ball State Coach Bill Lynch said after Moss caught five touchdown passes in Marshall's 42-16 victory against the Cardinals.

The only sophomore among this year's Heisman Trophy candidates, Moss set the Division I-A single-season mark with 25 receiving touchdowns — five covering 70 yards or more — and has caught 90 passes for 1,647 yards to set a Mid-American Conference record.

In two seasons, he has scored 53 TDs for Marshall.

"He's doing this with people putting triple coverage on him," Marshall coach Bob Pruett said. "They doubled and triple-teamed Randy, but he always seems to find a way to make big plays."

At 6-foot-5, Moss is taller than most defensive backs and he's faster, with 4.25 speed in the 40-yard-dash. He's also got an impressive 39-inch vertical leap and huge hands with tentacle-like fingers that rarely drop passes.

The 1997 Randy Moss highlight film begins with a 90-yard touchdown against Army.

Cradling a screen pass behind the line of scrimmage on his own five, Moss took off across the field, faking two linemen off their feet, stiff-arming another defender, hurdling yet another and, without losing a step, accelerating down the left sideline while the rest of the field seemed to be in slow motion.

Already named the MAC Player of the Year and a finalist for the Biletnikoff Award given to the nation's best receiver, Moss is setting new standards for receivers, having scored at least one touchdown in each of his 27 college games.

But Moss says he would rather watch the Heisman Trophy ceremony Dec. 13 on his living room television than in person. He is one of four players invited to New York for the ceremony.

"I think just for the fact that I'm coming out of a small school here in Huntington, it would be very difficult for me to win it," Moss said.

"Hopefully it's not that big of a factor, but deep down inside I think it is."

Moss' college career was almost over before it began.

One of West Virginia's most celebrated high school athletes, Moss was going to Notre Dame, but the Irish revoked the scholarship after he was charged with attacking another student at DuPont High School.

Moss pleaded guilty to battery and was sentenced to 30 days in jail. He was allowed to defer most of the sentence until after his freshman year in college.

Florida State was quick to roll out the welcome mat, but a year later rolled it back up when Moss violated his probation by smoking marijuana. A one-year jail sentence was reduced a month later to time served after he completed algebra and speech communications classes in a work-study program.

Although Moss never played at Florida State, Bowden was well aware of his talent.

"He's just got so many tools, limitless tools," the coach said after watching Moss practice.

After his release from jail, Moss walked on at Marshall and scored 28 touchdowns, leading the Thundering Herd to the Division I-AA championship and a 15-0 record. This season, Marshall (10-2) returned to Division I-A after a 28-year absence and faces Mississippi in the Motor City Bowl on Dec. 26.

But can a wide receiver in the MAC win the Heisman? For that matter, can a wide receiver from any school win it? The last receiver to win

K-STATE SPORTS INFORMATION

Trips to Arizona and Louisiana in the first month of the season kick off a 57-game schedule for K-State baseball in 1998.

The Wildcats will take part in the Spring Training Tournament to open the season Feb. 6-8 in Phoenix, meeting up with teams from three of the nation's premier conferences in Indiana (Big 10), New Mexico State (WAC) and Kentucky (SEC). K-State also travels to Monroe, La., Feb. 20-22 for the Century Cellunet Classic against Northeast Louisiana and Southeastern Louisiana.

The Wildcats will play 13 of their first 16 games away from Frank Myers Field, the longest early-season stretch away from home since K-State played 13 straight games away from Manhattan between Feb. 17 and March 10, 1996. The Wildcats will open the home portion of their schedule Feb. 11 against Missouri Western, the fifth-consecutive year K-State has begun with a game against Coach Mike Clark's alma matter.

The rest of the non-conference schedule features games with Air Force, Fort Hays State, Howard and Bethany, as well as 1997 NCAA tournament participants Wichita State and Cal State-Northridge. The Big 12 season gets into full swing Feb. 27-March 1 with a three-game series at Missouri. The Wildcats will play five games against Kansas, including a three-game conference series May 1-3 in Manhattan. In addition, homestands against Oklahoma State, Texas, Nebraska and Baylor will give fans around Manhattan an opportunity to see some of the conference's best teams.

GRISSOM TRADED AGAIN

CLEVELAND — In a stunning turnaround, the Cleveland Indians today signed Kenny Lofton and traded Marquis Grissom to Milwaukee for three pitchers including Ben McDonald.

The Brewers planned an announcement for 5 p.m. EST, and the Indians were putting together plans for theirs.

Grissom, acquired with David Justice from Atlanta for Alan Embree and Lofton on March 25, was sent to the Brewers for McDonald and relievers Ron Villone and Mike Fetters, according to baseball sources who spoke on the condition they not be identified.

The moves reunited Lofton, a four-time Gold Glove and five-time AL stolen base champion, with the team he led to the World Series in 1995.

UNC APPOINTS NEW COACH

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — North Carolina will appoint defensive coordinator Carl Torbush as its new football coach today.

The school called a news conference for 5:30 p.m. and will announce Torbush's hiring, a source said. Torbush spent the morning in a meeting with Tar Heels athletic director Dick Baddour.

Torbush was the defensive coordinator under Mack Brown, who resigned last week to replace John Mackovic at Texas.

On Sunday, Georgia coach Jim Donnan turned down a chance to coach the Tar Heels.

The seventh-ranked Tar Heels (10-1) will play Virginia Tech (7-4) in the Gator Bowl on Jan. 1.

ALI'S MENTOR DIES

NEW ORLEANS — Willie Pastrano, a light heavyweight champion in the 1960s and the man who taught Muhammad Ali to dance in the ring, is dead at age 62.

He died Saturday of inoperable cancer that started in his liver and spread.

Nicknamed "Willie the Wisp," Pastrano had a record of 63-13-8, with 14 knockouts, fighting light heavyweights and heavyweights in his prime.

Pastrano had fought 77 times before winning the light heavyweight title from Harold Johnson in 1963.

He lost the crown when he was stopped by Jose Torres on March 30, 1965.

Pastrano then began to abuse drugs and alcohol, nearly dying of a heroin overdose.

He eventually straightened his life out and returned to New Orleans, where he dabbled in boxing and lived on Social Security disability checks.

"Boxing is hard," Pastrano said in a 1993 interview. "It's the only one-on-one sport we've got. Just one-on-one. About as fair a shake as you can get in life. No cutting. No shooting. If you win and don't get the decision, the crowd knows.

"It's a hard game to take a pass on. If I had to do it all over again, I'd do it the same way."

COLORADO SNAGS TEXAS QUARTERBACK

BOULDER, Colo. — Zac Colvin, rated among the nation's top high school quarterbacks, has made a verbal commitment to attend the University of Colorado.

The 6-foot-5, 205-pound Colvin said Sunday he is "99.9 percent sure I'm going to Colorado" but still plans to make a recruiting trip to the University of Arizona next weekend.

"Coach (Rick) Neuheisel has to be one of the best quarterback coaches in the country," Colvin said. "Colorado didn't recruit a quarterback last year, so it's a great opportunity for me."

Colvin, rated No. 3 among high school senior quarterbacks by the National Recruiting Advisor, threw for 1,406 yards and nine touchdowns this season for Lee High School in San Antonio.

UMPIRES LOSE BATTLE WITH TELEVISION

NEW YORK — In their battle with television, the umpires' decision wasn't final.

Baseball umpires have been ordered by an arbitrator to use stopwatches between innings to ensure that pitches aren't thrown before television is back on the air from commercial breaks.

Umpires balked last spring at using the stopwatches to make sure that breaks were 2 minutes, 25 seconds during nationally televised Saturday afternoon and Sunday night games and 2:05 for other regular-season games.

The American and National leagues filed a grievance and, for once, baseball owners won.

"This is a powerful wakeup call that the umpires work for the leagues and should comply to appropriate direction," said Robert Kheel, the lawyer who represents the leagues in the dealings with umpires.

Umpires argued that timing the breaks wasn't covered by their collective bargaining agreement.

"We are not going to serve as lackeys for the TV networks," Pat Campbell, one of the umpires' lawyers, said after the case was argued.

Student musician trumpets jazz interest with early influence of well-known artists

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

If Chris Erker composed his music as easily as he composes himself, we might have a modern-day Mozart in our midst.

Erker, a Wellington, Kan., native and senior in music education, has an original arrangement in tonight's jazz concert in McCain Auditorium. The unassuming and laid-back musician — he plays the trumpet — began his musical journey in junior high with an introduction to classic jazz.

"It's been a long trip," Erker said. "It's hard to describe, because I know there was a point in my life where I wasn't sure music was where I could make a living. When I left it, it made me a miserable, nasty person.

"I would have to give credit to my high school band instructor. He let us hear things and took us places. I think the music was always there, I just didn't know it until people pulled it out of me."

Tonight's concert features an original Erker arrangement of "Tenderly," a standard jazz ballad composed by Walther Gross. However, Erker's musical role models fall in line with the century's heavyweights: Miles Davis, Dizzy Gillespie, Chet Baker — even John Faddis, who will headline the Basie concert next semester.

Erker also laments not being able to see much live jazz in Kansas and not having the time to drive into Kansas City, Mo., for its somewhat celebrated scene.

"Not to knock the local pop scene, but it would be nice to see a band that didn't have a drum set the size of a mountain and twelve amplifiers," Erker said.

Erker said he wished there was more opportunity to play his original music.

"If you want me to write for six bagpipes and a folding chair, I'll write for six bagpipes and a folding chair," he mused.

It's been one long jam session since Erker's first experience with K-State jazz. He remembers visiting the campus for the annual jazz festival as a seventh grader almost 20 years ago.

"It was a pretty overwhelming experience for a seventh grader," Erker said. "I can remember stepping up on the stage and thinking how big that auditorium was. I wasn't even a jazz fan before.

I really began to turn to jazz in college. I still love just about any music, but definitely jazz is my preference."

If someone can be blamed for Erker's passion for jazz and the many opportunities he's had to meet some of contemporary jazz's great musicians, blame Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies.

Wilson is the father of what Erker calls the family of the Concert Jazz Ensemble. The ensemble performs countless times a year, but mainly in four concerts: the Purple Blues Festival (earlier this semester), tonight's concert, the K-State Jazz Festival and one or two spring concerts. With a week's worth of rehearsals and many special performances, that's a lot of time with the same people.

"You spend enough time together, there are fights," Erker said. "I guess it was Woody Herman who used to call it 'the great escape.' No matter how bad things are, if you get to play the music it's an escape. Everything just goes with the music. I firmly believe that."

Erker has lived that line for the past decade or so. He originally came to K-State after high school as a pre-veterinary medicine major and spent three years studying that before realizing his true love was music. Now 31 years old, married and a part-time student, he's a bit wiser and a bit more determined to make a living in the business.

"Sometimes it's really very hard and frustrating. You feel like you'll never get anywhere," he said. "But I like it."

Erker said his wife, Vikki, a local Head Start teacher, supports his musical aspirations. "My wife is the most solid thing in my life," he said.

After graduating in May, Erker said he plans to try starting up a small music publishing company. Writing music is his love, and Wilson's instruction, especially forcing him to learn computer compositional software, has been a significant source of encouragement for him to pursue that professionally.

"The computer plays things so perfectly that when you get them in front of a human being it sounds completely different," he said. "It's so much better to be able to use the computer because it's just click, click, click and it's fixed. Not having to copy parts is the best thing."

Besides composing and arranging on computers, Erker has drawn other inspiration from Wilson.

Wilson is almost a one-person jazz program — he writes original pieces for his five or so ensembles, he's created what is arguably one of the region's best jazz festivals in the Count Basie Orchestra festival at K-State every February, and he finds time to tour the world as a member of the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band. Needless to say, those are some impressive feats for any K-State student to witness, let alone in intensive one-on-one lessons, in which Erker participates.

"He can take over a room in one second," Erker said. "It truly is a wonderful experience, but it can also be frustrating. One-on-one, he's very demanding. You're not going to get away with second-best with Dennis. He's one of the most intriguing people I know. His musical skills are untouchable."

It's clear Erker is fond of K-State's jazz program.

"I think the bottom end of every ensemble has gone up in caliber of musicianship every year," he said. "I think there's the opportunity to do something very special with the K-State jazz program."

Who knows, in a few years perhaps Wilson will be introducing the Count Basie Orchestra playing an evening of Chris Erker's music.

Concert to highlight work of student composers

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Free jazz and a warm theater await patrons of tonight's K-State jazz ensembles' concert in McCain Auditorium.

Fresh from a tour of Italy with the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band, director of jazz studies Dennis Wilson said tonight's performances are part of a composer's concert since it highlights local and student work.

Wilson has arranged two pieces himself, while students Michael Brown and Chris Erker have done one apiece.

"It gives them a chance to hear their music and me to continue teaching," Wilson said. He teaches a spring semester arranging class, of which both Brown and Erker are former students.

"They're doing well," he said. "I'll give them credit. I had to scream at them a couple of times."

The highlights of the repertoire include the Concert Jazz Ensemble on Dizzy Gillespie's "Manteca" with an arrangement by Wilson and Frank Foster's "On the Road to Kansas State," which is a piece the Count Basie Orchestra played in McCain two years ago.

"There's very little in this concert that has been published and people could buy," Wilson said.

Jazz Lab Band A and Flute Juice, the year-old flute ensemble, will also perform.

Wilson has been managing tonight's concert arrangements for the past two weeks from various locales in Italy. The Carnegie band was touring as part of the Teatro Comunale Di Ferrara although it performed in such far-flung places as Rome, Venice and Sicily.

Choir releases 1st holiday album in 20 years

CORBIN H. CRABLE
staff writer

This holiday season the K-State Choir is picking up where it left off 20 years ago.

In late November, the choir released a Christmas album titled "Carols From Kansas State University," which hasn't been done since 1977, according to Rod Walker, director of the K-State Choir.

The album, which was recorded in All Faiths Chapel, was produced because the choir needed to make more money than what is raised with regular fund-raisers. The money earned from the album will fund projects and activities in which the group is involved.

Response from the students involved with the album, Walker said, was positive overall.

"Judging from the response of the singers, there is a very positive feeling about the album," he said.

The singers said putting time into recording the album was well worth it.

"It's neat to be the beginning of a new tradition," Elisa Harry, junior in kinesiology, said. "We're hoping to get the choir known around the area, and I feel like we're giving our talent to the community."

Mark White, junior in applied music, agreed with Harry that giving their voices to the Manhattan community was worthwhile.

"Listening to the recording made it worth it," White said. He added that the goal of the choir in making this album was to "get our Christmas music out and about."

Both White and Harry said that to make the recording work, the group has to get along as a whole. If the members don't get along, it reflects in their singing. Luckily, this semester's K-State Choir has had few problems in becoming close.

"You really click after spending the whole semester together, and we're a small enough group that we know what's going on in each other's lives," Harry said.

White agreed. "One thing about the atmosphere of the K-State Choir is that everyone has the same purpose, to make music."

The Christmas album features the voices of the K-State Choir members from spring 1997. Production of the album began during the spring semester last year, and the album was released shortly before Thanksgiving break. In spring 1998, Walker will begin planning the next Christmas album, which will feature the voices of this semester's K-State Choir students.

Until then, Walker said, he is extremely pleased with this season's finished product.

"The album is a wonderful showcase for the choir," he said. "The singers are very talented and deserve to be heard on such a recording."

"Carols From Kansas State University" can be purchased for $15 on compact disc or $10 on cassette. For more information, contact the music office in McCain 109, or call 532-5740.

Author's suit against 'Amistad' denied by judge

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — A federal judge Monday refused to block the release of Steven Spielberg's "Amistad," saying the moviemaker did not appear to have plagiarized a novel about the 19th-century mutiny aboard a slave ship.

U.S. District Judge Audrey Collins rebuffed a move by Barbara Chase-Riboud to stop the film's premiere Wednesday in New York and Los Angeles and its opening on Friday in the nation's 50 biggest markets.

But the judge said Chase-Riboud can press ahead with her lawsuit and try to prove at a trial her claim that much of the "Amistad" screenplay was stolen from her historical novel "Echo of Lions."

"The judge said there was no reasonable likeliness of success on the merits of the case," said Bert Fields, an attorney for Spielberg and his DreamWorks studio. "She took apart their claims of similarities and said these things appear to come from history."

Chase-Riboud said she was disappointed but was confident she would prevail at trial, which has not yet been scheduled.

"A preliminary injunction is the only protection a poor person has against a rich infringer," she said outside court. "I'm doing this for all writers."

The dispute has turned increasingly personal and vitriolic.

"What an irony that the renowned filmmaker who produced and directed 'The Color Purple' would be a party to denying a prominent black American of letters and the arts her rightful recognition for raising public consciousness about slavery," Chase-Riboud's lawyers said in court papers.

The allegations challenge the reputation of Hollywood's best-known director over a movie Spielberg calls "perhaps the most important of my career." In turn, DreamWorks is attacking the integrity of the award-winning novelist.

The tentative ruling was made after the parties failed to reach a settlement behind closed doors. The judge's formal, final order was to be released later Monday or Tuesday.

Chase-Riboud's attorney, Pierce O'Donnell, said DreamWorks killed any possible settlement by refusing to give Chase-Riboud any screenplay or story credit.

O'Donnell said he would prove at trial that the screenwriter who received the credit for "Amistad," David Franzoni, is a "rank plagiarist who copied freely from 'Echo of Lions.'" He claimed that Spielberg tried to hide the theft by editing out incriminating scenes at the last minute.

Spielberg attorney Fields said: "We deny there was any copying. We believe we can prove there was no copying." Similarities between "Amistad" and "Echo of Lions" are simply similarities of history, he said.

Chase-Riboud's 1989 book "Echo of Lions" chronicles the real-life 1839 rebellion led by a Sierra Leone slave named Joseph Cinque, and the resulting landmark legal case, argued by John Quincy Adams before the Supreme Court.

While no one can copyright history, Chase-Riboud maintains DreamWorks illegally copied "themes, dialogue, characters, relationships, plots, scenes and fictional inventions" she created for "Echo of Lions."

DreamWorks insists its movie is an original blend of history and the historical novel "Black Mutiny," which was published 36 years before "Echo of Lions." The rights to "Black Mutiny," by William A. Owens, are now owned by DreamWorks.

DreamWorks' lawyers say Ms. Chase-Riboud herself is a plagiarist, arguing there are at least 88 similarities between "Echo of Lions" and "Black Mutiny." DreamWorks attorneys also have circulated a passage from Chase-Riboud's 1994 book "The President's Daughter" that appears almost verbatim in Nella Larsen's 1929 book "Passing."

The attorneys said Chase-Riboud was using the movie's imminent opening to pressure DreamWorks into a $5 million settlement. The fledgling studio said it has invested $70 million producing and marketing "Amistad."

"No one likes to be called a thief," Fields said. "This is a very important film for Steven. He has African-American kids he has adopted."

In court papers, Spielberg said that blocking the movie's release "would, of course, be a tragedy for our company, but I believe it would also be a serious loss to the American public."

Robert Downey Jr. gets 6 months jail time after probation violation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MALIBU, Calif. — Robert Downey Jr.'s next two movies will be out before he is.

After a string of drug arrests and second chances, the Oscar-nominated actor was slapped in handcuffs and led off to jail for six months Monday for violating probation by failing to stay clean and sober.

"I am running out of ways to rehabilitate you," said municipal judge Lawrence Mira, who in the past avoided giving Downey jail time and altered the actor's probation schedule so he could keep making movies.

"I'm going to incarcerate you, and I'm going to incarcerate you in a way that's very unpleasant for you," the judge said. "I don't care who you are. What I care about is that there is a life to be saved from drugs."

Downey, who received an Academy Award nomination for his starring role in the 1992 film "Chaplin," had been sentenced last year to three years' probation after pleading no contest to drug and weapons charges. He spent about three months in a live-in rehabilitation program.

But the probation was revoked on Oct. 17, when his drug counselor told authorities that the 32-year-old Downey had used drugs and alcohol in September. The judge could have given Downey up to three years in prison or allowed him to remain free in a rehabilitation program.

Dressed in a suit with his hair neatly combed, the actor pleaded for mercy, explaining he had been addicted to drugs since he was 8.

Despite his legal problems, Downey's movie career had been thriving. His film "One Night Stand" came out last month, and he has two movies coming out in January, "The Gingerbread Man" and "Two Girls and a Guy."

Flight 800 transcript released

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE — In the final moments before TWA Flight 800 exploded, pilots chatted about restless passengers, a wildly fluctuating fuel gauge and how the jet was handling sluggishly, like a "homesick angel."

At the end, there is an abrupt, tenth-of-a-second noise that trails off into silence, possibly the sound of the center fuel tank exploding.

The 54-page transcript released Monday during the opening of federal hearings into the July 17, 1996, disaster was described by investigators as routine conversation, revealing nothing unusual leading up to the blast aboard the Paris-bound flight that killed all 230 people aboard.

Having ruled out a bomb or missile, investigators are searching for a mechanical explanation for the explosion in the Boeing 747's center fuel tank. Their goal: to prevent something similar from happening again.

National Transportation Safety Board Chairman James Hall warned victims' relatives attending the hearings that they might want to leave the room before another exhibit — a videotape simulation that chronicled the disaster second by second, picking up where the cockpit voice recorder left off.

It shows the explosion, the nose of the plane shearing off, while the fuselage continues to rise. Suddenly, the plane slows and begins dropping, diving for a long time before bursting into flames and crashing into the Atlantic Ocean off New York's Long Island.

On the transcript, a comment from TWA Capt. Steven Snyder, six minutes before the explosion, appeared intriguing and a little eerie.

"Seems like a homesick angel here," Snyder said, using pilot lingo to say the plane did not seem to be going as fast as it should.

"It's bleeding off airspeed," Capt. Ralph Kevorkian responded, implying that the minor decrease in speed was not a problem.

"Yeah," Kevorkian said, ending that discussion.

Investigators have said the flight data recorder showed nothing unusual.

Then, two minutes before the explosion, Snyder said: "Look at that crazy fuel flow indicator there on No. 4. See that."

Alfred Dickinson, the NTSB chief investigator, testified that it is not unusual for the indicator to fluctuate. Investigators cautioned that the transcript can be misleading if parts are taken out of context. Dickinson said the pilot communications seemed routine.

At 8:30:15 p.m., Boston Air Traffic Control told Flight 800 that it could climb from 13,000 to 15,000 feet.

"Climb thrust," Snyder said before quickly adding, "Climb to one five thousand."

"Power's set," said flight engineer Richard Campbell, indicating he had adjusted the power to allow the plane to go higher. It was 8:30:35 p.m. Those were the last words from the plane. Thirty-seven seconds later, it blew up.

The transcript chronicled more than 31 minutes of conversation, beginning when a gate agent at Kennedy International Airport told the cockpit crew that everyone was seated for the flight to Paris.

The flight had been delayed more than an hour because a piece of luggage seemed to be aboard without the passenger. It later turned out that the passenger had been aboard the whole time.

"We won't bother telling them that," Snyder said of the restless passengers.

"We'd have a mutiny back there," Campbell said.

Also Monday, FBI Assistant Director James Kallstrom met with about 75 family members of victims to brief them on the criminal investigation he suspended three weeks ago after finding no proof of a bomb or a missile.

NTSB's Hall told the hearing that such theories as lightning, bird strikes, a bullet and a laser beam were eliminated, and the investigation was focusing on the explosion of the center fuel tank.

Hall noted that the explosion was "an extremely rare event" and said Boeing 747's have an "admirable safety record."

Still, he said, the Federal Aviation Administration was trying to eliminate every possible ignition source to prevent similar fuel tank explosions.

"I, for one, don't see how every ignition source can ever be eliminated," Hall said, adding that a more attainable goal would be "to try to eliminate explosive vapors in fuel tanks."

Tests have shown that vapors in the nearly empty center fuel tank were probably ready to explode even before the plane left the ground.

Temperatures in the tank were as high as 145 degrees while the plane sat on the runway and parts of air conditioning units less than a foot from the fuel tank heated up to nearly 400 degrees.

One theory is that a surge of electricity from damaged wiring could have sparked the blast.

"This is the big issue," said NTSB spokesman Peter Goelz. "Our job is to make recommendations so that these accidents don't happen again."

Pacific storm kills 3, causes heavy damage

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAGUNA BEACH, Calif. — Light rain continued to fall early today as crews cleaned up from a powerful Pacific storm that flooded homes and was blamed for at least one death.

This renowned art colony where a 1993 fire wrecked 441 homes felt the brunt of the weekend storm. Flooding was so widespread that Orange County supervisors declared a local state of emergency that will help the area apply for aid.

"When you live in California, this is the bottom line," said Robbin Maddox, assistant manager of the Big Dog sportswear shop, which had 2 inches of mud on the floors. "You get fires, and floods and mudslides and it's a beautiful place."

The storm dumped more than 7 inches of rain in Laguna Beach, flooded mobile home parks up the coast and dropped snow in the Southern California mountains, where a hiker missing through the stormy weekend was found dead Sunday.

Searchers found the body of missing hiker Karen Tellez, 40, in the snowy Angeles National Forest. The Palmdale woman became separated from friends Friday and was believed to have died of exposure.

Poor weather also hampered emergency crews trying to reach the crash site of a plane that went down in rainy weather on Sunday, killing two people.

The Cessna 172 crashed at the 3,000-foot level of the rugged Lytle Creek area near the San Bernardino National Forest. It was not immediately clear if the weather was responsible.

The two-day storm flooded or damaged dozens of homes in several counties, including more than 20 in Riverside County. Dozens of people were forced to flee two Huntington Beach mobile home parks as water rose several feet deep.

Bulldozers pushed mud out of downtown Laguna Beach, where runoff Saturday turned into a torrent that undermined the oceanfront boardwalk.

Sandbags proved useless when 7.7 inches of rain saturated the hillsides and sent torrents of brown runoff from the steep canyons pouring into the streets and stores of this quaint arts community.

No damage totals were available, but many stores remained closed Sunday.

Employees shoveled mud and dried out carpets at Edwards South Coast Cinema on Pacific Coast Highway. The movie that was playing: "John Grisham's The Rainmaker."

But with weather forecasters predicting clearer weather for at least a week, merchants and residents were optimistic.

"This cleaning-out is just good aerobics," Maddox said.

Attorneys fight state's sexual-predator laws

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Attorneys tried Monday to convince the Kansas Supreme Court to limit the number of criminals who can be confined indefinitely as sexual predators.

The attorneys attacked the state's Violent Sexual Predator Act, which took effect in 1994. It allows a jury or judge to declare a criminal a sexual predator and confine the offender for treatment, even after the criminal finishes a prison term.

The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the law as constitutional in June, after it was struck down by Kansas justices a year ago. Since then, it has become a model for officials in other states.

In their first consideration of the issue since the U.S. Supreme Court ruling, the Kansas justices heard arguments in the appeals of two men declared sexual predators and whose attorneys are raising new legal issues. The justices are expected to issue its opinions Jan. 23.

Attorney General Carla Stovall said she believes the June ruling is definitive enough that another case on the sexual predator law will not be considered by the nation's highest court.

Stovall did not attend Monday's arguments before the Kansas court. She did have a news conference to discuss the law because of a visit to the state by South Carolina Attorney General Charles Condon. South Carolina legislators are expected to consider sexual-predator legislation next year.

Condon said the U.S. Supreme Court opinion is "as clear as it can be."

"Kansas has got the model act," he said.

The first case before the Kansas Supreme Court involves Kenneth M. Hay, declared a sexual predator in 1995 by a Johnson County jury. Hay's confinement came after he served time in prison for trying to entice young girls to watch him perform sex acts.

The second case is from Sedgwick County, where a judge declared that John R. Miller was a sexual predator. Miller spent time in prison for three sex crimes involving children since 1974.

In both cases, prosecutors argued that because of the U.S. Supreme Court decision, the Kansas court must uphold the sexual-predator law and find that it applies to Hay and Miller.

In Hay's case, his attorney, Nancy Orrick of Olathe, said the sexual-predator law should not apply because none of Hay's crimes involved violence or even force.

Hay would drive up residential streets in the summer and try to get young girls to come to his car, where he exposed himself. Prosecutors suggested his crimes might become more serious in the future, but Orrick said there was no real supporting evidence.

Orrick said if the Kansas court allows Hay's designation as a sexual predator to stand the law "is going to take in everybody."

Miller's attorney Geary Gorup of Wichita, wants the court to return the case to Sedgwick County. Gorup contends the state did not provide enough evidence that Miller actually would receive meaningful treatment while confined by the state at the Larned Correctional Mental Health Center.

Treatment is a key issue because the U.S. Supreme Court's decision upholding the sexual-predator law was 5-4, and Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote an opinion saying the state must provide treatment for the law to be constitutional.

When CNS does find that the policy has been broken, there are several steps that they take in order to reprimand the individual.

"We talk to them first and most people realize that they did something wrong and they clean up their acts," Conrow said.

Their user-IDs are then disabled for up to a week.

On second offense, they are spoken to again about the problem and the user-IDs are then disabled for several weeks.

If no change in behavior occurs, students are sent before a judicial committee for release from the university.

"Faculty and staff are sent to the department head for action," Conrow said.

He said this had not occured in the past several years.

Conrow said most universities follow similar policies for privacy.

"It follows what most universities do but it may not be as strict as those at private schools and universities," he said.

Health Fee to Senate with a favorable recommendation.

Most of the Student Health Fee conversation centered around a section of the legislation that said a $5 per-visit charge should be implemented by Lafene and no privilege fees or self-generated money will be used to pay for the salary of a position at Disabled Student Services. The position is federally mandated by the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Some committee members said they were concerned about whether senators had the ability to dictate how Lafene spent the money it generated from its operation.

Jeff Meder, committee member and business administration senator, said the committee should only recommend a per-visit charge and no fee money being spent on the ADA-required position.

"It's evident that administration wants this to be a recommendation," Meder said.

Some committee members and high-level administrators met Thursday about the provision in the bill.

If a student fee is passed, the administration must also approve the bill before it is sent to the Kansas Board of Regents.

Committee member and Veterinary Medicine Sen. Aaron Truax said administrators would take a recommendation less seriously.

"Every time we make a recommendation, it goes nowhere. We send it over, and they do nothing," Truax said.

Patrick Carney, Governmental Relations Committee chair, said he agreed with Truax. He said it went against the intent of the bill to only recommend the provisions.

"If you move section two out as recommendations, you only remove all the teeth," Carney said.

Kim Peschka, committee secretary and arts and sciences senator, saw the discussion in a different light.

"Everything we pass in Student Senate is a recommendation," Peschka said. "And teeth can only be so sharp."

Board approves poster supporting homosexuals

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHESTERTON, Ind. — A poster promoting tolerance for homosexuals can stay in the classroom where Bonney Leckie teaches English.

The Duneland School Corp. voted 4-1 Monday to uphold a district committee's decision that the poster at Chesterton High School met curriculum standards.

"If this poster gets one kid to think, if it gets one child to not categorize or stereotype people, if it gets one kid to not use that derogatory word that we all know, then I think its educational value is inarguable," said Michael Griffin, a school board member.

The black and white poster has photographs of 10 famous historical figures, including Cole Porter, Walt Whitman, Michaelangelo and Eleanor Roosevelt, with a caption that reads: "Sexual orientation has nothing to do with the ability to make a mark, let alone make history."

Cathy and David Podguski, whose son Michael took English with Leckie last year as a freshman, brought the complaint with evangelist Pat Robertson's American Center for Law and Justice. The couple declined to comment after the meeting and their attorney, Charlie Rice, said an appeal is likely.

Leckie said she put the poster up at least six years ago to remind her students they live in a world with many different types of people and to be tolerant.

Dawn Rogers, the lone board member to vote against the poster, said she was concerned the board might be taking away parents' rights to decide what values their children are taught.

"My definition of diversity may be different from others. My definition of tolerance may be different from others," Rogers said. "We may be intruding on other people's values, other people's beliefs. We may be intruding on parental rights, what values I want instilled in my daughter."

MOSS

it was Michigan's Desmond Howard in 1991.

"If the Heisman Trophy is for the best college player who does the most for his team, I think Randy deserves a shot," said Marshall quarterback Chad Pennington. "When the offense needs a big play, he's going to make one almost every time."

Nonetheless, the award is expected to go to players at higher-profile programs such as Tennessee's Peyton Manning, Michigan's Charles Woodson, or Ryan Leaf at Washington State.

But one-by-one, Moss has made believers out of each of his opponents.

"I don't know about the Heisman Trophy because I'm not into that. But anyone who can run that fast is special," said West Virginia coach Don Nehlen, whose team defeated Marshall 42-31 despite Moss' two touchdowns.

Moss has tried to deflect some of the attention toward his teammates. But he may also be trying to avoid the kind of negative publicity that came with his arrests and frankness.

He was sharply criticized in West Virginia after he told Sports Illustrated and the Los Angeles Times that he did not like the state and wanted to leave as quickly as possible.

Moss also drew heavy criticism when he said he didn't know much about the 1970 plane crash that wiped out Marshall's team in 1970, and, while calling it a tragedy, he said it wasn't a big deal.

Pruett says he and Moss have not discussed the Heisman or Moss' future. But he thinks Moss will go to the NFL rather than return for his junior season.

Moss says he has set no timetable and has enrolled for spring semester classes. The Heisman, Moss says with a shrug, would be nice, but losing won't break his heart.

In fact, he's weary of answering questions about it.

"This Heisman thing is not so big to me. If the trophy comes, great. I mean, if it wouldn't hurt anybody's feelings, I'd watch it on TV. I never really did set any individual goals for myself."

And Asbury stood in front of the microphone at the press conference. His eyes watered from the intense light from four TV cameras. He wore black, fidgeted and scratched his nose while fielding questions about Wednesday's game against Wichita State.

Everyone feared to ask the question. There was the trust factor. The playing-time factor. Most of all, there was the evident hurt that emitted from Asbury's tired eyes.

"Yeah it hurts," he said. "What would you think?" He shakes his head. "I'm not going to get into that with you at this point in time."

Pause.

"You'd hope things like that wouldn't happen, but you just deal with that internally and move on."

Coaches can be too hard on athletes. Asbury agrees with that. No question. But Asbury isn't too tough on his team. He yells during games. He tells his players to listen to what he says, not how he says it. He instills his faith in his point guard, his man, to orchestrate his team. To make the right choices and eliminate mental mistakes that hinder the success of a basketball team.

Asbury talks to his team every day about issues on and off the court. Academics. Personal problems. Family. "Literally, every day," Asbury insists. "Every day we're together we talk about that."

Asbury loves his team. He talks to each player's family and lets them know how their son is doing. Well, there's good news and bad news.

No doubt, Davis will contribute to K-State's success this season. He's a great player. He's a great shooter. Heck, his name is now in K-State record books.

P.J. Carlesimo has a red scratch on his neck. It will go away soon.

Although Asbury has an unscarred face, he now faces a mental dilemma. He has a great point guard who makes correct decisions with the ball.

Trouble is, with two strikes against his personal record, the only driving Davis could be doing for a while is on the basketball court.

He just finished filming "U.S. Marshals," a sequel to "The Fugitive," and was about to start work on "Blue Vision" with Annette Bening.

As he was led out of court, Downey nodded and smiled to supporters in the audience, including his wife and brother.

Downey's problems began in 1996 when police stopped him for speeding and found crack, powdered cocaine, heroin and a pistol in his pickup truck. A month later, he wandered into a neighbor's home and passed out on a child's bed. Three days later, he was arrested for leaving a recovery center.

Mira had altered the actor's probation last June so that he could make a movie. Mira agreed to postpone any jail time Downey might receive if he had a relapse during the making of "U.S. Marshals." Producers feared an arrest would disrupt the production.

Downey's other movies include "Less Than Zero," "Restoration" and "Natural Born Killers."

Faculty use forum to question direction of campus planning

IVAN KOZAR/Collegian
Dick Hayter, chair of the Campus Development Committee, spoke at a campus forum on capital planning for K-State on Tuesday afternoon in Kedzie 106.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

About 20 people who turned out for K-State's first public forum on capital improvement projects came with questions about a new direction of campus planning.

The forum began with a presentation by Dick Hayter, chair of the Campus Development Committee, who presented the campus planning process and the new campus master plan document, "Campus Planning: People, Principles, and Process."

That document seeks to put on paper broad principles and objectives and some specific guidelines for campus development.

It is being developed by the Campus Development Committee. It is available through the facilities planning office, although it is in a draft form that will not be completed until next semester.

The forum concluded with an open question-and-answer session moderated by Hayter. Some asked why campus planners have focused on developing a philosophical master plan document for campus, as opposed to a physical plan.

▶ Look in the archives. Read another story about campus planning in the eCollegian archives. collegian.ksu.edu/issues/v102/fa/n071/news/cam-planning-fort.html

Mark Shapiro, head of the Department of Architecture, asked why K-State's public realm has been allowed to deteriorate.

"In a sense, the campus urban model has been replaced by a suburban model," Shapiro said. "We need a physical version of what the campus is going to be."

Shapiro cited campuses such as Princeton and Carnegie-Melon as having successful physical plans that have shaped the campuses in decades of building projects.

A physical plan, as opposed to K-State's philosophical one, would entail proposed building placements and possible areas designated for campus development.

Shapiro also suggested professionals from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design be invited to work with the development committee, because many of them have experience in campus planning.

The inclusion of design faculty in campus planning has long been a contentious subject at K-State. As recently as early 1996, some architecture professors expressed concern about the planning process of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. At that time, administrators dismissed their reservations.

Shapiro's willingness to voice those concerns in a forum suggests a change. Later during the questions, Shapiro again questioned the direction of campus planning and asked who was caring for K-State's public realm.

"A campus is a built and designed thing — not just a collection of buildings," he said. "I think that's something we have to be aware of. Why is it the university has not hired a consultant to produce a five-, 10-, 20-year plan for the physical development of the campus?"

Students discover original foundation of Bluemont College

staff reporter

K-State students enrolled in Field Methods in Archaeology have literally spent a semester digging in the dirt to uncover the history of K-State.

"It's not the archaeology of the Holy Land, it's the archaeology about the history of K-State," Patricia O'Brien, professor of archaeology, said.

Most students don't recognize the history behind K-State's origin, O'Brien said. Because she will retire in May, she thought it would be fun for the class and especially for her to "dig K-State." The class has spent every Saturday since the beginning of the fall semester excavating the foundation of Bluemont College at Claflin and College avenues.

Bluemont Central College was a private Methodist college created in 1859 to educate men and women in the Manhattan area. It became Kansas State University in 1863 when it was designated as a land-grant university. In 1885, the original building was torn down, O'Brien said. The foundation of the original building is what the class went looking for.

They were successful in finding the foundation footing of the north wall but discovered that the remaining 90 percent of the original building is covered by the barn that occupies the location.

O'Brien has been teaching the course since she came to K-State in 1968, with the exception of a few semesters she spent as a visiting professor in Munich, Germany.

There are several functions of the course, O'Brien said. It teaches students how to excavate a site. Also, students are shown how to stabilize and catalogue artifacts. This is where they learn were the artifacts came from. Finally, the students learn to analyze what each part.

Students are graded on their site performance, laboratory work and a written paper that is equivalent to a site report. It outlines what was found and what it means," she said.

Although O'Brien said most of the time the items found during a dig are broken, they still convey a lot of information.

"The most significant artifacts aren't the jazziest for display. That's how life works," she said.

Most of what archaeologists are excavating is an understanding of the nation's way of life. They are interested in the remains of garbage people leave behind. High-glamour digs like those of Egyptian pharaohs are the exception, she said.

"It is true that archaeology is a lot of fun and archaeologists go to exotic places," O'Brien said. "The average person believes King Tut and Indiana Jones is archaeology. Those are the only two things that come to mind, when in reality, it isn't the Hollywood-infatuated, glamour-romanticized archaeology from the Indiana Jones movies."

Hackers leave ransom note, virus threat at Yahoo! site

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Hackers broke into Yahoo!, the Internet's most popular site, demanding the release of an imprisoned comrade and threatening to unleash a crippling computer virus if he is not freed.

Computer security experts were skeptical of the hackers' claim that they had implanted such a virus.

> A lot of Web sites get hacked constantly. ... No site is completely hack-proof.
> • Jamonn Campbell
> information security analysist at the National Computer Security Association

The hackers, calling themselves PANTS/HAGIS, got into Yahoo!'s World Wide Web site at about 10 p.m. Monday, leaving a digital ransom note.

"For the past month, anyone who has viewed Yahoo's page & used their search engine, now has 'a logic bomb/worm implanted deep within their computer," it read. "On Christmas Day, 1998, the logic bomb part of this 'virus' will become active, wreaking havoc upon the entire planet's networks. The virus can be stopped. But not by mortals."

The note said an "antidote" program will be made available if hacker Kevin Mitnick is released. Mitnick was indicted last year on charges involving a multimillion-dollar crime wave in cyberspace.

Diane Hunt, a spokeswoman for the company, said the message was up for only 10 to 15 minutes and a few thousand people saw it.

"We immediately took action to see the extent of the damage and moved to correct it," she said. "And about that virus? There is, in fact, no virus."

Yahoo! is a computer directory widely used for searching the Internet. The note appeared briefly in place of the Yahoo! home page, preventing people online from using the search engine, which got 17.2 million visits in October.

Jonathan Wheat, manager of the Anti-Virus Lab at the National Computer Security Association, said it is, at least, theoretically possible to exploit security flaws on the Internet and implant such a virus. But he said he doubts this group of hackers — already known to security experts — pulled it off.

"That's pretty much ridiculous," agreed Jamonn Campbell, an information security analyst at the association.

Wheat said there was little reason to be concerned that the popular Web site was hacked.

"A lot of Web sites get hacked constantly," he said. He said that while Yahoo! is a high-profile site and should be expected to have better security than most, "no site is completely hack-proof."

Programs benefit Manhattan children

The Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan began three years ago and has been growing ever since. Now it has attracted the volunteers and resources of K-State in its efforts to provide learning experiences and a positive environment for children.

The Boys and Girls Club gives more than 550 children an alternative place to go after school and on the weekends. It has expanded its main location on Houston Street to four other outreach programs.

Susan B. Anthony and Eisenhower middle schools sponsor after-school programs for their students. Northview Elementary School has a before- and after-school program as well. The Teen Center, at Fourth and Humboldt streets, provides activities on the weekends. The main Houston Street site is open on the weekends and after school.

Many of its programs aim to educate children about life skills and encourage them to set goals. This is accomplished with the help of student volunteers primarily from K-State.

"Ninety percent of the people I've hired part-time are from the university," said Mike Otto, executive director of the Boys and Girls Club.

He said volunteers include majors in education, music, psychology and social work, who need the opportunity to work with children for hands-on experience. Students are able to work in their respective fields for the appropriate age group.

"I think students are looking to get into classroom situations early in their college years," Otto said. "They've all been really good role models. People impact people. I think that's the greatest draw to our program."

One program using K-State students is Kids' Cafe, which teaches children nutritional information, tips for cooking, food safety, table-setting and manners.

"Many kids are preparing their own meals today because mom and dad are at work," Otto said.

Deborah Canter, professor in hotel and restaurant management and dietetics, requires students in her introductory dietetics class to give such presentations.

"We try to instill in our students the importance of volunteering and how it could mesh professionally," Canter said.

She said her students focus on showing children how to prepare meals when they get home from school. She said Kids' Cafe also sponsored a field trip to Call Hall this semester so the children could observe the process of making ice cream.

"We've been able to provide nutritional information once a week at all locations," Canter said. "It's been a real win-win situation for my students and the kids."

Another program called Power Hour teaches children study skills and allows time to complete homework with the help of tutors.

"It's a national program where we provide close to an hour of educational opportunities. Someone's there to help them get their homework done. They not only get the hour of homework and tutoring, but they get other education along with that," said Shelli Henry, graduate student in family life studies.

She said educational games, like Monopoly, are also offered if students have no homework. These games teach life skills and offer education beyond textbooks.

The Boys and Girls Club provides a Smart Moves program with the help of K-State athletes like volleyball player Val Wieck and football players Monty Spiller and Andrae Rowe. Otto said this program teaches the benefits of goal-setting and creates a connection to higher education with the K-State student-athletes.

Although K-State and the Boys and Girls Club have established many connections already, Otto said that he feels there will be more in the future.

"This has been a healthy relationship. I think we've just scratched the surface," Otto said.

Shawnee Mission district votes to relax disputed e-mail policy

SHAWNEE, Kan. — The Shawnee Mission school board has voted to relax the district's highly contested e-mail policy.

The policy was at the core of a dispute in the Shawnee Mission public schools, where the Teacher's Union says a district policy allowing administrators to peek at e-mail violates teachers' professional integrity and their right to privacy.

Before the vote Monday night, Shawnee Mission's two-page policy said users "shall have no expectation of privacy" and that district administrators reserve the right to monitor usage and have access to all passwords.

The board voted to relax the e-mail policy, recognizing that some personal use would likely occur and that messages would be retrieved only with good reason, such as when misconduct was a concern.

The original policy was aimed at curbing communication over district phones or computers that wasn't work-related.

The board approved the revised e-mail policy and a similar one regarding voice mail by a 4-0 vote. Three board members were not present at the meeting.

Arkansas-bound plane crashes near reservoir; 2 people dead

COFFEYVILLE, Kan. — A single-engine aircraft that took off from Wichita en route to Harrison, Ark., crashed into hill in southeast Kansas, killing two men inside, authorities said Tuesday.

The identities of the men were not immediately known. Montgomery County Sheriff Jack Daniels said he believed the crash happened Monday night. The wreckage was found Tuesday morning, near the Elk City reservoir.

A landowner heard an airplane motor, then heard it quit, and then a bang, Daniels said.

Authorities had been searching for the plane, which didn't arrive at its scheduled destination Monday evening, officials said.

Nearly 20 volunteers with the Civil Air Patrol searched in Kansas and Missouri for the Bellanca Piper craft, which left Jabara airport about 3 p.m. Monday, said Kathleen Hill with the patrol's Springfield, Mo., office.

There was some wind and rain in the Wichita area around the time of the plane's scheduled takeoff, the National Weather Service said.

Dormitory fire kills 1, injures 7

GREENVILLE, Ill. — One student died and seven were injured early today when a fire destroyed part of a men's dormitory at Greenville College, a small liberal arts school in southwestern Illinois.

The fire broke out about 5 a.m. in Kinney Hall, a two-story dormitory housing about 40 students.

"The building is still standing, but the west wing is gutted," college spokeswoman Robin Florian said.

She identified the dead student as Joel Pierce, 22, a junior from Warren, N.H.

Seven other students who lived at the dormitory were taken to Utlaut Memorial Hospital in Greenville for various injuries. Six were treated and released. One remained under observation this morning, Florian said.

The cause and origin of the fire were under investigation.

Greenville College has about 1,000 students, including 560 who live on campus.

7 million vaccines set to prevent spread of Meningitis in Africa

GENEVA — Seven million doses of vaccines and sterile syringes are on standby to try to prevent meningitis from taking hold in Africa in the next few months, the World Health Organization said Tuesday.

Meningococcal meningitis is at its most virulent from December to April. In the 1996 season, there were 150,000 cases in sub-Saharan Africa. So far, 70,000 cases have been reported for the 1997 season, which ended in April, although not all governments have sent in their statistics.

Meningitis is an inflammation of the lining around the brain and spinal cord that can be caused by viruses or bacteria.

The illness is spread through direct exposure such as kissing, sharing eating utensils or being coughed or sneezed on.

Last year, vaccines were sent to the west African nations of Burkina Faso, Gambia, Ghana, Mali and Togo after local supplies ran out.

GETTING INTO THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT

Purchase of Christmas tree requires thought

Treading through the snow-covered woods to find that perfect Christmas tree might sound like more trouble than it's worth. But knowing what to look for in a real tree can make the search a memorable experience.

While the ease of an artificial tree is undeniable, the work of attaining a real tree can be rewarding. Lindy Gallaher, owner of the Gallaher tree farm on Anderson Avenue, said buying a real tree can be a great outing for families or friends.

"The main reason is because it's fun," Gallaher said. "It's fun for the whole family because everyone can take part in it. You can walk around and pick out the one you want and you get to enjoy them in nature."

For some, buying a real tree is all part of holiday tradition and spirit.

Mary Phelps, co-chair of the Optimist tree luck committee, said. "It's the smell. It's just the smell and the feel of a real tree. It adds to the feeling and spirit of Christmas."

The Optimist organization sells Christmas trees each year in Longs Park, as a fund raiser to help sponsor youth activities in the community.

They are selling six different types of Christmas trees, which is something important to consider when buying a tree.

"We've got a lot a different varieties. It's especially good for military families that might be from a different part of the country and are used to a certain kind of tree," Phelps said.

Most trees have different characteristics, which can serve different purposes, Gallaher said.

"We sell all pines, the Scotch pine, Virginia pine, Austrian pine and white pine," he said. "The needles and even the look of the tree are different."

The white pine has softer branches and needles, which makes it difficult to hold heavy ornaments, but the Scotch pine has much stronger branches so it can support heavier decorations, Gallaher said.

According to the National Christmas Tree Association, the top selling types of trees are the balsam fir, Douglas fir, Fraser fir, noble fir, Scotch pine, Virginia pine and the white pine.

Besides the type of tree, it is also important to check for freshness when buying a tree. The freshest trees are cut while you wait from a nearby location.

"It's different than buying a tree off a lot because some of those trees have been cut up to a month and a half ago. They start cutting trees down in late September because most of them come from states like Michigan," Gallaher said.

To test the freshness of a tree, just pull on some of the branches.

"If you pull on a branch and the needles start falling off, then you know it's been there awhile, and that's not one you want," he said.

It's important to look at the physical aspects of a tree before buying it.

"A straight trunk is important because that's what you'll have to deal with when you get it home," Gallaher said. "You also need to know the height of your ceiling, so a tree can be cut down to fit in the space you have."

When you get your chosen tree home, there are measures you can take to help maintain it through the holidays.

Placement of the tree can affect its freshness.

"It's important to make sure it's away from heat, like vents and furnaces, because that will dry the tree out quickly," Phelps said.

Making a fresh cut off the bottom of the trunk will also help keep the tree fresh because it helps the tree absorb water, she said.

According to the National Christmas Tree Association, a tree can absorb as much as a gallon of water in the first 24 hours. When a tree is not in water, it forms a sap-dried seal over the bottom that needs to be cut to allow water to be absorbed.

After the holidays are over, real Christmas trees can be recycled. In Manhattan, trees can be taken to Longs Park for use at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

"You can bring them back here, and they'll be taken out to the lake and used for fish homes. If we get too many, then they'll be cut up and used for mulch on jogging trails around the lake," Phelps said.

Christmas tree owners should take precautions

They bring holiday cheer, the feeling of Christmas and the fresh scent of pine to the indoors. But having a real tree means dealing with the fire hazard it presents.

In the past few years, Christmas trees have started nearly 600 fires per year in the United States, said Dwain Archer, director of fire safety inspections for K-State.

For those who have chosen to have a real tree instead of an artificial one, there are several precautions that can be taken to make a real tree safer.

Steve Burnett, assistant technical director of the Manhattan Fire Department, said Christmas trees are a serious hazard if the proper precautions are not taken.

"Typically the fires tend to spread very fast because there's a lot of fuel there, so it burns very rapidly," he said.

To better protect your home from the fire hazards of a real tree, here are a few tips and precautions.

• Before buying a tree, make sure it's fresh.

"It's very important to keep it from drying out, so check and make sure it's not dry when you get it. You need to check for brown and loose needles. That's especially important if it's not one that's fresh cut," Burnett said.

• After purchasing a tree, cut about one inch off the base.

"What that does is make sure all of the pores are open so it can absorb water," Burnett said.

It's also a good idea to give your tree plenty of water and to check the water level daily, he said.

• Another important part of any tree are decorations. Candles should not be used, and electrical lights should be marked with a UL seal of approval. UL stands for the Underwriters Lab seal of approval, which means it has met industry safety standards.

"The first thing is to make sure it is a listed or UL light set. That means it has been tested by an independent lighting testing lab," Burnett said.

• The use of extension cords to plug in lights can also cause problems.

"You need to check them and make sure you have a heavy enough extension cord, meaning it's rated for the right amount of power," Burnett said.

Cords also need to be placed in a safe location.

"When you run a cord, you need to make sure it's not in a traffic path where lots of people walk and can wear down the cords. Extension cords also shouldn't be place underneath a rug. That holds in the heat, and people can't see if cords are getting worn down," he said.

• Christmas tree fire safety on campus is also important, even though live trees are not allowed.

"Artificial trees and garland are allowed, but these decorations and trees should be tagged with a UL seal of approval. That tag basically says they have been checked for fire proofing," Archer said.

The Department of Fire Safety is also asking that there be no more than one extension cord used to light decorations on campus and that extension cords not be pinched in doors or windows, Archer said.

K-State alum announces candidacy for governor

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Arkansas City veterinarian Steve Abrams said today he has decided to seek the Republican nomination for governor in 1998 but has not decided whether to make an official announcement tour of the state.

Abrams announced in late October he was considering challenging Gov. Bill Graves for the GOP nomination. He said he made his decision to become a candidate last weekend, but made no formal announcement.

Graves made his formal declaration of intention to seek a second four-year term in October.

Abrams said during an interview preceding the start of today's State Board of Education meeting that he plans to begin campaigning and raising money after the first of the year. That is when he might make an announcement tour, he said.

Abrams, who operates Cottonwood Animal Clinic at Arkansas City, was re-elected to the Board of Education in November 1996, representing the district that encompasses Butler, Cowley, Elk, Greenwood, Sumner counties and part of Sedgwick County.

He is aligned with the conservative faction of the state board.

Abrams said he plans to conduct a strong grassroots campaign, and does not expect to be able to compete with Graves in raising money.

"If you've got workers, you don't need the money," he said. "I've had huge numbers of workers in my campaigns.

"Without that, I certainly couldn't have been elected to the state board. I certainly didn't have the money to run a traditional campaign."

Abrams said he doesn't think a candidate for statewide office needs massive television exposure to become well known.

"There are huge amounts of people out there who are willing to put forth the effort," he said.

He said he's received commitments for about $25,000 in donations since he announced in mid-October that he had appointed a campaign treasurer. Graves has raised about $700,000 so far, said his campaign manager, Jeff Wagaman.

"It's formidable," Abrams said of Graves' financial advantage. "I didn't say it would be easy. I said it was doable.

"He's very vulnerable, and I've received a huge amount of support since I announced I was looking at it. I got letters and phone calls from people I didn't know."

Abrams said he's not heard of anyone else who might enter the GOP governor's primary but said he wouldn't be surprised if there were others considering it.

"To be quite honest, I'd be surprised if there wasn't somebody else who filed," he said.

Abrams is a graduate of K-State. He and his wife of 27 years, Susan, have four children and two grandchildren.

FDA to ban Guatemalan raspberries because of parasitic contamination

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Food and Drug Administration still plans to ban next spring's crop of Guatemalan raspberries from being imported into this country, because growers have not discovered how the fruit became contaminated with a parasite called cyclospora.

The U.S. government blames fresh Guatemalan berries for sickening Americans who ate the berries last summer and in 1996. The parasite can cause days or even weeks of fever and diarrhea.

The FDA told Guatemalan growers late last summer that unless they discovered how the parasite could infect the crop, and how to stop it, the agency would not allow 1998 imports. FDA policy director Robert Lake told an international food meeting Monday that that decision still stands.

"We will not be accepting raspberries until the situation there is straightened out," he said, acknowledging that banning an entire crop before harvest "is without precedence."

Guatemalan Embassy official Roberto Rosenberg said berry growers still were working with the FDA to solve the problem.

Lake said the ban will affect Guatemala's March through August harvest.

Committee, administration violated Open Meetings law

There are procedures for bills that go through Student Senate at K-State, but administration ignored that process last Thursday.

High-level administrators, including Vice President for Institutional Advancement Bob Krause and Associate Vice President for Institutional Advancement Pat Bosco voiced their concerns about the proposed Student Health Fee in a meeting Thursday morning.

Student Body President Tim Riemann, Student Body Vice President Jennafer Neufeld and Senate Vice Chair Tracey Mann were also present.

That's not where the problem arose. Administrators often voice their opinions to these officials about bills going through Senate.

The problem is that Privilege Fee Committee members were also in attendance. Administrators have not voiced their opinions directly to committee members, and they shouldn't.

The administration can voice its concern to Senate by speaking with the student body president, vice president and senate chair, but it should not interfere with the committee process.

Thursday, administrators said they had a problem with legislation as it was written. Committee members changed the bill Monday. Did the changes occur because committee members were acting in the best interests of students or because of what occurred in its meeting with administration?

Committee members don't represent the administration. They represent us, the students.

The meeting was also in direct conflict with the Kansas open meetings law. It requires the press and public be notified if a majority of a quorum is established.

The meeting Thursday violated this law.

Administrators or Privilege Fee Committee members should have notified the press of the meeting. A closed-door policy sets a frightening precedent because the one group this legislation most directly affects, the students, was unaccounted for.

Health care involves every student at K-State. Those students who want to inform themselves of the issues should be have that ability, but that opportunity was taken away from them Thursday morning.

It's ALWAYS personal

Criticizing with conviction necessary yet frustrating

Architectural criticism is in a lot of ways like buildings themselves.

It is something of a given time evolving over the course of years to be something you either appreciate or detest more. Nothing written contemporary to a new building could possibly foresee the success or failure of that building in time.

Critics often make the point that a commentary with the opening of a building can only be taken as an indication of the success of the building's program, the architect's mission and some sensual analysis, but not whether the edifice will ever be considered good architecture.

In 1970s Boston, I.M. Pei's John Hancock building was a disaster when it opened, what with mirrored glass falling off its soaring stories and endangering pedestrians. That was eventually corrected, and the building now has landmark status with critics who at first might have written attacks. In this case, none of the negative comments surrounding the building's opening were taken to heart. Criticism is complex.

Of course, that's Boston. We live in a self-proclaimed progressive Midwestern city, home to perhaps one of the most conservative institutions in the state. On some level, independent thought isn't as entirely welcome here as it is in Boston.

Ada Louise Huxtable, who, for The New York Times in 1963, was the first full-time newspaper architecture critic in the country, has the wealth of decades of experience in the realm of criticism to put in words a critic's frustration.

In her 1986 book of published criticism, "Architecture, Anyone?" Huxtable writes of "a critical responsibility to keep an eye unwaveringly on the values and quality that cannot survive compromise and to turn the spotlight on those involved in compromising them."

She describes her criticism of "those involved" as "lonely and even eccentric work. It does not advance one's connections or popularity ... As history has generously shown, principle and print are among the most powerful tools in the world."

Huxtable might have had bigger post-modern fish to fry than the art and architecture world of Manhattan, but her words echo chillingly for anyone who's ever attempted her line of work. In cultural politics, size matters little.

Obviously, in a polite, educated society, no one would have the audacity to confront a college newspaper critic with demands or pressure for positive representation of a personal project. That doesn't, however, prevent it from happening in subtle, less — how to say it — threatening ways.

My criticism has spawned a few urgent phone calls made to the right or, in one case, wrong person all in some vain attempt to seek unpublicized retribution. Similarly, it amazes me how elected student leaders have not the interest to spend much time working on behalf of important issues such as student housing, tuition or underfunded academic resources; no, most of them would rather respond to the media and scramble behind the scenes to exert what little influence they have with campus administrators.

With most critics, one rarely hears of positive commentators because they have little at stake. Those on the receiving end of negative criticism respond with a sometimes ungraceful campaign at saving face that is generally taken at face value by readers. It's as if they, of establishment breed by nature, are aghast at one's willingness to think outside of their rigid lines.

Complicating matters greatly is the small-town nature of Manhattan. Criticize with conviction and certainty someone or something, and you're likely to face a freeze out, which I've judged to last at least one year. It usually melts only with a pendulum swing to the positive side of the spectrum. Sometimes this pendulum swing never happens, and you lose a source for good. Can critics ever divorce the purely academic implications of their work from the personal inferences on behalf of the criticized? History is against us on that one.

There's also the case of volume. When I correspond with other critics, I often refer to the Kansas architecture and art scene without realizing its paucity. With roughly 2 million people in this geographically wide state, it's asinine to expect consistently important projects to be built or created to fuel much work of a critic.

So, one must expand one's horizons to subjects outside of the narrow focus of Manhattan. In the process, one begins to alienate the unread people, to confuse the faux intellectuals, and please the few who remain.

Oh yes, it's a rough life, isn't it? When I occasionally hear of the pettiness of this town's cultural politics (there must be some sort of conspiracy to keep me out of this elite loop) or observe the sheer delight some experience in the midst of well-packaged artistic tripe of less-than-footnote quality, it's a good time to take measure of your objectives.

As Huxtable wrote more than a decade ago, "Bombarded as we are with every kind of message, evaluations of meaning or worth are more important than ever." Especially on this progressive and, forgive me, selfless campus.

End of column-writing brings sadness, reflection

KEVIN BAILEY

KEVIN BAILEY is a senior in elementary education. You can send your e-mail comments to Kevin at (kevinsb@ksu.edu)

I guess it's really over.

Some might remember when it started. It was March 19, and my father had just been diagnosed with inoperable lung cancer. I was hired that same day. I wrote a column about his struggle and my admiration of him. He was — and remains — my hero, and I thought it appropriate that my first column be for him.

On April 13, he died.

I shared the pain I and my family felt with the readers of my column. It was therapeutic for me, and — judging from the e-mail I received — for the readers as well. It was not an easy column to write. But I wrote.

Many who had lost someone close to them responded in shared grief. The fact that my grief over his death was able to touch so many in a personal way seemed to extend the scope of my father's life. It allowed his wonderful, Godly influence to spread much further than he could ever have imagined.

Over the course of three semesters, I have made both friends and enemies with my column. Atheists, agnostics, Christians, Muslims and many other types have responded. One individual recently sent an e-mail to me, in which it was suggested that this person would like to sacrifice me "to the f—-ing devil."

Many people write to me as if they have known me forever. I think that is my favorite part of writing — knowing the people. Even the people who strongly disagreed with my opinion. In fact, it was those people who really challenged me to thoroughly research my columns and to attempt to justify my beliefs about a specific issue.

Throughout these semesters of writing, above all I have tried to be honest and educated in my opinions. Many people assume all that is needed to write an opinion column is an opinion.

I do not agree.

Far too many people hold unqualified, uneducated opinions. I did not want to be one of those people. I wrote my columns as a way to let people know who I was, and why I believed what I believed.

Now it is over.

As I sat across from my friend, the opinion editor for next semester, I could not believe what I was hearing. She was telling me I did not fit into the plan she had for the opinion page for spring 1998. She said something about diversity and needing "new blood" on the opinion page. I asked questions, then said I understood.

But, I didn't.

I still don't.

Oh, I'm not angry. I don't understand, but I am not angry. I like the spring opinion editor too much to be angry with her.

I am sad, though. I don't know what I will do without a column to write every week. I think after my dad died, my column was the place where all of my feelings were released.

Sometimes I used my column to cry. Sometimes I used my column to question God. Often my column was simply a way to let my emotions have a place to rest, far away from my restless mind. In the ink of newsprint, and over the Internet on the eCollegian is about as far away from my mind as I could plant them.

I am grateful to the Collegian for giving me that opportunity. Spring 1997 editor Kim Hefling and spring 1997 opinion editor Kevin Klassen gave me my first opportunity to write columns. Summer and fall 1997 opinion editor Brandi Hertig has disagreed with me sometimes, listened to me a lot and helped me to understand why editors do the things they do. Claudette Riley, spring 1998 opinion editor, has been my friend.

I am truly grateful to all of them.

But, most of all I am grateful to those of you who wrote me letters and sometimes even called. Even if you disagreed with me, it was good to know that what I wrote meant enough to you that you would respond.

I will be publishing some past columns, as well as any other columns I might write on an Internet newspaper I have created using a program called CRAYON. It is called "The Bailey Independent Bulletin."

If anyone wishes to read my columns, as well as news and sports from around the world, the address is www.crayon.net/read.cgi?kevinsb@ksu.edu.

In the end, I know God has some reason for keeping me from writing a column for the Collegian next semester. I do not understand yet, but in time I will.

While some will miss seeing my column every week, others will say, "Good riddance." However, I would hope that even many of those who disagree with my perspective on life will miss hearing from me every week.

I know I'll miss all of you.

Student supports Lafene, realizes Senate's difficulty

Editor,

I'm writing to voice my support and concern for Lafene Student Health Center. Student Senate is faced with the dilemma of curbing increasing student fees and ensuring that Lafene will remain fully able to meet the needs of the students at the same time.

Lafene is not a profit-making entity. Therefore, we are sheltered from many of the high costs associated with health care. The costs that do exist, however, increase as all services subject to inflation do. Simply put, Lafene needs more money to provide the same services it has always provided.

As a result of this intensive financial review Lafene faces regularly, it has become an organization devoid of any extra funds lying around. It is an efficient, well-run health center and cannot afford a reduction of funds.

I don't envy Senate's dilemma. No one wants to increase student fees. I do, however, want the same services Lafene provides to continue.

Students should be offered lower-rate computer loans

Editor,

I am writing on behalf of the K-State student body to encourage and challenge local banking institutions to offer low-interest loans to students wishing to finance a new computer.

Many of our classes are incorporating computers and technology into our class lectures and labs.

I believe it would be beneficial to the university as a whole if all students had access to their own personal computers. Whereas, if you accept my challenge, your profits on these low-interest loans would not be large, and your institution would be helping the greater good of society.

Little known drug, may have caused death

What to look out for:
- It can be smoked, inhaled or dissolved in water
- Fatal in high doses.
- causes hallucinations
- considered "date-rape" drug

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — The body of 18-year-old Donald Matthews was dumped outside a shopping center in Fitchburg. He was the apparent victim of a drug overdose.

It wasn't cocaine, LSD or marijuana that police think killed Matthews, though toxicology reports were still pending. Authorities suspect he died after taking a mixture of heroin and "Special K," an animal tranquilizer that is legal in most states.

Special K, or just "K," is the street name for Ketamine hydrochloride, which can be smoked, inhaled like cocaine or dissolved in water for drinking. Fatal in high doses — one veterinarian last month said less than a half-ounce can tranquilize a horse — the drug causes hallucinations.

It also is considered one of the "date-rape" drugs because of the stuporlike condition it can cause.

Long popular in the nation's clubs, authorities fear the drug is growing more popular with adolescents. A girl who attended the same apartment party where Matthews was seen last month ended up at a hospital. Matthews was last seen at the party.

More than a decade ago, New York City authorities said Ketamine was suspected in a rash of date rapes. In 1991, word of the drug's popularity prompted a warning from Roman Catholic Cardinal John O'Connor of New York. But the drug is now showing up in smaller towns like Fitchburg, a former mill town with a population 35,000, some 40 miles northwest of Boston.

Across the country, Special K is a staple at "raves," all-night dance parties for teens, but authorities say they are largely powerless to control the use of the drug. In Massachusetts, no penalties exist for possession or ingestion of the drug.

Brad Bailey, director of the Governor's Alliance Against Drugs, said he first heard of Special K last summer. He is now considering a recommendation that state lawmakers restrict its use — in effect, making possession illegal — once he learns more.

"I intend to put out a strong warning about Special K and its dangers," he said.

Kids aren't scoring Special K at typical drug markets, either.

In Nashua, N.H., two teenagers were charged with 13 burglaries at veterinary clinics and police say they were part of a ring of Special K thieves. In the weeks before Matthews' death, two central Massachusetts veterinary clinics were burglarized by thieves searching for the drug.

> director of Governor's Alliance Against Drugs

Recently, several other states have taken steps to control Special K.

Three weeks ago, Florida made Ketamine possession a felony, following similar moves made by New Jersey, Wisconsin and Illinois. Possession will become illegal in New York on Jan. 1.

Massachusetts State Police Sgt. Steve Matthews said the drug is compared a lot to PCP, or phencyclidine, the "angel dust" that acts as a stimulant and depressant.

"But it's not that strong," he said. "You're not going to have kids banging their heads on walls."

The appearance of Special K is reminiscent of the spread of Rohypnol, known as "roofies," which was also used as a date-rape drug.

After several high-profile rape cases in which the assailant used Rohypnol to drug the victim, state legislatures across the country moved to criminalize possession of the drug. In October 1996, President Clinton signed a bill outlawing Rohypnol.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration has been collecting data on Ketamine since 1993, but it is not listed as a controlled substance.

Mix-up leaves writer with bag full of letters that must be answered

The other day, there was a big mix-up at the post office, and as luck would have it, I ended up with a sack full of letters addressed to the North Pole. As curious a person as I am, I just couldn't resist reading a couple of them before I took them back.

Here are a few letters that I found awfully interesting.

Dear Santa,

Hi. How are you and Mrs. Claus doing? I'm doing pretty well, but I've had a rough year. I'd really like a new coach and a new owner for my football team, because it looks like we're not going to make the playoffs for the first time since 1990. I'm getting really tired of the Jerry and Barry Show. Also, send me some good young players in this year's draft and maybe a little bail money for a few of my friends. While you're at it, Santa, would you please send one of those cheerleaders my way? I'm lonely.

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. You can send your e-mail to Creston. at creston@ksu.edu.

Your pal,

Troy Aikman

Dear Santa,

I was very good again this year, so whatever I ask for, I think I deserve. To be quite honest with you, I was very disappointed that you didn't give me the Cotton Bowl victory that I asked for last Christmas. Then I realized you might not have received my letter in time, so I'm sending my letter early this year. All I want for Christmas is a Fiesta Bowl win.

Your friend,

Bill Snyder

P.S. — A nice Christmas bonus wouldn't be bad, either.

Dear Santa,

I really don't need much from you because I made nearly $80 million this year. The only thing I'm asking is that you send something to make my friend Scottie happy so he'll stay in Chicago with me. That way, I can start filling my other hand with championship rings. Also, I'd like a pair of silk stockings and a sports bra.

Love,

Michael Jordan

P.S. — Actually those last items are for my friend Dennis. He told me to ask you for them because he was a bad boy again this year.

Dear Santa,

I'm sick and tired of your crap. I've asked you every year, for the past five years, for a victory over the Jayhawks in basketball and every year it turns out the same. All I'm asking for is one win over KU, preferably in Bramlage Coliseum. If you continue to ignore my request, I might be forced to get rough. If necessary, my cousin, Guido the Wildcat from New York, would be more than happy to take a trip up North to pay you a little visit. You wouldn't want Rudolph to have an "accident" now, would you? Just give the Cats a win and everything will be copacetic. Capish?

Yours truly,

Willie the Wildcat

Dear Santa,

Thank you for all of the gifts this past year. Winning the PGA Player of the Year Award and $2 million was fun and all, but it got a little boring sometimes. Could you send me a new young player to give me a challenge? Thanks. Oh, by the way, I'd like a few more red shirts for Sundays.

Love,

Tiger Woods

Dear Santa,

Thanks for all of the free agents that I asked for last Christmas. They're all fitting in nicely, especially Spiderman (Andre Rison). What I'd really like for Christmas this year is a trip to San Diego for the Super Bowl, and I don't mean as a spectator.

Your friend,

Marty Schottenheimer

Dear Santa,

How are you? I am fine. I hope you aren't too cold up there at the North Pole. Did you get the cookies and milk I set out last year? Everybody says I'm the best coach who's never won the Big Dance, and I think they're right. What I really want this year is a national championship before Raef and Paul move on to the NBA. Oh, and could you put a beanie baby in my stocking?

Your pal,

Roy Williams

Don't worry. I took all of these kids' letters back to the post office to ensure that they make it to Santa by Christmas. Well, all except that last one. It seems I tragically misplaced it — in the fireplace.

K-State's Gramatica wins Lou Groza award

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

K-State place kicker Martin Gramatica never wanted to be the deciding factor in a game.

"I haven't had the chance to kick a game-winner yet," Gramatica said. "I hope I never do."

But Coach Bill Snyder would probably not worry too much if a game rested on Gramatica's shoulders.

Gramatica won the Lou Groza Collegiate Place-Kicker Award on Tuesday evening in West Palm Beach, Fla., beating out Duke's Sims Lenhardt and UCLA's Chris Sailer. Gramatica is the first K-State player to receive a significant national award.

"I think I'm still speechless," Gramatica said shortly after receiving the award. "All three of us deserve it. Unfortunately, somebody has to take it home."

Gramatica kicked 19 of 20 field goals with a long of 55 yards and put 37 of 38 extra points through the uprights. For his efforts, Gramatica was also named to the first team All-America list.

But if you'd asked him at the beginning of the season if he had notions of being America's best kicker, he wouldn't have known what to say.

"I never expected to be here before the season started," Gramatica said. "To be able to be here with these three kickers is a great honor."

And a great feat, considering Gramatica sat on the sidelines for the entire 1996 season.

Most fans know Gramatica spent last year as a medical redshirt after suffering a knee injury the week before the season opener. Needless to say, for a man who wildly celebrates every extra point he kicks, it was a difficult year.

"It's the flip side of the coin," Gramatica said. "And this is the best side of it. I never dreamed I'd come back and have this kind of season."

But Snyder and Gramatica's teammates had faith in his rehabilitation efforts, as well as what he could produce on the field.

"We had every bit of confidence that he'd come back strong," Snyder said. "The thing that's so good about him is that he's a team player. He's one of those guys who'd give up how he's doing right now to see the team doing well."

Snyder and Gramatica attributed Gramatica's recovery to the training staff, but specifically Jim Whalen, the director of sports medicine. Snyder said Gramatica's probably a better kicker now, but Gramatica said it's all about alignment.

"I think it's a little stronger than it was before I had the injury," Gramatica said. "I had the strength but I just wasn't kicking it straight. I think they might have realigned it for me."

One person who was convinced the contest was no contest was someone who should know — punter James Garcia, who's seen Gramatica nail a 70-yarder with quite a bit of wind behind him.

"I think he's a shoo-in to win," Garcia said before the announcement. "I think he's the best kicker in the race, no question about that."

Garcia called Gramatica an "Energizer Bunny" on the field, and said he has the leg to kick a 65-yarder without much help from the wind.

On two good legs this season, Gramatica leaps upon his holder or the linemen on the field after his successful kicks. But after receiving the Lou Groza award, there was a little difference in the celebration.

"My whole family jumped on me," Gramatica said. "I had to catch all of them."

SOMETHING TO PROVE

▸ CATS LOOK FOR REVENGE
after last season's loss to WSU.

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

The best revenge is living well.

The Wildcats have been living well — they're off to a 5-0 start. The Wichita State Shockers have not been living so well. They're off to a 2-4 start.

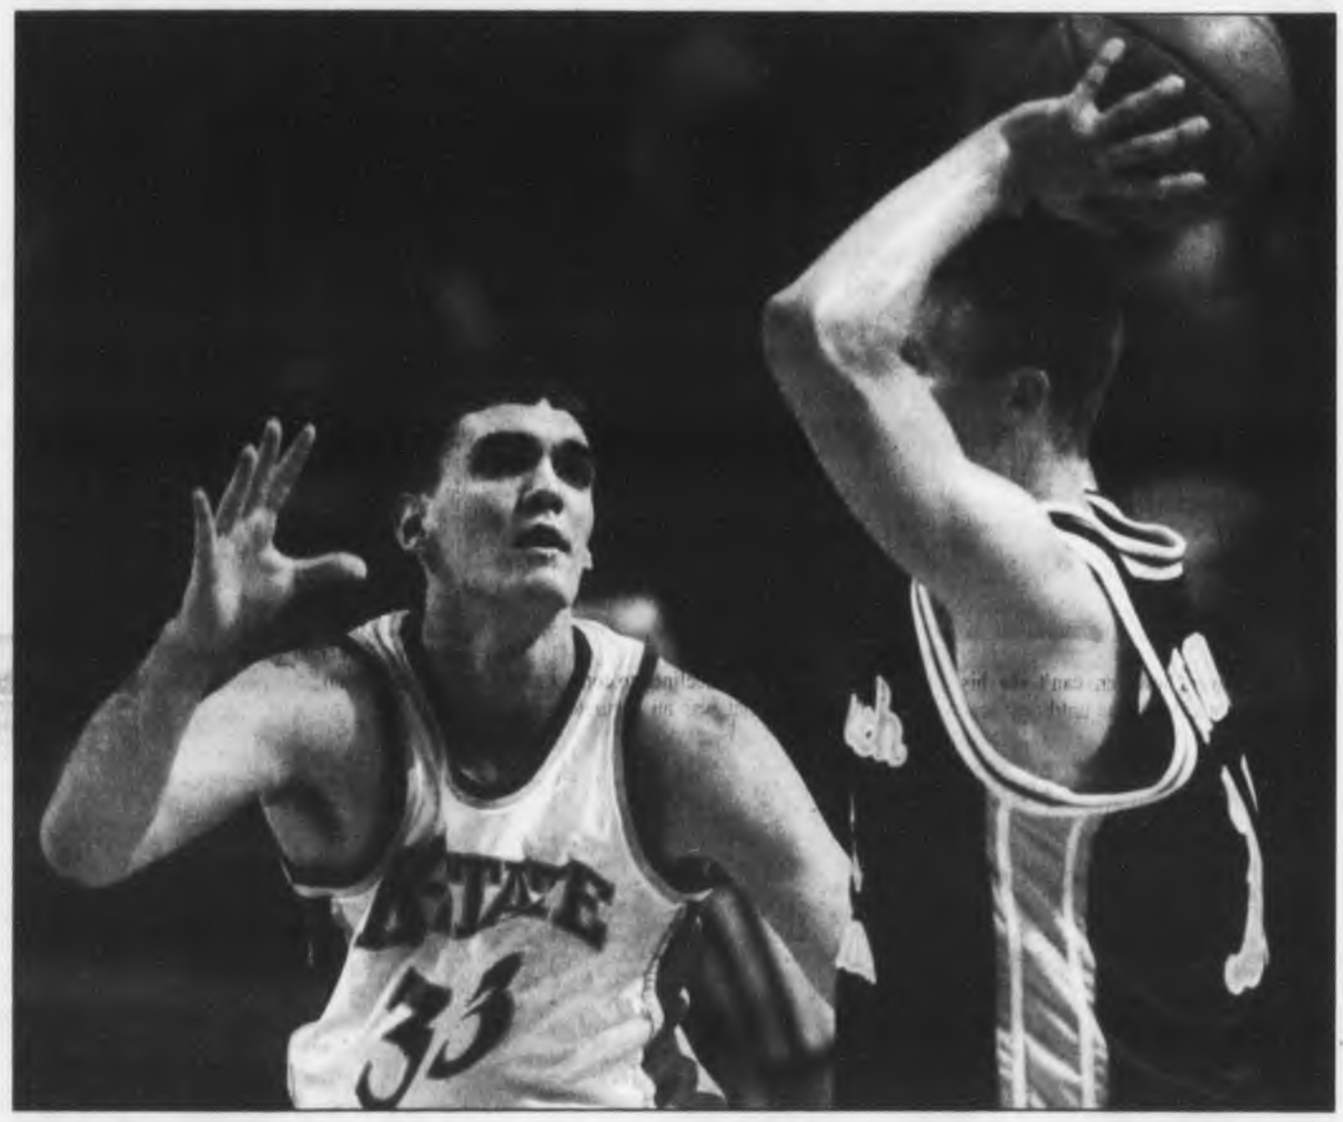
However, the Cats will have a chance to pay the Shockers back for last year's 59-74 loss tonight at Henry Levitt Arena.

"I try to put it out of my mind," Cat forward Shawn Rhodes said about last year's contest.

The loss to the Shockers probably stung the most for Rhodes and Cat forward Manny Dies, both Wichita natives.

Tonight, the Cats will be suffering from more losses as well. Sophomore point guard Duane Davis was suspended for the Wichita State game for violations of team rules. Davis was arrested early Sunday morning for on a DUI charge.

Junior guards Marcus McCollough and Chris Griffin were victims of a hit-and-run accident Sunday in Manhattan. An unknown driver rear-ended their vehicle in the accident, which involved three vehicles.



McCullough sustained torn ligaments in the cervical spine and will be out for at least six to eight weeks. He is the Cats' fourth-leading scorer with 8.6 points a game, and second in field goal shooting percentage at .731 (19-26).

Griffin strained the soft tissue in his neck and is listed as day-to-day. He has averaged 10 minutes a contest as a reserve point guard.

The game holds importance for the players reruning home, and Coach Tom Asbury said he realizes that for Rhodes and Dies.

▸ PLAYERS USE VIDEO GAME
as Fiesta Bowl preparation.

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

In preparation for the Fiesta Bowl, K-State's football players will spend plenty of time watching game tapes of Syracuse, their opponent.

However, the first time they step foot in the film room, they will already have an idea of what they're going up against, thanks to Sony PlayStation's NCAA GameBreaker, a college football video game.

Although GameBreaker might not be as good of a game-preparation tool as actual game film, the Wildcats like to play, and they remember what they see.

"They're just what I expected," offensive tackle Todd Weiner said. "They have a great team and a lot of great players."

Weiner has played against the Orangemen in the past, but not lately. Now, with K-State's first-ever Alliance Bowl coming up, though, he plans on playing against them again.

"I probably will," he said. "I'll get a little scouting report."

Joining Weiner in the GameBreaker film room will be defensive tackle Damion McIntosh.

"I'll check out what kind of plays they're running and see their schemes," McIntosh said.

Most of the Wildcats like to play with K-State, and if Weiner takes on Syracuse with the Cats, he'll probably do so against offensive guard Jeremy Martin, one of his good friends.

And when he does, he'll probably lose. Not necessarily because the Orangemen are a better team, but because, according to Weiner, Martin is the best PlayStation player on the team.

That's a claim Martin disagrees with.

"That's not true," Martin said. "I always beat him, but that's just because he's no good."

Another player who could be the best PlayStation athlete on the team is free safety Lamar Chapman. In strong safety Jarrod Cooper's mind, Chapman is No. 1.

Like Martin, though, Chapman doesn't feel he's the player to beat. He said he's not worthy of Cooper's first-place vote.

"I've been beaten," he said. "Not when I play against him, though."

Cooper and Chapman have both played against Syracuse, but neither have had any success. Cooper said defensive end Darren Howard always plays with the Orangemen, and he always wins.

While some of the Cats like to see how different teams match up, others like to see how individual players perform in video games, especially the players that represent themselves.

McIntosh said one of his favorite parts of PlayStation is when he plays with the Cats and sees No. 77 on the game.

Leaf battling anonymity in race for Heisman honor

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PULLMAN, Wash. — Ryan Leaf is one of the few quarterbacks for whom third-and-20 is no big deal.

A more daunting task is convincing Heisman Trophy voters that someone from low-profile Washington State is worthy of being selected as the best player in college football.

No one from the school has ever won the Heisman, but no one has led Washington State (10-1) to the Rose Bowl since 1931. Leaf also led the school to its highest ranking ever, No. 8, while tearing up opposing defenses and the Pac-10 record book.

"Ryan Leaf is the best quarterback in America," said Coach Mike Price, who lured Leaf to the school by promising him a trip to the Rose Bowl.

▸ Heisman series
This is the 2nd in a 4-part series on college football's Heisman candidates. The winner will be announced Saturday.

The most gifted football player to come out from Great Falls, Mont., Leaf is an emotional leader with a shotgun arm and the strength to shed tacklers. He loves the spotlight and thrives under pressure.

In the final regular-season game at Washington, with a Rose Bowl berth on the line, Leaf converted 13 of his first 17 third-down opportunities, several on long passes that broke the Huskies' spirit. He converted on third-and-27, third-and-17 and third-and-13.

After the game, Leaf rushed across the field to the Cougars section and spiked the football. He was then carried off the field on fans' shoulders, which was no small feat.

Leaf is listed at 6-foot-5, 238 pounds; opponents swear he's bigger.

"Other coaches say he's 250," said Lloyd Carr, coach of top-ranked Michigan, which faces the Cougars in the Rose Bowl on Jan. 1. "If you rush him, he takes one hand and knocks you down and steps up and throws the ball."

The third-rated quarterback in the nation, Leaf completed 210 of 375 passes for 3,637 yards, with 33 touchdowns and 10 interceptions. His touchdown passes and yardage are Pac-10 season records.

Leaf's season has NFL scouts drooling, and the junior has been projected as a No. 1 draft pick, ahead of Tennessee's Peyton Manning. Leaf has said he won't reveal whether he'll leave school early until after the Rose Bowl.

Leaf began the season by throwing for 381 yards and three touch-to WSU," he said. "Selfishly, it would be nice if they played well."

To this point, both Rhodes and Dies have played well. They are Nos. 1 and 2 on the team in scoring and tied for first in rebounding. Dies is averaging 14 points per game, and Rhodes is averaging 11.8 points per game. They are both pulling down 6.8 rebounds a game.

A reason for the rivalry between K-State and Wichita State is that many key players for both teams played with or one another other in high school.

Dies and Shocker forward Darrin Williams were teammates at Wichita South High School. Rhodes attended Wichita Northwest, and Shocker point guard Terry Hankton attended Derby High School. South, Northwest, and Derby are all Wichita area schools. Throw in Shocker guard Maurice Evans (a cousin of Nebraska running back DeAngelo Evans), from Wichita Collegiate High School, and one should expect a game full of intense ex-high school, now-college rivalry.

The Cats' only road game so far this season was at the University of Kansas City-Missouri, where much of the crowd was pro-K-State. Wichita State had an average attendance of 8,520 in its two home games. Compare that with the average attendance of 5,045 K-State has had at their home games, and it shows the fan support the Shockers have. Asbury said it will be good for the Cats to play in front of a hostile crowd.

"It'll be very pro-WSU," Asbury said. "In that sense, it's good to go into a stadium like that. It'll be a baptism by fire."

With a 1-2 record against Wichita State as K-State's coach, Asbury said he knows that the Shockers look forward to playing the Cats.

"You know you're going to get their best shot," Asbury said. "My take on it is that it's a very important game for them — one they want to win very much."

Asbury said that the strength of the Shockers, as on any Randy Smithson-coached team, is the defense.

"They're doing a great job on defense as you'd expect from Randy's team," Asbury said. "I don't think we'll get as good a look against them as in any other game — not just the three, but any look."

The Shockers are allowing only 58.2 points per game, and the Cats are scoring 88.6 points per game. Shocker opponents have shot just more 25 percent from three-point range, while the Cats have shot almost 41 percent from three-point range.

"I think they're a little better offensively this time of year than a year ago," Asbury said.

The Shockers are led by Hankton, who has 4.4-to-1 assist-to-turnover ratio. He averages 7.3 points a game. Shocker guard Jason Perez leads the team in scoring at 14.5 points per game, and guard Chris Grill 0 is averaging 10.2 points per game.

After wins at home over Chicago State and Prairie View A&M, the Shockers dropped three games at the Puerto Rico Shootout and one game on the road. They lost to Illinois 57-70, Hofstra 56-65, Alabama 58-60 and Tulsa 40-50.

The Cats are on a five-game winning streak with an average margin of victory of 27.4 points.

Rhodes said he hopes the Cats can keep rolling with a victory over the Shockers.

"I feel good about this team, and hopefully we can go down there and get a W," Rhodes said.

downs against UCLA and 355 yards against Southern California. Five touchdown passes against California tied a school record, and he threw for a career-high 447 yards in the Cougars' only loss of the season, at Arizona State.

But will it be enough to persuade Heisman voters to choose him over Manning, Michigan's Charles Woodson or Marshall's Randy Moss?

Leaf has downplayed his chances all season.

"I'm happy some people are looking into the Northwest a little bit," he said.

Leaf admits he's emotional and considers that a key to his leadership. Leaf always talks to opposing players, teammates, coaches and officials.

In one recent sideline conversation with his coach, the quarterback said: "I'm hot today! Let me throw it, I'm hot!" Price recounted with a laugh.

"Our relationship is more of a partnership," the coach added. "I'm never concerned about the score."

That's because the Cougars can strike from anywhere. This season, Leaf has touchdown passes of 80, 78, 72, 66 and 57 yards, just to name some of the longer ones.

While verbal jabs come easily to Leaf, the broadcasting major tries to be diplomatic about opponents. He has nothing but praise for Michigan, with its top-ranked defense and outstanding defensive back Woodson.

"I only have time to think about Charles and what he's going to do to us, and what the extraordinary Michigan defense is going to throw at us," Leaf said.

Despite all his accomplishments, Leaf contends Manning and Woodson are more worthy of the Heisman.

"I want to ride on their coattails and go to New York and meet them," Leaf said.

PLAYSTATION

He also said the game's programmers were fair when they determined his strengths and weaknesses.

"They made me pretty good," he said.

"I'm glad they didn't make me slow and sorry."

Center Kendyl Jacox is also pleased with decisions of the programmers.

"They hooked me up pretty well," he said.

One player, however, can't see his number on a video game until next season. Quarterback Michael Bishop's number was left off GameBreaker this year, and when he plays GameBreaker, he uses Washington State instead.

Using the Cougars, Bishop threw for 800 yards in his first game. Since then, he hasn't had any doubt as to who his favorite team is — that is, his favorite GameBreaker team.

One feature of the game is the ability to create new players. Bishop created himself on the game and occasionally plays with K-State.

He said he gave himself quickness and a strong arm.

Bishop laughed and declined to comment on whether that was an accurate assessment, but did reveal how his player performs.

"Once I get outside the pocket, I always run for a touchdown," he said.

Although the Cats enjoy playing football video games, they're usually too busy doing the real thing to find time.

"We just play friendly games every now and then," Martin said.

But sometimes they take GameBreaker seriously.

"Me, Darnell McDonald and Coach Tyson (Schwieger) just had a big tournament," wide receiver Gavin Peries said. "They were my only real competition and I was the champion."

Court might consider case reducing police officers' liability in auto chases

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court was asked today to sharply limit police officers' legal liability for injuries or deaths in high-speed chases like one that killed a California teen-ager.

"There is a simple remedy in this case, and that is to pull over and stop and yield to lawful authority," said Terence J. Cassidy, the lawyer for Sacramento County Sheriff's Deputy James E. Smith.

Smith wants the justices to throw out a federal lawsuit brought by the parents of Philip Lewis, 16, who was killed in 1990 when Smith's car accidentally struck him in a chase at speeds approaching 100 mph.

Lewis' parents say Smith violated their son's constitutional rights by engaging in a dangerous pursuit.

"This is a phenomenal problem" that kills hundreds of people every year, said the Lewises' lawyer, Paul J. Hedlund. Smith's chase of Lewis, who was a passenger on a motorcycle, was an "incredibly reckless act."

But some justices appeared skeptical.

"It was, at most, an irresponsibly speedy chase," said Justice Antonin Scalia. "Is there any evidence that there was an intent to kill anybody?"

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist said, "Do you think that high-speed auto chases are the sort of things the (Constitution's) 14th Amendment was designed to prevent? In 1868?"

Hedlund responded, "Although the framers didn't know about cars, they certainly knew about arbitrary, abusive, oppressive government ... depriving innocent people of their lives everyday without any justification."

Cassidy, the deputy's lawyer, said he should be granted immunity from the lawsuit. Also, he said Smith should be held legally liable only if his actions were taken with malicious intent.

"There is a rational purpose more often than not in a substantial number of police pursuits," Cassidy said. Claims involving such chases should be handled under state law, not federal law, he added.

But Justice David H. Souter said other federal claims that a police officer used unreasonable force also involve the same purpose of apprehending a suspect.

"Why don't we, in effect, dismiss all of those cases on the same analysis?" Souter asked.

The Supreme Court will issue by July what could be an important ruling on police immunity.

Lewis was struck by Smith's police car on the night of May 22, 1990. A deputy in another car had tried to stop the motorcycle, and when it took off ,Smith followed in pursuit.

The chase forced two other cars and a bicyclist off the road.

The pursuit ended when the motorcycle skidded to a halt. Smith's car hit Lewis while trying to stop, knocking him nearly 70 feet down the road. Lewis was pronounced dead at the scene.

The youth's parents, Teri and Thomas Lewis, sued. But a federal judge threw out their claim that Smith violated their son's rights.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstated their lawsuit, saying the Lewises could force the deputy to pay damages if they could show he acted with "deliberate indifference ... or reckless disregard."

Smith appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that he should not have to go to trial because his conduct did not "shock the conscience," and that he should be given qualified immunity. Under California law, the county would pay any judgment against Smith.

The states supporting the county's appeal said a ruling against Smith could force police to limit their vehicle pursuits. "Criminals will flee knowing it is unlikely that they will be pursued," the states' lawyers added.

Cyprus: TRAVELERS RELUCTANT, UNEXCITED ABOUT STOP AT ISLAND COUNTRY

KEVYN JACOBS
a special to the Collegian

Travelogue

Most of us weren't too terribly thrilled about going to Cyprus.

Not that we had anything against this charming island country in the eastern Mediterranean, but it was a last-minute replacement for a place we had all dearly looked forward to going to: Israel. Because of recent terrorist attacks in Israel, and because the Israeli-Palestinian violence showed no signs of easing, Semester at Sea made the decision to send us to Limassol, Cyprus, instead.

The decision was demoralizing for us. We all understood that the change in port was made out of concern for our safety. But gone was our chance to go to the Holy Land to visit Jerusalem, the Wailing Wall, the Dome of the Rock and Bethlehem. We were all disappointed, and that disappointment colored our impressions of Cyprus.

So what of Cyprus? Most of us knew nothing of this place before we went there. It's not a popular tourist destination for Americans. It was the unknown, and in a very real way, that made it more exotic than anyplace else we'd been on this voyage so far.

We sailed into the port of Limassol on the morning of Nov. 20, scarcely 12 hours after we had left Egypt the night before. We weren't really quite sure what to expect, aside from the briefing we had been given on ship: southern Cyprus is ethnically Greek, northern Cyprus is ethnically Turkish, and the two sides have been cut off from each other since 1974 when Turkey invaded northern Cyprus to keep it out of Greek hands.

Cyprus' Greek heritage goes far back. Ancient Greek ruins are found all over the island, and according to Greek mythology, Aphrodite, the goddess of love, was born in the sea foam on the southern coast of Cyprus. This, at least, gave us some reason to hope that Limassol might be an interesting place to visit.

What we found, however, was a popular tourist destination for wealthy Europeans, essentially a resort area. With 11 months of sunshine, tourism is Cyprus' main source of income, and so everything there is geared toward tourists. And it's expensive, darned expensive. The only place we've been on this voyage that's been more expensive was Japan.

At the time we were there, a Cyprus pound was worth $2 from the United States, and that pound didn't go very far. Taxis, food, even postcard stamps are pricey, and by this point in the voyage, most of us are starting to run short on cash.

The one cheap thing in Cyprus is wine. Wine production is Cyprus' second main source of income. It's pretty good stuff and available cheap and in abundance. And, as there wasn't a whole lot else to do in Limassol but go out drinking, that's what we all ended up doing.

That's not to say there isn't interesting stuff in Cyprus, or even in Limassol. There actually is. But in the off season, as it was when we were there, the weather's a little chilly, making trips to the nude beaches unproductive.

The first day of my visit was the most interesting from a cultural perspective. I took a city orientation bus tour, organized by Semester at Sea and visited some of the highlights of Limassol.

By far the most interesting place we visited was the Limassol Castle, a medieval fortress built by Christian knights who had been driven out of the Holy Land during the Crusades. In this castle, King Richard the Lionhearted of England is said to have married his fiancee, Berengaria of Navarre, in 1191.

Wandering through its narrow, twisted passageways we certainly got a sense of life as it must have been, back in those long-ago days when the nobility lived in these kinds of stone castles all over Europe. A visit later in the day to Kolossi Castle, just west of Limassol, also provided this kind of romantic glimpse into the age of chivalry. Constructed in the 13th century as a military fortress, it looks like a castle out of the storybooks. Climbing several stories of spiral stone staircases was a real treat, like something out of the movies.

We also went to Kurion, a spectacular archeological site where the ruins of a 12th century B.C. Greek town have been unearthed. It was inhabited until the Roman era, on a cliff looking out over the Mediterranean Sea. There we saw an amphitheater from the second century, where Greek drama was performed.

Restored, it is used again today by the Cypriots for concerts and special performances. We also got to see the ruins of the house of Eustolios, a Roman from the fifth century. It's known that it was his house because he is identified as the owner in the beautiful floor mosaics, which are still visible.

Most remarkable was a mosaic on the floor of what is believed to be a sitting room. The tiles spell out, in ancient Greek characters that can still be read today, "This house was once under the rule of gold and silver, but now it is under the rule of Jesus Christ." This was a testament to how fast Christianity spread through this part of the world during the first few centuries after the crucifixion.

The rest of our time in Limassol, as I mentioned before, was pretty much spent in the bars, or on tours of local wineries. Either way, the results were pretty much the same.

A few Semester at Sea students managed to go visit the northern half of Cyprus, controlled by the Islamic Turks, but I was unfortunately not among them. A United Nations force keeps the two sides separated, and like the old wall separating East and West Berlin, travel is all but impossible between northern and southern Cyprus.

On our last day in Cyprus, we received devastating news. Because of the tensions in the Middle East in the wake of the Rami Yousef conviction for the World Trade Center bombing, and after the close call with tragedy that Semester at Sea students had with the terrorist attacks in Luxor, Egypt, anxious parents back home were calling, demanding to get us out of the region. So, at the last minute, we found out our visit to Istanbul was being canceled. Instead of heading on to Turkey after Cyprus, we were instead going to Greece a week early, and then from Greece on to Spain.

Needless to say, morale on the ship was at an all-time low. For many students Turkey, like Israel, was one of the most anticipated ports of call. For my Islamic Art class, which was already denied the possibility of visiting the historic Islamic sites of Jerusalem, the loss of Islamic Istanbul was devastating.

And so, on the morning of Nov. 23, we sailed away from Cyprus, and on to Greece, bypassing Turkey altogether. It is with great sadness that we did so, for I do not know when I might have the opportunity to return to this part of the world.

Για σου, Κυπρος.

British band breaks stereotypes

LANDON TRAUNY
senior staff writer

For those of you who like original music from new bands out of the United Kingdom, Dubstar has arrived.

The past couple of years, many of the new bands from the U.K. have really begun to bore me. This is largely due to the bands' attitudes as well as the music.

Oasis thinks it is the Beatles, Blur compares itself to the Rolling Stones and Bush is supposed to be the UK version of Nirvana.

Music Review

▶ check the e
Want to hear? Check the e-Collegian to sample a few tunes from Dubstar.

Bands like this need to take notice that, as their names point out, they are not who they think they are. The lack of originality in their music might be successful, but if I wanted to hear this style of music, I would just play the Beatles, Stones or Nirvana.

I'm happy to say that bands like Prodigy, Republica and now Dubstar have restored my faith in the U.K.

Dubstar's debut album, "Goodbye," offers a refreshing breath for the music scene.

One thing that makes the album enjoyable is that Sarah Blackwood, lead vocalist of the trio, has what so many bands lack today, a voice worthy of singing. There are none of those cranky or scratchy vocals so many bands pass off as talent. She sings with a beautiful and soft voice that will float you through the album.

Another positive note about "Goodbye" is that the topics about which Blackwood sings have a lot of meaning. These range from the different points of relationships and self-reflection to just plain fun. Some of the songs like "Just a Girl She Said," "Can't Tell Me" and "Not So Manic Now" deal with women's issues in an encouraging way. You can tell these songs, which deal with self-respect, independence and abuse, were given a sensitive touch, which is uplifting.

The third refreshing aspect of this album is the music. Dubstar shows it is very versatile and successful in this area. It incorporates the electronica/rock/techno sound to cover the spectrum of tempo. Its songs make an easy transition from slow songs to upbeat techno and then back to middle-of-the-road tempos without any trouble.

The first song on the album, "Stars," has quietly made a positive statement for the band. It is a slow-tempo and symbolic song about falling in love that starts the album off in the right direction. The music is put together very tight and shows that this band knows what it is doing. Dubstar even added two extra techno mixes of this song to its album. It's a nice bonus.

The fifth track, "The View From Here," is more upbeat and another winner. This is one of the many songs that Dubstar incorporates guitar riffs, and it does a nice balancing act not to overuse it. The chorus in this song is great. It sounds as though Blackwood could really be standing on some mountain ledge overlooking a Swiss valley.

The seventh track, "No More Talk," is awesome. It's a song about rocky times in relationships. Once again Blackwood does a tremendous job. If my girlfriend yelled her arguments at me as beautifully as Blackwood sings her argument on this song, I'm afraid I would probably enjoy arguments with my girlfriend. Nonetheless, this song is really great. The keyboards and electronic reverberations in the background really complement the vocals on this song.

Although I really enjoyed this album, I think I should warn you about one song. The ninth track, "Ghost," should not be listened to for at least two months after an intense break-up. The vocals, words and music just might lead to the extreme crying out of your heart. Even the most macho guys will sulk behind closed doors. Behind Blackwood's singing, haunting vocals drift through the background alongside a mandolin. "Ghost" was cleverly constructed with these aspects, so that the feeling really comes out.

Overall, Dubstar makes a convincing bid as a great band for now and the future. If you could possibly mold New Order, Republica and the Cranberries into one band, you might come up with something similar to Dubstar. However, as its name states, Dubstar is its own band, and that's refreshing.

Potential cancer treatment to be tested on humans

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BETHESDA, Md. — Raj Puri injected mice with an experimental "smart bomb" for cancer and watched as huge tumors disappeared from their bodies within a few weeks.

Puri discovered the potential cancer therapy in a tiny, little-known laboratory at the Food and Drug Administration — and now the government has given Puri's invention to an Illinois biotechnology company that hopes to begin testing it in people with killer brain tumors and kidney cancer late next year.

The saga is unusual because the FDA is supposed to regulate drugs, not invent them — and if this interleukin-13 therapy ultimately works in people, NeoPharm Inc. will need FDA permission to sell it.

This comes at a time when the FDA's biotechnology laboratories are threatened by budget cuts.

"Should they be discovering drugs? I don't think that's their job," said Alan Goldhammer of the Biotechnology Industry Organization, one of several trade groups that successfully pushed legislation to block the FDA from using $10 million a year in industry fees to fund the labs.

But William Govier, NeoPharm's chief executive, says his company may have saved $100 million in drug-development work by merely licensing the FDA's discovery.

The collaboration "is a shining example of what should work," Govier said. "We don't have the scientists on board with these skills. This is truly cutting-edge science."

Puri's discovery was a surprise. He had run out of the immune system cells needed for an experiment and out of curiosity stuck breast cancer cells under the microscope instead.

Covering them were receptors for an immune substance called interleukin-13, or IL-13. Amazed, he analyzed brain tumors, kidney tumors and the AIDS-related Kaposi's sarcoma — and the solid tumors had large clusters of these magnet-like receptors, while h althy cells had very few.

> "When you know what the risks are yourself — you didn't just read about them — you know when to say no."
> • Mark Elengold
> overseer of Puri's branch of the FDA

IL-13 travels straight to the receptors and latches on. Puri essentially discovered a potential guided missile: Attach a cancer-killing drug to the IL-13 and the substance should carry the chemotherapy straight inside the tumor.

A string of studies published in distinguished medical journals showed it works in test tubes. Then Puri tried treating sick mice. His eyes widened with excitement as he displayed for a reporter autopsy photos that show untreated mice covered in bloody tumors from Kaposi's sarcoma next to healthy-looking treated mice.

"We've had tumors that were about 20 percent the body weight of the animal to completely disappear," he said.

Puri asked longtime cancer researcher Waldemar Debinski of Pennsylvania State University to develop the tumor toxin, made from bacteria, that is attached to IL-13. Debinski said his separate experiments suggest low doses of the resulting drug can destroy — in mice — incurable brain tumors called glioblastomas.

Drugs that work in mice don't necessarily work in people.

"It is quite a significant finding," said Debinski, who envisions testing people with brain tumors within a year. In addition, NeoPharm plans human testing against killer kidney cancer.

Discovering potential drugs and licensing them to companies is routine for the research-driven National Institutes of Health, but it's unusual for a regulatory agency. The FDA has licensed its own discoveries to 27 companies, mostly laboratory tests important in determining the safety and effectiveness of medical treatments. If the IL-13 drug ultimately works, it could become the first medicine sold through this project — and Puri would get royalties.

Consequently, "there's a real fire wall" to ensure Puri has no say in the regulation of NeoPharm, said Mark Elengold, who oversees Puri's branch of FDA.

But labs like Puri's are in for some downsizing because of the new law that will phase out by 2001 the $10 million a year they once got from industry, rolling them back to 1992 spending levels.

That has Elengold worried: The labs are where his employees learn how medicines function at the molecular level so they can, for instance, predict unforeseen side effects before allowing a new drug to sell.

"When you know what the risks are yourself — you didn't just read about them — you know when to say no," Elengold explained.

As for discovering a new drug, "that was serendipity," stressed Puri, whose main job is helping approve medicines. "To regulate cutting-edge research, you have to get your hands dirty. When you do that, who knows what you'll find?"

Former Iowa football player tackles would-be robber

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OMAHA, Neb. — A former Iowa football player used his brawn to break up a robbery at his north Omaha grocery store.

Larry Station Jr., who became the Hawkeyes' all-time leading tackler more than a decade ago, was working in his office Monday evening when he heard a scuffle and saw that a would-be robber had a clerk on the ground and was trying to open a safe near the register.

"When people come into the store, I don't allow anyone — customer or employee — to be disrespected," the 34-year-old ex-football player said Tuesday.

After seeing the clerk — his aunt, Dorothy Station — on the ground, he ran out of his office and grabbed the man, not knowing that he had a 6-inch steak knife.

"I had him in a headlock," Station said. "He tried to stab up under my arm."

As the men struggled, they broke a plastic divider near the cash register, which freed the man momentarily.

He nearly got out the door, but Station tripped him and pulled him back in the store by the ankle.

He intertwined his legs with the robber's so he couldn't get up.

"He told me that he couldn't breathe," Station said. "I told him to stop trying to get up. If he kept moving, it would hurt a lot more."

Station — 5 feet 11 inches tall and 220 pounds — was able to detain the 170-pound man by lying on top of him until officers arrived.

Station received four stitches for a chest wound at a local hospital.

Police arrested Thomas E. Pettis, 38, and charged him with attempted robbery, second-degree assault and use of a weapon.

Police spokesman Sgt. Jim Deignan said Pettis was out on bail after being charged in connection with six robberies in the same area last spring.

Station, a former all-state football player at Omaha Central High School and a University of Iowa linebacker, was drafted by the Pittsburgh Steelers. He played for a year but was released because of an injury.

Station is Iowa's all-time leading tackler, with 492 from 1982 to 1985.

Helen Cooper, assistant director of facilities planning, said past physical master plans for the campus would be adhered to for a few years and then forgotten.

"So often those plans became too static," Cooper said.

The question of a parking garage and its effect on both the campus and community was raised in regard to what process a Manhattan resident could use to voice concerns about such a project.

"I'm not sure there is a mechanism for that," said Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance. "Up to this point, it's been a university matter. We need to have a conversation about that."

Rawson said he wants the university to be a good citizen and would certainly not want to do something that would offend the community.

Bruce Snead, mayor of Manhattan, suggested a longer view be taken with building projects, because most of the money involved in a new building is the renovation and service it requires in its lifetime.

"Decisions at least made in the awareness of that, at least in the interest of planning, should be added to that," Snead said, referring to the new campus planning document.

Questions lasted for nearly 30 minutes, but there were no students in attendance, except one student representative to the development committee. That committee will not meet again until 10:30 a.m. Jan. 15 in the office of facilities planning.

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

SUN DEE MILLS is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send your e-mail comments to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu.

Jamaica's Winter Olympic bobsled team. Coach Gary Barnett and Northwestern's football team. Last season's Arizona basketball team.

Cinderella stories abound in the sports world. But the one that's perhaps the most untold is happening in your own backyard.

K-State alumni from all corners of the country can remember a dismal moment in the history of Wildcat football. When Coach Bill Snyder strolled into Manhattan, the Cats were coming off a 26-game losing streak, with one tie with Kansas in 1987 being the only mark of semi-positiveness.

On Nov. 30, 1988, Snyder was introduced as K-State's 32nd football coach. No coach in the history of the school had lasted more than eight years. And Snyder, who is now finishing his ninth year, made no promises.

Not a press conference has gone by in the two seasons I've been attending them that Snyder did not allude to taking everything one day at a time — whether it was enlarging the stadium, replenishing his roster or adding more "Ws" in the win column.

And if anyone challenges the way Snyder does things, there are countless fans that leap to his defense and point to the success of his program for proof.

Snyder's strict work ethic began on day one, when he closed the team to the media and requested that the school make a commitment to the football program in financial terms. He built this program from the ground up, and he was working on quicksand in the early years.

The idea that K-State's football team was more suited for Division I-AA competition was widely circulating on campus. In his first season, Snyder posted one win vs. North Texas State. What Snyder was doing with the program was sparked by that win. And that was apparent to fans.

But the best was yet to come.

Little by little, the program picked itself up by its shoelaces and improved gradually every year. The Cats' Copper Bowl appearance in 1993 was the first since a loss in the 1982 Independence Bowl to Wisconsin (the first K-State bowl appearance ever). To get to the Independence Bowl, the Cats posted a 6-5-1 record. Since 1993, the team has never had fewerthan nine victories.

While Snyder was rebuilding my future livelihood, I was preoccupied with high school and plans for college. I was living in Texas the year the Cats went to the Copper Bowl, and my sister and some of her friends stopped in San Antonio to see me on their way to Tucson, Ariz. They met 20,000-odd Cat fans in Arizona and watched the Cats wallop Wyoming 52-17 as part of the nationwide TV audience.

I had no idea then that I would be here now, writing this column, frantically preparing for my graduation from the University of the Purple People and arranging frenzied plans to attend the first Alliance Bowl of the school's history. I hope it will be the first of many Alliance Bowls for my school and my professional career as well.

But as thrilled as I am that my fondest Christmas wish was granted, I can't forget the people who suffered through the seemingly endless drought this program endured. My utmost respect and admiration go out to them, and my guess is a majority of them will be there to watch the Cats on this historic day.

I am from the fast-food, fast-everything generation, the generation that has the reputation of wanting it all five minutes ago. And honestly, I'm not sure I would have been patient enough to wait for the success the program is now seeing.

As you party in Tempe, Ariz., with your roommates, your fraternity brothers and sorority sisters, have a cold one with the couple clad in purple at the table next to you and enjoy their "I-remember-when ..." stories. Be thankful that you'll have your own stories to tell.

Your stories will revolve around great athletes, winning seasons and fun Christmas vacation destinations. But those stories are no more important than the ones of the past.

That's what makes this school and this experience so special. No one expected it to be where it is today, but a select few had a vision of what it could be. They worked hard to achieve it and we all benefit from it in some way today.

Yes, my journalism degree will be of use in searching for a job. But only nine other sports editors in the country can put "Reported on a top-10 team" on their résumés.

Fiesta Bowl Executive Director John Junker said K-State resembled the history of the Fiesta Bowl — a bowl that started in 1971 as a regional bowl game that didn't achieve national prominence until recently. It entered the Alliance with a bang in 1995, as the nation watched the national champion Nebraska Cornhuskers make fish food of the Florida Gators 62-24.

Junker said K-State's story has been "undertold." Perhaps, if the Cats return to the Fiesta Bowl next year to compete in the national championship game, the Fiesta Bowl will help create a new story.

BEFORE BOWL DREAMS

I started school at K-State in 1989, and I remember the big debate was whether or not to continue football.
I thought everyone was crazy.
We tore the goal post down if we beat anyone.
It feels great knowing I was right.

FIESTAHOOPS?

Sold-out games to be on Arizona TV, radio

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Fans planning to make their trip to Arizona into a Wildcat sports week might be in for a surprise.

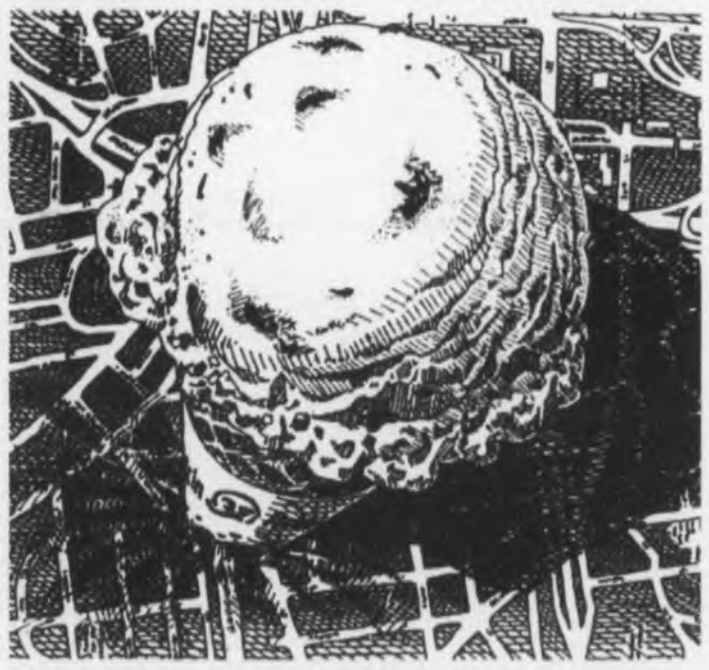
Tickets to the Fiesta Bowl Basketball Classic — featuring K-State, Davidson, James Madison and 1996 national champion Arizona — will be hotter than the temperature in Tuscon Dec. 28 and 30.

K-State was only allotted 250 tickets and those were snapped up quickly, K-State Assistant Sports Information Director Dan Wallenberg said.

So fans staying in or around the Phoenix-Tempe area will be unable to see the Cats play, because the TV station that broadcasts Arizona's games — KTTU-TV 18 — is not available in that area. If fans want to road-trip to Tucson, the Arizona/James Madison game will air Dec. 28 at 7:37 p.m. and the championship game will air at 7:37 p.m. on Dec. 30 on that station. An alternative for fans staying in the Phoenix/Tempe area is to listen on the radio.

Phoenix's KGME-1360 AM will broadcast the games Arizona plays. If K-State should make it to the championship game, the Dec. 30 late game will be the one to tune in.

However, fans listening on the radio might be in for a little confusion as well.



Tom Asbury's Wildcats are set to meet the Davidson Wildcats in the first game of the tournament at 5:15 p.m. Lute Olson's Wildcats will face the James Madison Dukes at 7:37 p.m.

Athletic Ticket Manager Carol Adolph said more tickets may become available but they'd be coming from the Arizona ticket office, so it was questionable. Watch the Collegian for updates.

The smile on K-State senior running back Eric Hickson's face continued to light up hours after he and his teammates learned No. 9 K-State would spend New Year's Eve in Tempe, Ariz., playing No. 14 Syracuse in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

"We were like, 'Yeah! Yeah!,'" Hickson said. "Now we know who we're going to play. Now we know with good preparation, we're ready to get it going for Arizona."

For K-State, it is the first Alliance Bowl berth in school history.

For Hickson, it is just another opportunity to play.

"As far as me, I'm glad I get to go to a bowl game again," Hickson said at Sunday's bowl selection press conference. "I get to play. I've never been able to play in a big bowl like this. It's been a great season and I haven't had any injuries that have kept me from any practices or games."

After spending the entire 1996 season sidelined with a broken leg, Hickson returned in 1997 and led the Wildcats with 750 yards rushing. He ran for a career-high 163 yards against Bowling Green. His 79 rushing yards in the final game of the regular season against Iowa State earned him 1,635 for his career, sixth on the K-State all-time rushing list.

Hickson said he didn't look to break records this season. Instead he took it one day at a time, where he made the most out of every practice, every game and every opportunity on the field.

"My biggest obstacle?" Hickson said. "I didn't have any obstacles."

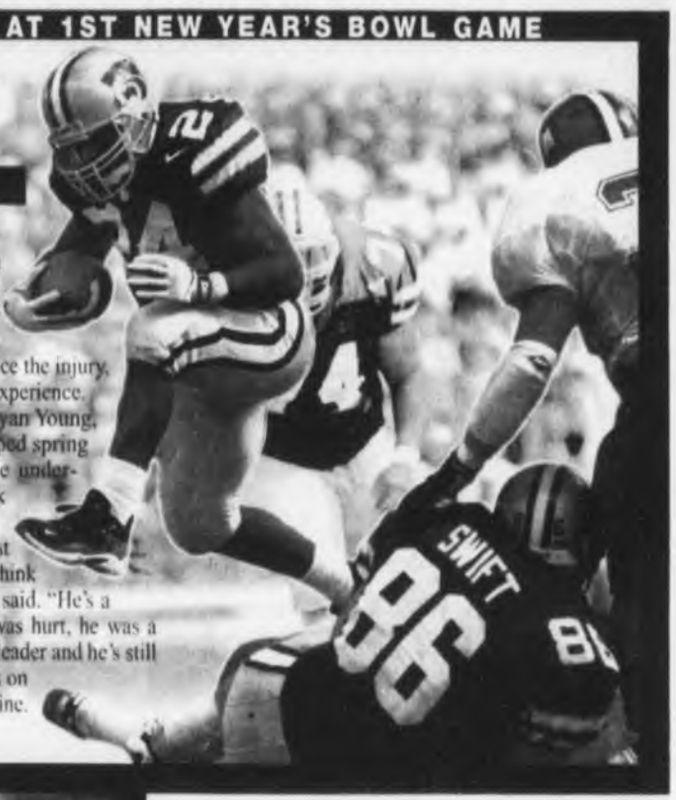
Don't look for Hickson to relive any memories of last year's Cotton Bowl, where the best he could do was yell support to his teammates on the field. K-State lost to Brigham Young, 19-15.

"Last year's game is behind us," he said. "We can only learn from the Cotton Bowl."

Instead, focus on Hickson's performance during the 1995 Holiday Bowl, his last bowl game appearance. As a sophomore, he led the Wildcats with 103 yards rushing and a touchdown. They won, 54-21.

Now, it's on to the Fiesta Bowl.

"We have something to prove," Hickson said. "There's still a lot of non-believers out there. We want to go out there and play a good game and hopefully come out with a win."



However, Hickson said he realized after watching film that every yard will count against Syracuse, whose rushing defense led the Big East and allowed 109 yards a game this season.

"They've got nice size and run well, and they're real physical and play hard," he said. "They are always around the football."

Hickson said the team should leave the past behind. He said he has not changed since the injury, just grown stronger from the experience.

Senior offensive tackle Ryan Young, whose blocks this season helped spring Hickson's comeback, said he understood what the running back went through last year.

"After Eric was hurt last year, any game Eric played I think was important to him," Young said. "He's a competitor. Even when Eric was hurt, he was a vocal person and very intense leader and he's still the same now, except now he's on the field instead of on the sideline. He hasn't changed a bit."

GAME 1. K-State 47, Northern Illinois 7

In it's first game of the year, K-State dominated the Huskies. The Wildcats took a 42-7 lead into halftime, while keeping Northern Illinois to only 90 yards in the first half. Community college transfer quarterback Michael Bishop, who won the competition to be the Wildcats' starter, ran for 98 yards and a touchdown, while completing eight of 13 passes for 172 yards and four touchdowns.

GAME 2. K-State 23, Ohio 20

In a game in which Ohio dominated statistically, K-State's 23-point halftime lead was enough of a pad to save victory for the Wildcats. Lamar Chapman returned a punt 94 yards for a touchdown, and kicker Martin Gramatica booted three field goals, two of which measured at more than 50 yards. On a broken play, Bishop scrambled and hit wide receiver Gavin Peries for a 39-yard gain to set up K-State's other score.

GAME 3. K-State 58, Bowling Green 0

The Wildcats recovered from the Ohio game to set a school record with 638 yards of total offense, 429 of which were on the ground. Running back Eric Hickson picked up 89 yards on the ground in the first quarter and 163 for the game. The Falcons managed only six first downs for the game and had 56 yards of total offense. The Cats kept Bowling Green to negative 9 yards rushing on 27 attempts, and completed a 3-0 non-conference schedule, all against Mid-American Conference teams.

GAME 4. Nebraska 56, K-State 26

The Cornhuskers handed the Wildcats their only loss of the season with a dominating win in Lincoln, Nebraska's 29th-straight victory over K-State. The Huskers jumped out to a 7-0 lead, but K-State scored on its first possession. The extra-point try was unsuccessful, and 7-6 was as close as the Cats would get. Nebraska would take a 41-6 lead and coast to victory. The Huskers had 379 yards rushing, led by 193 by Ahman Green.

GAME 5. K-State 41, Missouri 11

Michael Bishop set a Big 12 quarterback rushing record with 196 yards on the ground in leading the Wildcats to victory. The K-State defense kept Mizzou quarterback Corby Jones to 106 yards passing and kept the Tigers without a touchdown until late in the fourth quarter. This game was Mizzou's final loss until an overtime setback to Nebraska on Nov. 8.

GAME 6. K-State 36, Texas A&M 17

The Wildcat defense dominated Texas A&M, who came into the game undefeated and the No. 14 team in the country. The Aggies had been averaging 278 rushing yards per game, but had negative 35 against the Cats. K-State, on the other hand, picked up 247 yards rushing against an Aggie defense that had kept opponents to only 85 ground yards. Punt returner David Allen set a school record with 125 punt return yards. The Aggies scored seven points on a blocked punt and seven more after an interception brought them to the Wildcat 1-yard line.

GAME 7. K-State 26, Oklahoma 7

The Wildcats' defense again was key in the game, keeping the Sooners to only one touchdown and keeping De'Mond Parker, Oklahoma's leading rusher, to negative 3 yards on four carries. The game was a bit closer than the score indicated — the Cats had a 10-7 lead in the third quarter, but scored on three of their next four possessions to put the game out of the Sooners' reach.

GAME 8. K-State 13, Texas Tech 2

In a tight defensive battle, the Wildcats outlasted the Red Raiders 13-2. Neither team could get much going offensively. K-State had an 80-yard touchdown called back on a holding penalty. On the next play, K-State quarterback Jonathan Beasley was flagged for intentional grounding in the end zone, resulting in a Tech safety. K-State's defense forced a goal-line fumble by Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge after a Bishop interception to preserve the win.

GAME 9. K-State 48, Kansas 16

The Wildcats took their fifth-consecutive win in the 95th Sunflower Showdown. K-State scored touchdowns on its first two drives and never looked back. K-State defensive back Gerald Neasman had touchdowns on a 99-yard kickoff return and a 41-yard interception return, and David Allen had a 70-yard punt return for a score.

GAME 10. K-State 37, Colorado 20

The Wildcats beat the Buffaloes for the first time since 1984 and finished the season undefeated at home. The Cats withstood a late Colorado charge to hold on to a victory and ensure that K-State would have a fifth-consecutive nine-win season. The 15 Wildcat seniors making their final KSU Stadium appearance went out with an elusive win against Colorado, as well as never having lost to Oklahoma or Kansas.

GAME 11. K-State 28, Iowa State 3

The Wildcats disposed of the Cyclones to finish their regular season at 10-1, K-State's first 10-win regular season since 1910. The Cats kept the Cyclones to zero yards rushing on 36 attempts and sacked Iowa State quarterback Todd Bandhauer eight times. K-State had 416 yards of total offense, including 284 rushing yards. Running back Mike Lawrence gained 102 yards on the ground to pass J. J. Smith's record for first place on the school's career rushing list with 2,264 career yards rushing.

K-State begins bowl tradition of fan support in the 1990s

SUN DEE MILLS

Fifteen years ago Thursday marks the anniversary of the Wildcats' first bowl appearance, the Independence Bowl in Shreveport, La. On Dec. 11, 1982, the Cats lost to Wisconsin 14-3. But in their next bowl appearance 11 years later, the Cats produced a totally different outcome.

The K-State offense sent touchdown after touchdown into the end zone in the 52-17 rout of the Wyoming Cowboys in the 1993 Copper Bowl. Running, passing, returning — the Cats' offensive unit, spearheaded by quarterback Chad May and assisted by wide receivers Andre Coleman and freshman Kevin Lockett as well as running back J.J. Smith — accounted for five touchdowns. Place kicker Tate Wright added a 22-yard field goal, backup-back Leon Edwards ran in a touchdown and cornerback Kenny McEntyre put the icing on the cake with a 37-yard interception return for the last touchdown of the game.

And the purple started what has now become its annual drift to warmer climates for the past five years. The 49,075 fans attending the Copper Bowl set an attendance record for that bowl, and about 20,000 of those fans were sporting purple and white.

"As the sun begins to set on Tuscon tonight, you're going to see a purple haze on the horizon," Athletic Director Max Urick said at the Copper Bowl Kickoff Luncheon. "Because they're coming and they're coming by the thousands."

For the most part, this speech could have been recorded and played at each bowl kickoff luncheon for the next three bowl games.

Except the 1994 Aloha Bowl. Played in Honolulu, Hawaii, the Aloha Bowl posted the lowest bowl fan count of the 1990s, for the obvious reason of distance. In Aloha Stadium, the Cats fell to Boston College 12-7.

K-State All-America quarterback Chad May landed on his back eight times in the defensive battle with the Eagles. The Cats scored at the end of the first quarter off sophomore cornerback Joe Gordon's blocked punt that backup tight end Chris Sublette recovered in the end zone. But that was the Cats' only offensive mark.

"For the most part, I thought our defense played well," Snyder said after the loss. "I didn't like that early play of the ballgame because it put them in a position to score a quick touchdown, but otherwise I felt our defense played fairly well."

In 1995, the Cats went into the Holiday Bowl with the nation's No. 1 defense. This defense was led by game MVP Mario Smith, who picked off two passes, broke up two passes and recorded four tackles. The Colorado State Rams were the Western Athletic Conference's No. 1 team, but the Cats made quick work of the Rams before 51,000 fans, defeating them soundly 54-21.

K-State set bowl records for points scored, first downs (30), total plays (80), total net yards (536), passing yards (324), interceptions (3) and points allowed (21) in the Holiday Bowl game. However, this offensive success didn't carry over to the Cats' next bowl appearance.

The 1997 Cotton Bowl marked the first time the Cats had ever played on New Year's Day. About 45,000 purple people made the relatively short trip to Dallas to watch the Cats play No. 5 Brigham Young University.

Cat wide receiver Kevin Lockett won game MVP honors for grabbing seven passes for 135 yards, one

QUARTERBACKS

Junior Orangeman quarterback Donovan McNabb has a string of awards and records attached to his name, as well as the numbers to back them up. The Davey O'Brien Award finalist ranks No. 26 in the nation in passing efficiency while leading the Big East. After completing 145 of 265 passes for 2,488 yards, he moved into first place at Syracuse for total offensive yards with 2,892 and helped his team set new season-high marks in points, touchdowns and passing yards. Using the option, McNabb enjoys scrambling as well; he's third in Syracuse rushing yardage with 404 yards on 110 attempts

Wildcat quarterback Michael Bishop's numbers look suspiciously like McNabb's, especially on the rushing side. Bishop set a Cat quarterback season rushing record with 566 yards on 147 carries, but he also managed decent passing yardage for the season. After contributing 327 yards on 61 attempts on the run, Bishop injured an ankle in the Oct. 11 Texas A&M game. From that game on, Bishop completed 50 of 113 passes for 896 yards and had a career-high 218 passing yards against Kansas, the then-No. 1 passing defense in the Big 12.

EDGE: DRAW

OFFENSIVE LINE

The Orangemen's o-line averages 6-4 in height and weighs in at an average 297.2 pounds, with right guard Brent Warren as the big man at 6-5, 338 pounds. Behind this line, the Orangemen amassed 2,417 yards on 534 attempts in 12 games.

No doubt the Cats come in larger — all five starters weigh in at more than 300 pounds, a K-State first. The Cats' o-line averages 316 pounds and stands at 6-4. Both seniors Todd Weiner and Kendyl Jacox were named to the first team All-Big 12 Conference team, and behind this line the Cats ran for 2,422 yards on 541 attempts in 11 games.

EDGE: CATS

RUNNING BACKS

The Orange's tailback Kyle McIntosh leads Syracuse with a net 898 yards rushing in 181 attempts and gains an average 5 yards per attempt. McIntosh has also brought in six touchdowns. However, the next-closest player statistically is running back Dee Brown, with 555 net yards. Brown is responsible for a team-high eight touchdowns. McNabb comes in third with 404 yards and six rushing touchdowns. On Nov. 29 vs. Miami, these three each rushed for more than 100 yards for the first time in Syracuse history.

K-State divides rushing time between seniors Eric Hickson and Mike Lawrence. Hickson leads the pack with 750 net yards, averaging 4.4 yards a carry and nine season touchdowns. Lawrence contributed 605 yards on the ground this season and ran in six touchdowns. He surpassed former Cat J.J. Smith to become the school's career rushing leader with 2,265 yards in the Iowa State game Nov. 22. With the Cats, the QB comes in third as well — Bishop added 566 yards rushing this season and took over the single-season rushing quarterback title. Bishop also set the season record for quarterback rushing touchdowns with nine.

WIDE RECEIVERS/TIGHT ENDS

Syracuse's aerial attack centers around three players — Quinton Spotwood, Kevin Johnson and Jim Turner. Together, these wideouts have caught 96 passes for 1,897 yards. All three have played in all 12 games. Spotwood, a sophomore, grabbed 41 of those passes for 797 season yards and eight touchdowns while becoming only the third Orangeman to surpass 1,000 career receiving yards in two seasons. Starting tight end Roland Williams has seen the field in all 12 games but only caught eight passes for 132 yards and one touchdown

The Cats receiving duo of Darnell McDonald, Gavin Peries and tight end Justin Swift make up the majority of the K-State receiving yardage. Between the three, they've caught 53 passes for 1,112 yards. Hickson and Lawrence have contributed on the receiving end as well. None of the starting receivers had played on the Cats' field prior to this season.

EDGE: ORANGEMEN

DEFENSIVE LINEMEN

The Orangemen's ends Dulayne Morgan and Jason Walters combine for have 46 unassisted tackles and 40 assisted tackles between them. Walters has seven sacks for negative 41 yards and Morgan bought quarterbacks down six times for negative 38 yards. Together, they are credited for hurrying quarterbacks 19 times.

All four Cat linemen are responsible for 195 total tackles, with end Darren Howard at the top — 18 tackles for negative 83 yards, 11 of those sacks for negative 68 yards. Howard also recovered three fumbles, tying for a team-high. The group has forced five fumbles and broken up 10 passes, and end Joe Bob Clements has the corps's lone interception.

EDGE: CATS

LINEBACKERS

Orangeman Antwaune Ponds leads a formidable Syracuse linebacker trio. Ponds leads the pack with 119 tackles, tying a team-high. Eight tackles were for a loss of 27 yards. The group sacked quarterback five times for negative 21 yards. Keith Bullock follows with 90 tackles and Morlon Greenwood recorded 64.

The Cats' linebackers — Jeff Kelly, Mark Simoneau and Travis Ochs — make up one of the country's most talented linebacker corps. Kelly was rewarded the Big 12 Defensive Newcomer of the Year, with a team-high 109 tackles. Kelly also had 23 tackles for negative 107 yards, seven sacks, one fumble recovery and two forced fumbles. Simoneau, last season's Big 12 Freshman of the Year, had 100 total tackles, four sacks, two fumble recoveries and forced two fumbles. Ochs intercepted one pass and recorded three sacks for negative 32 yards.

EDGE: CATS

SECONDARY

Syracuse safety Donovin Darius was named an American Football Coaches Association first team all-America selection and was also named Big East player of the week after the Miami game Nov. 29. Darius, who ranks 11th in the nation in interceptions, intercepted his seventh pass of the season against the Hurricanes and co-leads the team in tackles with 119. Safety Tebucky Jones has intercepted four passes for 104 yards and recovered three fumbles. The Orangemen are second in the Big East in passing defense, allowing 167 of 326 passes to be completed and eight for touchdowns. The Orange-man secondary also recorded 16 interceptions.

The Cats' secondary leads the Big 12 in pass defense as well. The Cats, in a less-active passing conference, have allowed 99 completions in 239 attempts for 126.9 yards per game and only four touchdowns through the air. As a team, the Cats have 5 interceptions. Strong safety Jarrod Cooper has nine tackles for negative 56 yards and free safety Lamar Chapman recovered three fumbles this season.

EDGE: DRAW

SPECIAL TEAMS

Spotwood leads the Big East in punt returns and Johnson leads in kickoff returns, and both players are second nationally in their respective categories. Spotwood averages 105 punt return yards per game and Johnson brings kickoffs back an average 94.8 yards. Punter Doug Dunkin averages 40.7 yards a punt. Place kicker Nate Trout connected on 11 of 15 field goals, going six-of-six from the 30-39 yard range.

Cat punt returner David Allen averages 13.4 yards a return and recorded one return for a touchdown. Leading kickoff return man Gerald Neasman returned a kickoff 99 yards for a touchdown vs. Kansas on Nov. 8 and averages 33.9 yards a return. Punter James Garcia puts balls in the air for an average 43.7 yards and Lou Groza Place-Kicker Award candidate Martin Gramatica went 19-of-20 in field goal attempts this season, missing only a 45-yarder in the first quarter of the Oklahoma game Oct. 25.

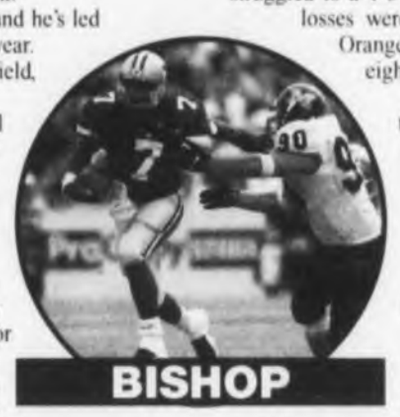
2 opposing quarterbacks mirror each other's styles



SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

He's the fleet-footed junior quarterback.

He likes to run, he has a strong arm and he's led his team to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl this year.

And during the game, he'll be on the field, regardless of who has the ball.

That's because he's K-State's Michael Bishop. And he's Syracuse's Donovan McNabb.

Each quarterback has developed a reputation this season — a reputation of being a running quarterback.

Bishop set the K-State single-season record for rushing by a quarterback by gaining 566 yards and McNabb ran for 404.

"McNabb is a quality player, kind of a Michael Bishop-type of guy," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

While Snyder is impressed with McNabb, Syracuse coach Paul Pasqualoni is equally impressed with Bishop.

"He's a tremendous athlete for a quarterback," Pasqualoni said. "He's a tremendous runner."

McNabb has thrown for 2,488 yards and 20 touchdowns this season, against only six interceptions.

"A lot of people say I'm a running quarterback, but I just look at myself as a quarterback," McNabb said. "I just try to do what it takes to win."

Lately, he's been doing a decent job at that. Syracuse struggled to a 1-3 start this season, although two of those losses were by a combined three points. But the Orangemen haven't lost since Sept. 20, winning eight consecutive games.

Of course, Bishop knows a thing or two about winning. He won two community college national championships at Blinn, Texas, and has compiled a 34-1 record as a starter in college, the only loss coming this season at Nebraska.

However, McNabb, a preseason Heisman Trophy candidate, has been on fire as well.

He set the Syracuse single-season record for total offensive yards with 2,892, and being responsible for 66 touchdowns, he's the school's all-time leader.

Also, with McNabb lining up behind center, the Orangemen set school records for points in a season, 423, touchdowns, 57, and passing yards, 2,710.

"I was thinking that he was a guy like Michael, running the ball 70 or 80 yards a game, but he's very balanced," Snyder said. "He runs the bootleg and play action well, and he's a very good drop-back passer."

Syracuse free safety's 'final' game might not be his last

staff writer

Syracuse free safety Donovin Darius will line up against K-State in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl on Dec. 31 for his final college game.

The Wildcats will be the senior's final opponent while he's with the Orangemen, but this might not be his last football game.

He has a good chance at playing in the National Football League next season.

The Sporting News rated Darius as the No. 3 free safety prospect in the nation, and he'll try to put on a show for the scouts.

But he'll probably have to learn a little more about the Cats before game day to have a successful outing.

"When I think of Kansas State, I think of tornadoes," he said.

Learning about K-State shouldn't be a problem, though.

Darius considers himself a student of the game, always learning, always trying to find ways to improve his play.

He doesn't yet know much about what he'll take on when he squares off against the ninth-ranked Cats in Tempe, Ariz., because to this point, Syracuse has spent more time practicing fundamentals than preparing for an opponent.

After all, the Orangemen clinched an alliance berth with their Big East Conference championship-clinching win over Miami on Nov. 29 and waited until Sunday to find out who their opponent would be.

Still, Darius figures to know a little more about K-State than tornadoes come kickoff time.

He's been prepared all season, part of the reason he was one of six semifinalists for the Jim Thorpe Award, given annually to the best defensive back in college football.

He wasn't one of the three finalists, but he doesn't care.

"Being all-conference is good enough for me," he said. "I don't take anything for granted. Anything. It's an honor to be named a semifinalist or just to be considered for the award," Darius said.

While he won't have the memory of receiving the award, he'll always remember being nominated.

He keeps all sorts of souvenirs from his Syracuse days, from game films to newspaper clippings to photographs of spending time with his teammates.

Keeping a college scrapbook could seem a little trivial for a guy who might wind up playing on Sundays, but not for Darius.

"You never know," he said. "It's all my memories. People who overlook that stuff don't realize that every play could be their last."

While he won't win the Jim Thorpe Award, he'll probably reap rewards for his play come draft day in April. He bench presses 360 pounds, runs a 40-yard dash in 4.48 seconds and views himself as a "very aggressive safety," an opinion that isn't disagreed with.

"He's pretty tough," said Oklahoma offensive guard Greg Moyer, who played against Darius this season. "He's a real hard-hitter."

It's a style that will probably land him in the NFL.

"Definitely," Oklahoma linebacker Terrance Malone said of Darius' NFL chances. "There's no question about it."

During his days at Syracuse, Darius doubled as a member of the track team.

He enjoyed success running the 55- and 400-meter hurdles, something he's done since high school.

"It gives me more flexibility and it makes me more agile. The different movements allow me to maintain my speed and power," he said.

Still, when it comes time to choose sports, his first love is strapping on the shoulder pads.

"I'm definitely a football player," he said.

He's a football player who likes to hit and hopes opposing receivers think twice before flying through his territory.

"I like to be around the ball. I want to give 110 percent on every play," he said. "But that can be one of my weaknesses. Sometimes, I try to do too much."

Orangemen set to prepare for tough Wildcat team

staff writer

K-State's fifth bowl opponents in five years will be the Orangemen from Syracuse, the Big East Conference champions, opponents the Wildcats might not know very much about.

After all, the Cats (10-1) have never played Syracuse (9-3), they didn't play against a Big East team this season, and have only played against Big East teams 10 times in the 102-year history of K-State football.

And if K-State isn't too familiar with Syracuse, chances are the Orangemen aren't sure what's facing them, either.

But Syracuse coach Paul Pasqualoni isn't worried about being ready for kickoff on Dec. 31.

"You can learn a lot in a month," he said.

He already knows a little bit about the Cats, though.

"Playing Kansas State will be a big challenge. They've had a tremendous season," he said. "They're on top of things on both sides of the ball."

Oddsmakers in Las Vegas agree with Pasqualoni that the Cats will be a big challenge for his team. The early line has K-State favored by 3 1/2 points. However, the Orangemen aren't feeling like underdogs quite yet.

"Those lines, I throw them out the windows," Syracuse free safety Donovin Darius said. "It's 11 athletes on each side — 22 athletes — who worked hard to be in that position."

Syracuse's 11 athletes will try to extend the team's unbeaten streak in bowl games. The Orangemen are 7-0-1 in their past eight bowl appearances, including a 41-0 thumping of Clemson two years ago in the Gator Bowl — a game, like the Fiesta Bowl, that the Orangemen entered as underdogs.

"We prepare well," Syracuse quarterback Donovan McNabb said. "Our coaches do a great job getting us to a point where we can just go out and win."

That's a sentiment K-State coach Bill Snyder agrees with.

"I think they have a program that's a lot like ours," Snyder said. "I think they work extremely hard. I think they're demanding, and it shows on the field."

Defensively, the Orangemen are led by Darius, tabbed the third-best free safety in the country by The Sporting News. He is eighth in the nation with seven interceptions, and is the all-time Syracuse leader for tackles by a defensive back with 379.

Closer to the front, middle linebacker Antwaune Ponds leads the way for Syracuse. He tied Darius for the team lead with 119 tackles, including a team-high eight for losses.

Syracuse's defense yields only 15.9 points and 290.2 yards per game.

Oklahoma has played both teams, predicts close Fiesta Bowl

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

K-State and Syracuse are locked into the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl together — two teams from two different conferences, analyzed by two sets of media.

K-State is the No. 2 team from the Big 12 Conference adored by the Midwest media, while Syracuse, the Big East champion, is hyped by the New York press.

So who really knows how the two teams will match up?

Probably the Oklahoma Sooners, the only team to play the Wildcats and Orangemen this year.

"Both of them are pretty good teams," Oklahoma linebacker Terrance Malone said.

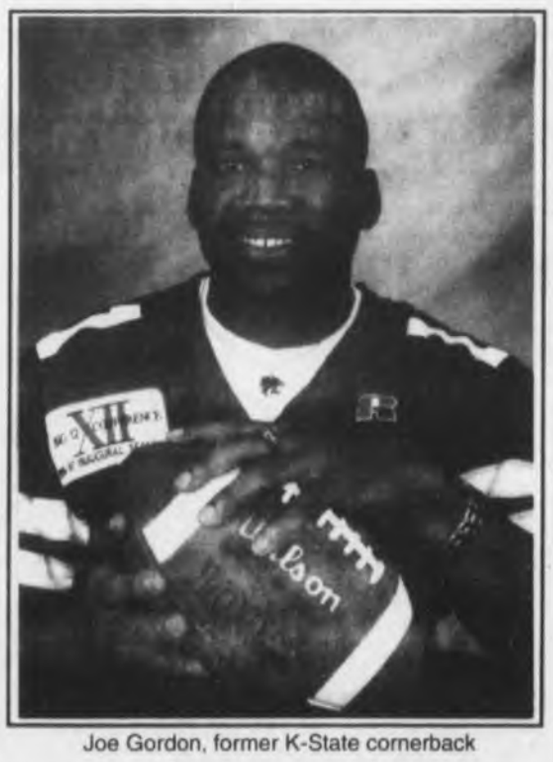
Both teams traveled to Norman, Okla., to play the Sooners this year.

On Sept. 6, the Orangemen left losers, 36-34. On Oct. 25, the Cats beat Oklahoma 26-7. Neither team played as well against the Sooners as it did throughout the course of the season, and Syracuse played in an early non-conference game while K-State beat the Sooners in week eight, but the Sooners said they know enough about the teams to predict how they'll match up.

"I think I can make a fair judgment," Oklahoma defensive tackle Kelly Gregg said.

And what is that judgment?

"I'm gonna have to give the edge to K-State," Gregg said. "Both teams will score their points, but in the end, I think K-State's defense will stop them. It's gonna be a 28-20 or 31-24 game."



Against the Sooners, Syracuse enjoyed a little more offensive success,

A GUIDE FOR HOW TO GET THERE, WHAT TO DO THERE AND WHAT TO DO HERE

THE TRAVEL PACKAGES

Tours combine tickets, rally, place to stay, place to fiesta

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

It's time to start preparing for the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. That not only means getting out all the purple clothes and packing the dusty suitcases. It means it is time to figure out how to get to the game, where to stay and how much it will cost.

The KSU Alumni Association is offering tour packages for the bowl until Dec. 19. The tours include accommodations, game ticket, pep rally transfers, game day transportation, pregame party, K-State Fiesta Bowl souvenir and an engraved Fiesta Bowl name badge. The three-night Fiesta Bowl tours include a welcoming reception.

Amy Button Renz, president of the Alumni Association, said as time passes there will be more details.

"The deluxe tours will likely be in one of the Pointe resort properties, but final hotel selections will be made once the team hotels have been selected after the official announcement," she said.

The deluxe three-night Fiesta Bowl tour with air travel is the biggest package offered by the Alumni Association. Double rooms cost $989 per person, single rooms cost $1,222 per person and four-person rooms cost $906 per person.

A deluxe three-night stay without air travel is $604 per person in a double room, $837 per person in a single room and $521 per person in a four-person room.

If the deluxe packages are a little out of the pocketbook range, the economy packages are a little less expensive.

WHAT TO DO IN KANSAS

Gathering places provide alternatives to travel

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

Because the Sun Devil Stadium can't hold everyone in Kansas for this year's game, there are some places where K-State fans who are left behind can watch the game together.

In Leawood, Kan., there is Paddy O'Quigley's, which is the headquarters for the Greater Kansas City Catbackers.

Tom Intfen, owner of Paddy O'Quigley's and a K-State graduate, said he plans to go to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, but he expects K-State fans to show up in large numbers.

"It fills up with a lot of K-Staters," Intfen said. "We were full last year for the Cotton Bowl."

All K-State games this season except one — the Nebraska game — have been shown on Paddy O'Quigley's two big-screen televisions.

"We've had large crowds for every game this year," Intfen said.

K-State fans would be hard-pressed to find a more purple place to watch the game in Topeka than Jeremiah Bullfrogs Bar & Grill.

"We'll probably paint the bar purple for the game," said Tanja Fateley, the owner of Jeremiah Bullfrogs.

Jeremiah Bullfrogs is a favorite meeting place of Topeka Catbackers, Fateley said. Each Tuesday night during the season, the bar replayed the previous Saturday's K-State game for the Catbackers who missed it or wanted to see it again.

Golden Q in Hays, Kan., will accommodate Western Kansas K-State fans who can't make it to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

"We'll probably do something purple," said Golden Q owner Duane Creamer. "We'll have some kind of special on Purple Passion or purple beer."

Creamer didn't attend K-State, but he is now a fan and said he is planning to attend the game.

"We've got a lot of Catbackers here," Creamer said. "Whenever there's a K-State sporting event, they'll call me and see if I can get it."

Creamer has another connection to K-State — his niece Komoss Creamer is a Classy Cat.

K-State fans in Wichita can go to AJ Sports Grill to watch the game.

"K-State has got some followers in Wichita," said Jon Lemon, manager of AJs. "They're serious about their team."

WHAT TO DO WHILE YOU ARE THERE

Phoenix area offers more than football for culture-seeking fans

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Although Wildcat fans are going to Tempe, Ariz., for the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, the metropolitan Phoenix area is 2.3 million people strong and has the cultural attractions to prove it.

In the Valley of the Sun in the heart of the Sonoran Desert, Phoenix has almost displaced Seattle as the hip, growing and progressive city in which to live. It might be the warm weather that initially drew people to the Southwest, but it's cities like Phoenix that are keeping them there.

Fans might want to start their trip in the heart of bowl country on Mill Street in the heart of downtown Tempe. Greeting Kansans will be a commercial district similar to Aggieville but greatly expanded.

Trendy shops such as Urban Outfitters, both expensive and cheap restaurants, a movie theater and the requisite clubs line the shady street and will undoubtedly prove irresistible to fans of both persuasions. As a rule in most college towns, if the restaurant's open and busy, it's probably worth checking out.

Arizona State University's campus is also worth checking out. Its buildings include a performing arts center by Frank Lloyd Wright and a funky new concrete arts school by Albuquerque architect Antoine Predock.

However, more Wright works, along with the best of Phoenix's attractions, lie outside of Tempe either in Scottsdale or in Phoenix proper.

A good day could be spent exploring Phoenix's downtown museums, which are

Tempe hot spots prepare for purple people

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

If you plan to make the journey to Tempe, Ariz., for the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, getting tickets as soon as possible is a good idea.

The biggest bowl game in K-State history is selling tickets fast, and if last year's Cotton Bowl is any indication of the hungry fans' craving for big-game tickets, the Fiesta Bowl craze is just beginning.

Jason Lacey, junior in mechanical engineering, is one fan who is already prepared for the rush to Tempe.

"We reserved hotel reservations about two weeks ago because we remembered what it was like last year in Dallas. Places to stay might get hard to find," Lacey said. "Everyone I talk to says that they want to make the trip. I think it will be another purple invasion in the South. I hope the city is ready."

K-State fans will begin the invasion by means of automobile or plane.

While many students plan to fly to the game, some are excited about the 20-hour road trip by car that lies ahead of them.

Nathan Mead, junior in agricultural economics, is planning to take a van full of friends to the game.

"We had so much fun last year road-tripping down to Dallas," Mead said. "Yeah, it's a long ride, but when you have lots of people going with you, there is always something fun to do. And when we get to Arizona, believe me, that's when the fun is really going to start."

The game will be the main focus for all of the K-State fans making the trip, but fun can be found throughout the city.

"I hope the bars are prepared for us," Lacey said. "We'll want to do some partying on New Year's Eve and after the K-State win. I would imagine that every bar in downtown Tempe will be packed."

Local favorite Tempe restaurants such as the Red Mountain Steakhouse and Rinaldis on Third are also preparing for the wave of Kansans.

Darrin Hamiliton, assistant manager of the Red Mountain Steakhouse, said he is excited and happy to see Kansans coming to visit.

"We are excited to think that there will be such a friendly crowd of people in our city," Hamiliton said. "We've heard about the crowd that follows the K-State team, and we've been doing everything to prepare for their arrival."

K-State fans are even known by the nickname of "the traveling party" at other local restaurants.

James Barick, employee at Rinaldis on Third, said he has heard that K-Staters come by the thousands, and they come to have a good time.

"I've been told that the holiday will be a busy one this year. Someone even told me that they are like a huge traveling party," Barick said. "I can't imagine 40 or 50 thousand K-State fans down here to watch their football team play."

The biggest bowl game in K-State history is awaiting Cat fans with open arms, and tickets are becoming a hot commodity for this monumental game.

Tickets sell for $65, but the fun in Arizona seems to be priceless to fans.

"There isn't anything that could keep me at home this holiday," Mead said. "I'm going to Arizona for two reasons — to have the biggest New Year's Day party ever with thousands of K-State people, and to kick some Orangeman ass."

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

LAST YEAR, more than 42,000 fans traveled to Dallas for the Cotton Bowl. Crowds are expected to reach more than 25,000 for the Cats' first Alliance Bowl.

TRAVEL

Flying to Arizona and staying three nights with the economy package is another option. A double room is $899 per person, a single room is $1,064 per person and a four-person room is $817 per person.

If flying doesn't sound like a good idea, but staying three nights does, there is an economy option for a double room at the same hotel for $514 per person, a single room for $679 per person and a four-person room for $432 per person.

The last option offered by the Alumni Association is the economy two-night Fiesta Bowl tour without air travel. A double room is $384 per person, a single room is $479 per person, and a four-person room is $342 per person.

The pregame party for the Fiesta Bowl is given by the bowl and not the Alumni Association. Tickets for the pregame party are $10 each. Tickets get fans in the door but food and drink are not included with the ticket. The pregame party will also include Syracuse fans.

Renz said the special activities are yet to be finalized, but there are plenty of things to do.

"There is a parade that people can see, and there is a K-State Fiesta Bowl Gala that should be a lot of fun," Renz said. "We plan on having food and drinks and a DJ at the celebration."

The gala is on New Year's Eve, and will start at 9 p.m.

Tickets for reserved seating at the Fiesta Bowl parade can be purchased through the Alumni Association. The parade is at 11 a.m. on Dec. 30.

Lucky BrewGrille is also putting together a package geared toward K-State students wanting to attend the Fiesta Bowl.

Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky's, said he wanted students to have a chance to afford the bowl trip.

"We did this mainly for the kids. It's something they can afford, and it's a lot of fun," he said.

The package is $90 per person, with students providing their own transportation.

The Lucky's package includes a three-day and four-night stay at the Holiday Inn Select, a New Year's Eve party, a kickoff party at the Hard Rock Cafe in Phoenix, a souvenir T-shirt and free breakfast every day.

"It's also safe for the kids because we go in a big group. They have a lot of fun that way," Leetch said. "The New Year's Eve party is a huge event, too. Last year, 2,500 to 3,000 were partying at the Cotton Bowl New Year's party."

Bus charters are also being put together for 100 to 125 students by Lucky's. The cost of the charter will be $125.

KANSAS

To accommodate the K-State fans, Lemon said AJ Sports Grill hangs K-State banners and posters on its walls and shows K-State games throughout the season.

As for Aggieville, there are mixed expectations for what's going to happen.

"There is nothing going on here," said Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky BrewGrille. "The big deal will be going on the trip."

Lucky BrewGrille puts together a travel package for the game. Last year's Lucky BrewGrille caravan brought 400 students to the Cotton Bowl.

"We'll have drawings for stuff during the game for the people that are here," Leetch said. "But I don't think anyone's going to drive to Manhattan for the game."

Loren Minnich, senior in milling science and manager of Scoreboard, said he hopes to add some spice to the scene in Aggieville for the pre-bowl celebration. Scoreboard plans to show this season's highlight film and at least one past K-State bowl game before game time.

"Quite a few students come back for New Year's Eve to watch the bowl game in town," Minnich said. "Although we weren't real crowded for the last bowl game, we were busy."

VISIT

mainly clustered along Central Avenue on the fringes of an expanding downtown home to an under-construction arena.

Any visitor interested in the American Indian heritage of the Southwest should not miss what is considered the finest museum of its kind in the southwest, the Heard Museum.

Besides a permanent collection that is unparalleled in its scope — don't miss Barry Goldwater's amazing room of traditional kachina dolls — the museum also plays host to numerous temporary exhibits. The museum features an elegant jewelry exhibition, "The Cutting Edge: Contemporary Southwestern Jewelry and Metalwork," and an exhibition of blankets by Hopi designer Ramona Sakiestewa.

Situated a block or so away is the newly expanded Phoenix Art Museum in a dynamic 1996 building by New York architects Billie Tsien and Tod Williams.

Although a far cry from a conventional city art museum like the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art, its temporary exhibitions of work by contemporary artists can be worth a visit.

As a complete change of pace from the native culture, during Fiesta Bowl time the museum will be presenting the exhibition, "Africa! A Sense of Wonder." The large show features sub-Saharan African art of wood carvings, masks, textiles and bronze pieces spanning from the 16th century to the present.

Further down Central Avenue, the new Phoenix Central Public Library, which sits above a freeway, has been a cause for celebration in the city. Opening a little more than a year ago, this Wil Bruder-designed building has become an instant landmark and is well worth a casual visit.

Bruder, a Phoenix local and an upcoming lecturer at K-State, has designed what is one of the best public buildings of the decade — a library so fresh and simple you'll find yourself becoming a curious second-grader again.

Be sure to check out the top-floor reading room with breathtaking views of the city on both sides and skylights that track the movements of the sun. And do visit the restrooms — surely the most whimsical approach to such a mundane subject you'll ever see.

If you're one to get out and see historic landmarks, Frank Lloyd Wright's Taliesin West should be your next stop.

In Scottsdale, this national historic landmark where Wright lived and worked during the winter is open for daily tours. Also in Scottsdale is the kitschy Rawhide 1880s Western Town where children can pan for gold or ride in a mule train.

Nature lovers can revel at Phoenix's acclaimed Desert Botanical Garden, but take a jacket or sweater because it could be cool in the winter.

The garden is full of cacti and succulents that will make your head spin in their evocation of a psychedelic lunar landscape.

Just flying into Phoenix can make you think of outer space — the flat city is permeated by odd rock formations and the odder-yet designs of suburban subdivisions marching into the desert.

With an expanding job market, cheap housing market and a wealth of cultural attractions, graduating students might consider bringing a few résumés to drop around town.

Of course, when the Cats win, there might not be time for that.

being a 72-yard touchdown pass from Cat quarterback Brian Kavanagh.

K-State had a 15-5 lead going into the fourth quarter and a deceptive lock on the game. But Cougar quarterback Steve Sarkisian delivered two deadly touchdown passes — one with 10:55 remaining on the clock and the other with less than four minutes left in the game — to put the nail in the Cats' victory bubble.

And never mind that it's an "odd" year — the Cats are looking for that victory that eluded them in Dallas last season.

"Without a doubt, when you get to a bowl game, you've got to finish it off," linebacker Travis Ochs said. "We've definitely got to go in there and get it done all around."

Because it will be several seniors' last game, that victory becomes even more important.

"Especially for the fans, coming out of that game with a loss was hard to deal with," senior left tackle Todd Weiner said. "We'll work hard and focus on the fundamentals, because Syracuse will be ready to play."

SYRACUSE

Offensively, Syracuse averages 427.3 yards and 35.3 points a game and is led by McNabb.

The junior quarterback is known for his scrambling and running ability, but has shown pretty good skills throwing the ball this season. He completed 145 of 265 passes for 2,488 yards and 20 touchdowns, against only six interceptions.

His favorite target is Quinton Spotwood, who caught 41 passes, including Syracuse's longest play from scrimmage this season, a 94-yard touchdown pass. Kevin Johnson had 32 receptions, while Jim Turner had 23.

Running back Kyle McIntosh leads the Orangemen's running game. He's gained 898 yards this season, averaging five yards a carry.

However, Syracuse's backfield is a little depleted, as 6-foot, 3-inch 250-pound fullback Rob Konrad is injured and will probably miss the game.

"That will hurt them pretty bad," said Oklahoma defensive tackle Kelly Gregg, who played against both Syracuse and K-State this season.

Oklahoma was the only opponent Syracuse and K-State had in common this season. The Sooners beat Syracuse, 36-34, while the Cats beat Oklahoma 26-7, a 21-point difference in results.

However, the Orangemen played on a hot, humid day in the beginning of September, while the Cats played on a cold, windy day in late October.

Also, McNabb was ill that day, throwing up on the field. But he won't use that as an excuse for the defeat.

"We just didn't capitalize on some of our opportunities, and we didn't limit our mistakes," he said.

He knows that type of performance won't cut it for Syracuse against K-State in the Fiesta Bowl.

"From what I've heard, they take advantage of mistakes," McNabb said.

The Oklahoma game was the Orangemen's third of the season.

They also lost their fourth game of the year but turned things around with an eight-game winning streak, a streak Syracuse will take into the Fiesta Bowl.

However, during those eight games, the results varied greatly.

The Orangemen had a three-game stretch when they outscored their opponents by an average of 55-3, but three games later they barely beat Pittsburgh, winning 32-27.

That's not a trend McNabb worries about.

"It's not inconsistency. That's just college football," he said. "Any team on any given day can beat any other team."

And he said he hopes K-State will be that other team on Dec. 31.

"We're excited to go in and let people know about Syracuse football," he said. "This is a great opportunity for us to show what we can do."

OFFENSE

McNabb is a good enough passer to be one of 10 finalists for the Davey O'Brien award, given annually to the nation's top quarterback.

Although he'd like to be known for his arm, he's known for carrying the ball frequently — he rushed 110 times this season. However, unlike many running quarterbacks, most of his carries aren't planned.

"I'm just a guy who likes to have fun and make things happen," he said. "If there's something that's going to bring us down, I just tuck it and go for the first down."

Bishop, on the other hand, is the subject of several called runs each game. Unlike many option quarterbacks who sweep to the outside, he darts up the middle.

But exactly how many of his 147 runs this season were called is a mystery — several plays look like a combination of good pass coverage and a delayed quarterback draw.

So who's better?

Members of the Oklahoma Sooners, the only team to face both Syracuse and K-State this season, wouldn't seem to mind having Bishop on their side.

"McNabb is good. He's a pretty good player," Oklahoma's Greg Moyer said. "But Bishop's a lot better runner. He's a lot stronger. McNabb kind of has happy feet."

However, Bishop's passing numbers aren't as good as McNabb's.

Bishop completed 43.2 percent of his passes this season for 1,557 yards and 13 touchdowns against eight interceptions.

But he has shown the ability to throw the ball more than 60 yards downfield, and is rumored to have thrown the ball 93 yards in the air once at Blinn.

Bishop's attack, although successful for the Cats this season, probably won't catch the Orangemen off guard.

"This year, we played against a lot of those types of quarterbacks," Syracuse free safety Donovin Darius said.

And although the Cats have several catalysts on offense, Bishop's play could be vital for the Cats' success.

"I think that game is going to come down to whichever quarterback has a better game," Oklahoma linebacker Terrance Malone said. "I think it'll be a good game."

OKLAHOMA

although both teams' quarterbacks struggled physically.

K-State's Michael Bishop was suffering from an ankle injury he suffered the week before against Texas A&M and Syracuse's Donovan McNabb, along with the rest of his teammates, battled the Midwest humidity, conditions they weren't used to.

"McNabb was out there throwing up on the field," Gregg said.

Each quarterback was held to about 50 percent passing at just less than 10 yards per attempt. Bishop completed eight of 16 passes for 158 yards, 9.9 yards per attempt. McNabb was 12-25-223, an average of 8.9 yards a throw.

K-State had a slight edge in rushing yardage, 162 to 155, but the Orangemen had the advantage in total yardage because of stronger passing numbers.

"They're really similar, but Syracuse has more offensive weapons with their receivers," Malone said.

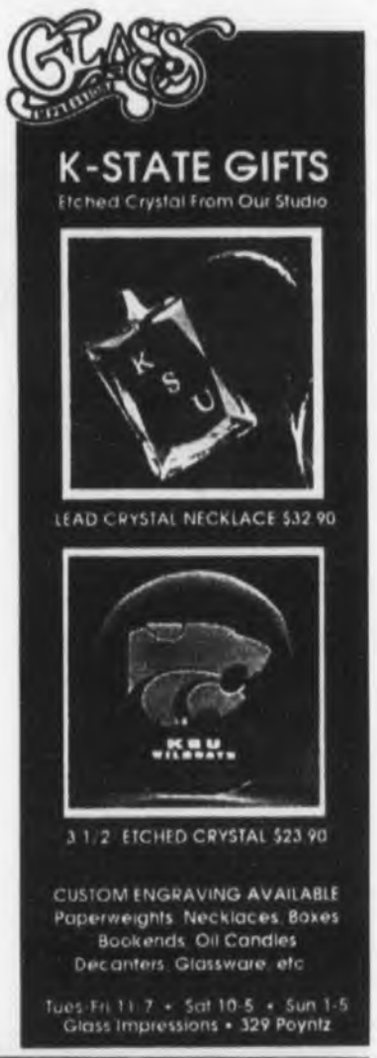
While both teams gained nearly the same amount on the ground, they did it in different styles. Malone said Syracuse running back Kyle McIntosh is more of a quick slasher, while the Cats, behind powerful Eric Hickson, "play smash-mouth football. They'll gain their yards."

Also, the Cats had an easier time stopping Oklahoma's offensive attack. The Sooners only gained 277 yards against the Cats, but managed 379 yards of offense against Syracuse.

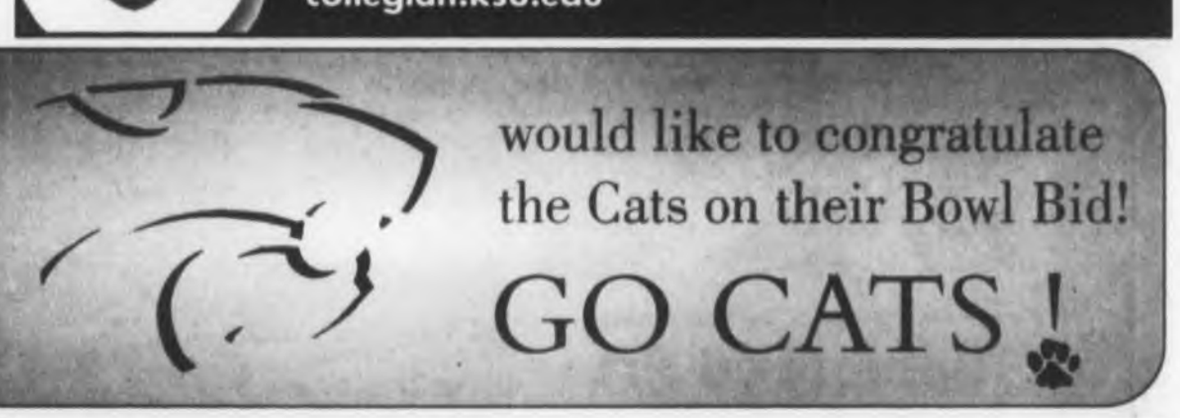
Sooner players also said the Orangemen will try to intimidate the Cats.

"They're really big guys and they talk a lot of trash," Oklahoma offensive guard Greg Moyer said of the Syracuse defenders. "I felt like K-State was a lot quicker, though. Syracuse was just like, 'We're big and bad.'"

Although Moyer, as an offensive guard, didn't play against K-State's offense, he said he saw enough watching from the sidelines to figure out how the Cats might fare moving the ball in the Fiesta Bowl.



"If Kansas State's offense plays hard the whole game, they'll kill 'em," Moyer said. "If you go toe-to-toe with Syracuse's defense for a quarter, they'll quit on you."



Also the Sooners, after playing against Syracuse, Nebraska, K-State, Texas A&M, Texas Tech, Northwestern and Oklahoma State this season, have seen plenty of top teams have an idea where 10-1 K-State fits in.

The Cats have come under scrutiny for playing three non-conference games against Mid-American Conference opponents, but that doesn't bother Malone.

"So what if they had an easy schedule?" he said. "They could have made them play against bigger, stronger teams and they still would have won."

Nebraska's Coach Osborne retires

HEALTH ISSUES FORCE OSBORNE TO RETIRE AFTER 25 YEARS AS HEAD FOOTBALL COACH

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

College football lost its most winning active coach Wednesday when Nebraska football coach Tom Osborne retired.

Osborne, who has sent 175 players to the NFL draft since his first year in 1973, stepped down as head coach and offensive coordinator, the position he's had for 25 years. Nebraska has finished in the top 25 every year of Osborne's career.

Rumors had circulated since the beginning of the week regarding Osborne's retirement. After the Huskers' 77-14 drubbing of Iowa State, Osborne experienced atrial fibrillation in his heart, a condition that he said could cause blood clots or strokes.

Osborne said doctors put him under anesthesia and administered shocks to put his irregular heartbeat back on track.

Although he said his health was not at a dangerous point, Osborne said it was the main reason his retirement was eminent.

"If you're going to call plays, you've got to do your homework. There are no shortcuts," Osborne said. "I'm not able to sustain this pace for any length of time, and this is the time this has to happen. I think it's important to walk away while you can still walk."

Osborne is walking away from NCAA records of 59-3 in the past five years and five-straight 11-win seasons.

He said he will coach the No. 2 Huskers (12-0) in their Orange Bowl matchup with No. 3 Tennessee (11-1), and he might even wait until Feb. 4 so he can help recruit.

"Recruiting is very important," Osborne said. "One thing I want to make sure of is to leave this program in the best shape I possibly can. Anybody coming to Nebraska must realize that not much is going to change."

Continuity and consistency were the themes Osborne wanted to instill in the program. He was confident that if the coaching staff remained the same, nothing would change.

"One thing people in Nebraska cannot afford to lose is its coaching staff," Osborne said. "You lose me, nothing changes. You lose them, there are lots of changes."

But his players will feel the brunt of the changes, and for that, Osborne is sorry.

"I feel that what I'm doing right now is what's in their best self-interest," Osborne said. "It was the hardest thing talking to the players. I tried to say things that were funny and nobody laughed. I felt bad."

Osborne has led teams that

Livestock team wins national judging contest

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

K-State's livestock judging team ended its season by making history and winning the National Intercollegiate Livestock Judging Contest for the fourth-straight time.

No other university in the 94-year history of the annual contest in Louisville, Ky., has won four consecutive titles.

"It was the most thrilling experience I have ever had," said Wade Franklin, senior in animal sciences and industry. "I don't think I fully understand the importance and value of winning this contest at this point, but I know when I look back in 20 years, it will mean even more than it does now."

The student judges beat out more than 36 other teams from across the nation. Franklin, along with team members Jered Shipman and Les Wankel, also seniors in animal sciences and industry, placed in the top 10. The individuals were judging in a field of more than 180 competitors.

Now that the season is over for the team, some members are preparing for continued exposure to livestock judging.

"I'm still doing the livestock judging thing," Franklin said. "Currently I am the assistant to Dr. Schaake, our team coach, for next year's judging team."

Franklin, who transferred from South Plains Junior College in Levelland, Texas, said he is planning on attending graduate school and would like to stay at K-State.

"I've always wanted to be on the judging side of things, and I have been in the past. Now, I think it is really neat being able to be on the coaching side," Franklin said.

Team member Bill Disberger, senior in animal sciences and industry, said he is judging for different competition teams.

"I am in the process of catching up on school work, ambassador activities and am also on the wool- and horse-judging teams. All of these activities combined don't take the amount of time that livestock judging did."

Even though collegiate competition has ended for the team, Franklin is thankful for all of the opportunities he has had while judging as an undergraduate at K-State.

"I'd sure like to thank Dr. Schaake and all the other people who helped me with judging and allowed me to do what I came to K-State to do — that was win the National Livestock Judging Contest."

SHAC makes plans for Senate meeting

▶ COMMITTEE MEMBERS voice concern about Lafene fee allocations.

KELLY FURNAS
staff writer

The Student Health Advisory Committee spent its Wednesday meeting gearing up for the Student Senate meeting tonight. Senate will take final action on the Student Health Fee bill and the University Counseling Services Fee bill.

Part of the committee's concern stemmed from Monday night's Privilege Fee Committee meeting in which the University Counseling Services Fee bill was sent to Senate with no recommendation, and the Student Health Fee bill was sent to Senate with a favorable recommendation.

The Student Health Fee bill calls for no increase in student privilege fees, while recommending a $5 charge per visit to make up for the lack of increase.

"They can't just do this one-for-one substitution," Julie Tarara, SHAC chairwoman, said. Tarara said the Privilege Fee Committee did not account some of the costs involved in changing the privilege fee to a user fee, such as tax and decreased dollars from students who did not want to come in to Lafene Health Center because of a user fee.

"It seems like the Privilege Fee Committee has forgotten that SHAC exists," Kristi Herrman, SHAC member said. "We're objective and independent from Lafene. We've been grilling the staff for information. We've done the research. We're not experts, but we know more than they do."

Members of SHAC expressed concern that their voice was not going to be heard in tonight's Student Senate meeting.

"I just want to make sure that we go into this meeting ready," Tarara said. "I want to thank everyone on this committee for every hour they've spent on this — no matter what Privilege Fee or Student Senate does with it."

Part of the strategy SHAC members proposed is to try to

MINA FOSTER HELPS battered women in the area by working at the Crisis Center Inc.

"I was going to be killed if I didn't leave. I mean, it was a lethal situation."

While looking around for an empty table in the coffee shop, Mina Foster softly calls her toddler son to her side. He is one of her eight children.

She looks like any normal mother. She drives a mini-van with a Kansas license plate, a tag that makes her feel proud. It's hard to believe that Foster was once a victim of domestic violence, before she changed her automobile tag from Missouri, and began stepping up the ladder to her new life.

"Each little tiny step, at the time, seemed like a giant leap," Foster said. "It was my leap to freedom — one more rung of the ladder to freedom, towards leaving behind or putting into perspective, all the abuse in my life.

"I was going to be killed if I didn't leave. I mean, it was a lethal situation."

The police in Willow Springs, Mo., where Foster lived, had told her they were not reporting the restraining order she had asked for against her husband. Foster said she hoped the restraining order would protect her against her husband entering their house. She stayed in the town for almost 10 years with her husband, in a life she desperately wanted to leave.

"I wasn't raised that way, but having lived there for so long, it was pretty incredible," she said. "When it became lethal, and I didn't want my children living like that anymore, I left because I deserved it and my children deserved better."

She said she went into hiding at a friend's house. When she saved enough money, she loaded her belongings into a U-Haul and in the back of her 1977 Nova, and fled with her children. She found the Crisis Center Inc. in Manhattan, in search of a place for battered women.

"My life started changing from surviving to living," Foster said.

"When I came to the Crisis Center at Manhattan seven years ago, they were my saviors, then my advocates, then my cheerleaders. I had not just one person believing in me, but a whole bunch of people believing that yeah, I could do it, and I did," she said.

Foster said she felt her change began when she entered school. She began college and started to believe in herself. In Missouri, Foster never considered the possibility of attending college.

"I had children, how on earth was I going to college? In the early '80s, a college education, if you didn't have it, didn't mean you couldn't get at least a decent job," she said.

When Foster first came to the shelter, she met a woman with four children who was also a student at K-State. With that encouragement and the help of grants, Foster left her children with an available day-care, enrolled in college and started working toward fulfilling her dream.

K-State will award 80 doctoral degrees, 177 master's degrees and more than 1,000 undergraduate degrees this weekend.

The Graduate School will have graduation at 1:30 p.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium.

Speakers include Jonathan Holden, professor of English; James Coffman, provost; and Timothy Donoghue, vice provost for research and dean of the Graduate School.

▶ Schedule
Want to know when the different ceremonies are? A complete listing can be found on Page 10.

Paul Isaac, associate dean of the Graduate School, said these graduates are representative of the highest academic standards at K-State.

"The Graduate School commencement recognizes these students who are working at the highest levels of scholarship here at the university," Isaac said. "We anticipate these graduates will go on to make a difference at a state and national level."

There will be a reception in the auditorium lobby after the Graduate School ceremony.

According to the Office of the Registrar, the total number of undergraduate students receiving diplomas has increased from last December.

Undergraduate commencements will begin at 9 a.m. Saturday in both McCain and Bramlage Coliseum.

Ceremonies in McCain include the colleges of Human Ecology and Agriculture, while Bramlage will house the colleges of Arts and Sciences, Education, Business Administration, Engineering and Aviation and Technology.

The graduation ceremony for the College of Architecture, Planning and Design will be at All Faiths Chapel.

Speaking to the human ecology graduates will be Barbara Stowe, dean of human ecology; Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and dean of continuing education; and Mariah Tanner, senior in human ecology.

The College of Agriculture will feature Marc Johnson, dean of agriculture; Miles McKee, professor of animal sciences and industry; and Jeff Bathurst, senior in agricultural technology management.

The speaker for the College of Arts and Sciences graduation will be Peter Nicholls, dean of arts and sciences.

As part of the arts and sciences commencement, Colette McLemore, senior in social science-labor relations will be awarded the $500 Commerce Bank Presidential Award for Distinguished Service to Minority Students.

The College of Education ceremony includes speakers Michael Holen, dean of education; Mary Devin, superintendent of the Geary County Public

Post office grosses $1.3 billion in profits, asks for price increases

WASHINGTON, D.C. — For the U.S. Postal Service, 1997 was another good year.

The agency made a $1.3-billion profit, the third year in a row it finished more than $1 billion in the black.

"We are looking forward to continued success this year," said Postmaster General Marvin Runyon, who announced the final accounting Tuesday.

Profits totaling $4.7 billion over three years have allowed the Postal Service to substantially reduce the debt accumulated during years of poor financial performance.

The new fiscal year began in October. Surpluses in 1995 and 1996 allowed the Postal Service to reduce its outstanding debt from $6 billion to $2.7 billion.

Anticipating rising costs, the agency has applied for a 1-cent increase in the current 32-cent first-class stamp price. That would not take effect before summer, and officials have indicated that it could be delayed further if the Postal Service continues to operate in the black.

Fires cause $245,000 in damages to 2 Kansas City public schools

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Unrelated fires at two Kansas City public schools caused $245,000 damage, but no one was injured, officials said.

The fires occurred early Tuesday at Switzer Elementary School about 7:50 a.m. and at East High School about 8:30 a.m.

Investigators said the fire at East High was started intentionally in a second-floor computer room, and forced evacuation of the school about an hour after classes had begun. Classes resumed about 90 minutes later.

No suspects or motive have been determined.

A teacher discovered the fire at Switzer Elementary in a classroom module attached to the building. No students were in classrooms at the time. An electrical short was blamed.

Woman avenges friend's slaying by brutally cutting off killer's penis

FAIRFIELD, Calif. — A woman waited more than a decade to avenge a friend's slaying, luring the killer into having sex and then cutting off his penis, police said Wednesday.

Doctors were unable to reattach the organ to Alan Hall, 43, who was convicted in 1983 of voluntary manslaughter in the death of Denise Denofrio.

The mutilation took place Friday in Fairfield, about 30 miles east of San Francisco, but officers said Hall's injuries prevented an extensive interview until Monday.

Hall told police he met the woman — who he knows only as Brenda — Thursday and she agreed to go home with him. He did not recognize her as a friend of Denofrio.

After they had sex early Friday morning, "the woman made a comment which caused the man to believe that she was seeking revenge for a previous incident involving the man and a friend of the woman," Sgt. Brent Baird said.

The woman suddenly took a cutting tool belonging to the man and cut off his penis, a police statement read.

Denofrio was found strangled in a car parked at a local restaurant. Hall was convicted in July 1983 of voluntary manslaughter, but police could not immediately say when he was released.

Survey provides students with course information

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff writer

Picking and choosing classes is becoming a more informed process.

The Course Information Committee has been working on a pilot survey, which has been filled out by more than 10 percent of K-State students, said Chris Hansen, senior in nuclear engineering and committee chair.

"The overall purpose of the program is to give students, when they're signing up for classes, extra information besides just asking a senior in political science which political science classes are good to take," Hansen said.

The course information program was approved by Faculty Senate last spring. Hansen said Senate is requiring the committee to use the pilot survey for two semesters to find the proper mix of questions to ask.

While the information is similar to teacher evaluations, Hansen said the surveys are more focused on gathering information about courses, which the committee wants students to utilize when choosing classes.

"I would use it because it is a tool for helping you find out about classes that you might take," said Lindsay Brinkley, senior in elementary education and special education.

Hansen said the program will help students like Brinkley decide which courses will help them learn more, so they can get the most out of their time at K-State.

"I think an informed decision is an important one," said Buddy Gray, professor of history and women's studies and member of the committee.

Gray said the committee is concerned that students use the information from the surveys to make educated decisions about classes, rather than using the surveys to find easy courses.

"The surveys are designed to tell things about the style of the class and the kinds of requirements there are," Gray said.

Brinkley said the results of the program will depend on the individual student, but might help teachers because they will get direct feedback about their teaching styles.

"I know that when you get information about your own teaching from your students, it is very helpful," Gray added.

The committee wants the course information program to be an additional benefit to both faculty and students, Hansen said.

"My hope is that this will help the students that really want it," Hansen said.

Manhattan reaches out to help injured K-State staff member

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

One family's tragedy has brought the Manhattan community together to lend a hand in the holiday spirit.

A local elementary school and a local credit union are working to help the family of Bev Joyce, a K-State staff member, after her head-on collision in early November.

Traveling alone to her office at K-State's Housing and Dining Services on Nov. 4, Joyce was injured when a semitruck carrying 10 tons of milo collided with her car.

"We have been traveling on this road for about a year and a half now, but they opened a new four-lane highway, so the road we normally used was supposedly closed for traffic going that way," Bob Joyce, Bev Joyce's husband, said.

Not seeing the small posted sign, Bev Joyce continued down the road until the truck entered her path. Luckily, she was wearing her seat belt, which saved her life, Bob Joyce said.

"With no broken bones, she had cracked ribs, in addition to six- to eight-inch bruises on her lap where the seat belt held her," he said.

Bev Joyce hit her head on the caved-in roof of her car, causing head trauma.

"Internally, she suffered a ruptured diaphragm, and her stomach was pushed underneath a collapsed lung," Bob Joyce said.

Bev Joyce was taken to Mercy Health Center of Manhattan where they worked on her for four hours and then transferred her to Saint Francis Medical Center in Wichita. There, she was put on a respirator for two days and remained unconscious for eight days, Bob Joyce said.

"On Nov. 14, Bev was transferred to the Kansas Rehabilitation Hospital in Topeka where she began making giant strides," he said.

Within three days, Joyce was moving around and standing on her own.

"With head trauma, you don't know how fast the recovery will be. It takes time for the brain cells to rejuvenate, so it could take up to two years for her to be completely recovered. Today she is walking, talking and eating by herself," he said.

Having worked for K-State for almost 12 years, Joyce has worked in the College of Veterinary Medicine, the chemistry department and Housing and Dining Services, Bob Joyce said.

"She was working full-time, but she decided to work part-time so she could spend more time with her kids," said Cathi Cherry, office manager at K-State's New Student Services and family friend.

Woodrow Wilson Elementary, where both of Bev Joyce's children attend school, has stepped in to help the family.

"We have a sign-up where every Monday, Wednesday and Friday faculty and parents sign up to take the family meals," Ginger Schwerdt, secretary at Woodrow Wilson, said.

"Bev was active in PTA and in the community, and they are such a wonderful family. We are happy to help," she said.

"The community has really pulled together to help provide meals and to take the kids to meetings," Cherry said. "Bob is playing superdad, and he's doing a great job taking on the role of both parents."

A fund has been set up at the Federal Credit Union on Anderson Avenue. Anyone interested in donating money to help the family is welcome to bring donations by that location.

"We're hoping to have Bev home for the holidays," Bob Joyce said, "and we appreciate all that everyone has done for us."

Committee evaluates library funding options, looks for alternatives to increasing student fees

SARA MARTIN
staff writer

In response to a recent report citing student fees as a possible fund-raiser for Hale Library's financial woes, Student Senate has created the Ad Hoc Committee on Library Subscriptions to evaluate alternatives for library funding.

In the past three weeks, the committee has met twice to distribute information from the Library Task Force report and to further research sources and perspective models for funding solutions.

The committee will make a final recommendation to Senate by Feb. 15.

One main objective of the committee is to be as thorough as possible by looking at every alternative, said Patrick Carney, senior in political science and history and committe co-chair.

"More state monies, alumni monies and student fees are the options that the library task force has recommended," said Carney said. "We believe that several things have been ignored."

Carney said that after looking at the taskforce report, there was concern that the committee would prematurely come to Student Senate for fee money. Many, Carney said, had gotten the impression that the only reason a taskforce was created was to justify student fees.

The committee wanted to justify other sources, Carney said.

"We've been looking into two alternatives. First, maybe doing something along the lines of a consortium with the Big 12 schools," he said. "K-State doesn't have much purchasing power on its own, but when paired with KU, Baylor and the others we can get books in mass bulk."

Cost reduction would be the main benefit of the consortium, Carney said. When publishers drive up book prices 25 to 30 percent a semester, all 12 schools could boycott the book. The effect of 12 schools not buying a book over just one school is more threatening, and publishers would be more reluctant about their price increases.

A second alternative is looking at a faculty partnership to raise money, Carney said, because teachers benefit directly from a well-equipped library. However, he said, there might be some who disagree with this option.

"The faculty are the first ones to go screaming for a student fee," he said, "but when we ask them for a partnership, they're like 'Oh my God, no.'"

In order to find the most effective ways to raise money, the committee will try to form a partnership between all options before looking at the student fee and deciding if it is really necessary, Carney said.

"Are we (the Ad Hoc Committee) in favor of a privilege fee now? I'd have to say no," he said. "Have we closed the door to the possibility of one? No."

Course information survey should be taken seriously

The pilot survey from the course information committee led by Chris Hansen has the potential to be an important university service, if it's taken seriously.

Although this survey is more extensive than standard teacher evaluations and is tailored to provide specific levels of feedback about the effectiveness of courses, the time used to fill it out will be well-spent.

The role of the survey is to provide students with the information to make well-informed decisions about their class schedule. Hansen said 10 percent of K-State students filled out the pilot survey evaluating the effectiveness of classes.

Just as committee members take two years to evaluate the questions that will provide the most effective answers, additional students should become involved. The more voices contributing information to this system, the better the responses become.

Students who evaluate courses with friends and classmates can now apply their opinions to make a more formal contribution.

Professors and instructors will also benefit greatly from this service. Rather than finding easy courses or weak instructors, students and professors should use the survey. It can provide crucial information broken down into practical terms.

This approach to evaluation is constructive and should be used to improve the university. Although in early stages, positive feedback and concerns would benefit the course information committee.

As the committee works to integrate this survey system into mainstream campus use, there should be full attention paid to details so the process can build integrity and continue to define its goals and the effectiveness of each response.

Nuclear Weapons
U.S. experiences loss of reason

Saddam Hussein has made us stupid.

His boasting and obstinance have made us mad enough that we've made a bad decision. A decision that puts the United States firmly on the side of insanity.

We've allowed a sandlot bully's taunting and threats to cause the loss of our reason and possibly the collective soul of our nation. We've decided that we could live with using nuclear weapons.

The White House recently issued a "Presidential Decision Directive" that, in some ways, is actually a very sane document. For the first time, we have admitted the impossibility of a prolonged, winnable nuclear war. The result of a reassessment of our nuclear weapons policies ordered by President Clinton in February, the PDD veers into terra incognita when it discusses the use of nuclear weapons against weapons of mass destruction, which include chemical or biological weapons.

TERRY WELCH

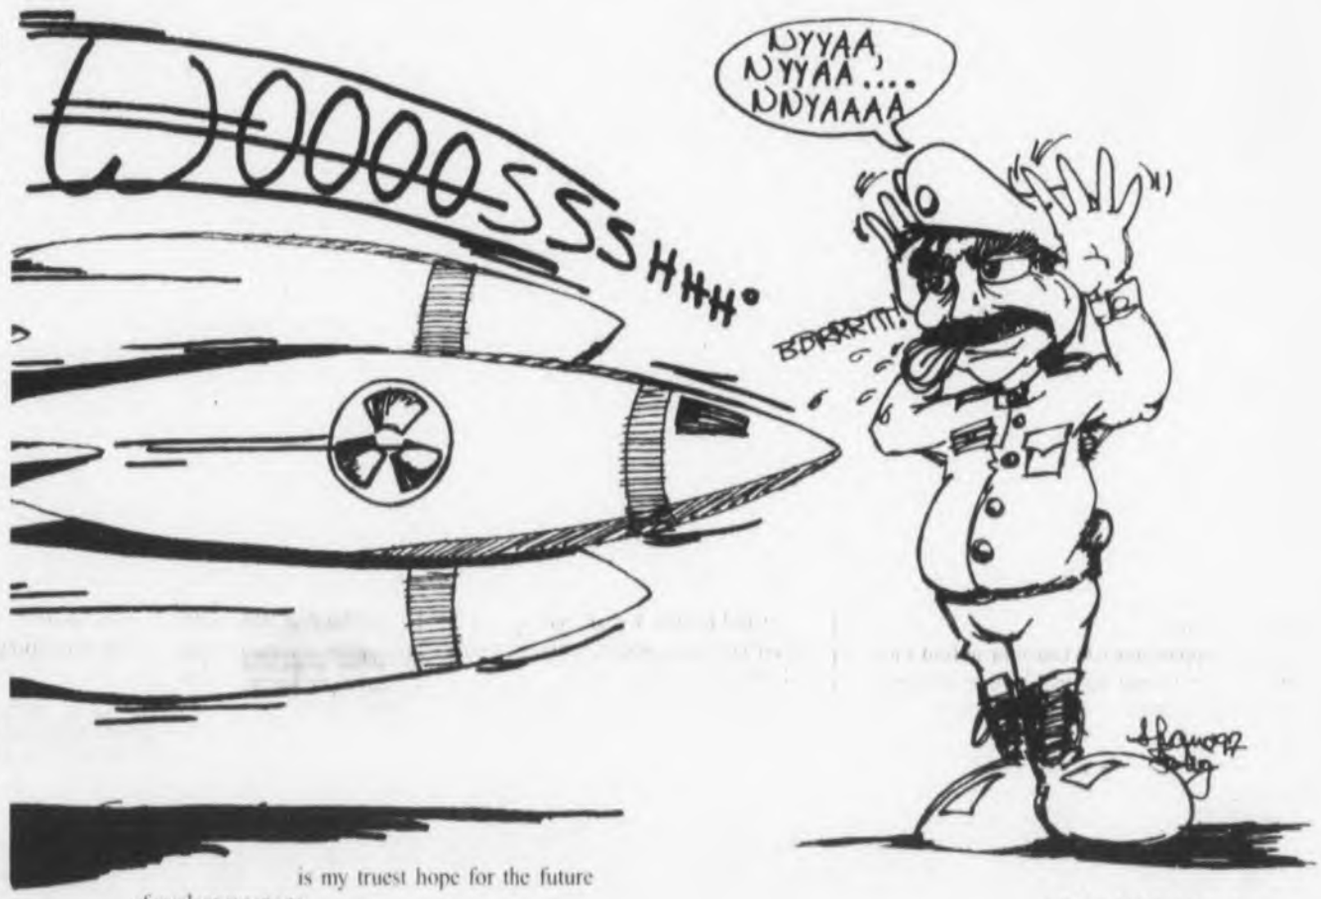
TERRY WELCH is a junior in radio/TV. You can send your e-mail to Terry at tlw1915@ksu.edu

This is not new stuff. In 1993, the Joint Chiefs of Staff issued a "Joint Doctrine for Nuclear Operations" — known as document JP3-12, it can be read at <1>www.fas.org/spp/military/docops/defense/jp3-12/index.html< 1>. This document, tacitly approved by Clinton in the PDD, was one of the first times since Nagasaki that the U.S. military openly contemplated the use of nuclear weapons as anything other than a retaliation against prior use by another nuclear superpower.

Previously, we had seen ourselves as ethically superior, above using nuclear weapons in a first-strike capacity. With this document, the Joint Chiefs of Staff allowed for the possibility of our using nuclear weapons in response to the lesser threat of chemical weapons.

I don't want to sound like one those people who sees black helicopters everywhere and thinks the CIA, the FBI and the Girl Scouts conspired to kill John F. Kennedy, but does it seem odd to you that our concept of how nuclear weapons could be used was suddenly expanded after the fall of the Berlin Wall? Does it seem like the political demonization of so-called rogue states might have been a ploy to keep the concept of total nuclear disarmament in the realm of theory?

Go ahead and think I'm paranoid if it helps you sleep better. But a friend of mine who works on Capitol Hill told me that the Republicans who opposed China's retaining its most-favored nation trading status were not against it because of the country's poor civil-rights record.



He said they were hoping to piss China off enough to create a new cold war with that country. Spooky stuff? You bet. Think about that the next time you doubt there are sometimes shady purposes behind some big decisions.

It comes down to this: During the Persian Gulf War, we killed more than 100,000 Iraqi civilians. If we were to have used one nuclear warhead on any of the largely populated areas of that country, the number could have easily been 10 times greater. The use of a nuclear warhead is frankly not warranted by the use of chemical weapons. The effects of chemical weapons are sometimes treatable and less far-reaching than nuclear weapons.

Toss into this debate the recent Time magazine article by former White House adviser George Stephanopoulis, who said he had suggested while he was a member of the first Clinton administration that the United States should assassinate Hussein.

The reaction from all concerned was one of horror. How could he possibly suggest something so morally wrong? Yet here we are suggesting that a chemical attack on troops is unacceptable damage and disproportionate loss — in the words of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in document JP3-12 — that would justify killing millions of people. We could kill one nut or kill a vast number of innocents. Apparently, our government uses the word ethics differently than I do.

I don't believe any sane person can ever truly justify the use of nuclear weapons, whether in response to a chemical or biological — or even nuclear — attack. Here is my truest hope for the future of nuclear weapons:

If a country chose to initiate a nuclear strike against the United States tomorrow, I would hope those in the position to retaliate would not do so. I hope the imminent death of innocents in this country would not cause us to cause the death of innocents in another. While our country might be lost because of this, our restraint could ensure that life would go on.

RESPECT
Elders, like libraries, fill lives with wisdom, knowlege, advice

If it's not only older people who are grumpy and rude, why do we associate these words with them so often?

When we first come into the world we don't know anything. We are babies, and hence, we are treated like such. Then we become adults and we finally get the respect we deserve. Eventually, we become the elderly, and no, we're not respected more. We're treated like children again.

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

Why are we, the people who have gone through so much and have had so many experiences, treated like we're 10 years old? That's the reality many people face as they reach their golden years.

If they're not treated like children, they're often just ignored and treated like nobodies. Why do we treat our elders this way? Is it because we're afraid of getting older, and therefore choose to ignore it? Is it because we feel we have nothing in common with older people? Or is it just society's way of saying, "Out with the old, in with the new?"

Sure, there are many older people who are very ill and might not remember much. There are those who always complain and drive too slow on the freeway, and those who seem to be stuck in their ways.

But what about the ones who get so pleased when you hold the door open for them? Or the ones who will sit and listen to you talk? These are the faces of older people some choose to ignore.

I remember when my grandparents were alive, and I would visit them. They would be so happy to see me. They just loved my company, whether I talked or just sat there in silence.

I was in Houston a few weeks ago and visited my friend's grandfather for dinner one evening. By the time I had returned home two days later, all his relatives were writing to say how happy he was that I had visited him.

Sometimes it doesn't take much to make an older person happy. A smile, a "hello" can make their day. But for some reason, if you take a look, it's easy to see these people being passed off. Why?

One person I talked to said he works in a place where many older people come in. He had this to say: "I work in a department store, and I help a lot of senior citizens with their selections. Usually they're pretty nice, but I've been yelled at by a few because we don't have what they're looking for or because the line at the register is so long."

Sounds annoying, right? Then I asked him how many times he's had to deal with rude customers who weren't senior citizens.

"About the same. Maybe more," he said.

Just as I guessed.

In this country, things do not cater to older people. Most movies and television shows are all for younger audiences. It's not easy to find entertainment for older people, except perhaps in a senior citizen community.

Ironically, in other countries, older people are thought of as the most important part of the family. I believe this is the way it should be. They've paid their dues. Now give them the respect they deserve.

Maybe we should think in terms of how we want to be treated when we're older. How much respect will we want when we've reached our golden years?

I remember once a friend told me elders were like libraries — full of wisdom, knowledge and advice. The lights of these libraries have been shut off and valuable intelligence is being neglected.

It's not easy getting old. I know people in their 20s already dreading it. But when our time comes, when we are able to get discounts for being a senior citizen, we'll know what it's like.

Take my advice and start now. Show older people they are appreciated. They deserve at least that. OK, if they're jerks then forget them, but don't assume they are.

Take some time to sit down and talk to an older person once in awhile. You'll find they have a lot to offer. What's that saying, "Those who choose not to learn from history will be doomed to repeat it?"

The problems you're having now, they've been through it all. And they survived. They obviously did something right. Why not start with your grandparents? Write them a letter. Send them a picture. Believe me, the response will be amazing.

Just remember, it's not only old people who deserve respect. Everyone does. It doesn't take much effort to not be rude. In fact, it's pretty easy.

READERSwrite — Students should support increase to help Lafene

Editor,

I'm writing this to encourage students and members of Student Senate to support a fee increase to, at a minimum, maintain the services provided by Lafene Health Center. For some reason, some members of Senate have the misconception that because students didn't vote for an increase in student fees for stadium expansion, students don't want a fee increase for any service.

I think this is an irresponsible assumption.

Lafene is a worthwhile investment from which all students benefit. Many students don't have health care because they can't afford it. Lafene is the only health-service option these students have.

People shouldn't be denied the right to be healthy due to a lack of resources. A $5-per-visit charge would target those who use the services the most, yet those are the same people who can least afford it. Also, the proposed 4-percent increase over the next two years is less than the current rate of inflation. Is that too much to ask?

Please contact your senators and encourage them to support a fee increase to maintain services at Lafene.

Editor's final column marks new beginning, ending for careers

What an emotional day.

My last column as the Collegian sports editor.

(Tom Osborne retired.)

My last column as an undergraduate.

(The Big Red Machine is losing its main cog.)

But not my last column.

(But it will roll on.)

Barring any disasters in my Spanish final Tuesday (and I'm not saying I won't have one), I will officially graduate with all my journalism comrades at 9 a.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

However, when I said I have had no time to look for a job, I really meant it. I am jobless.

So, the plan is to take classes for another semester, obtain more sports journalism experience on both the TV and writing sides and crack down on this job-search thing.

I leave this job in the hands of Sam Felsenfeld, the other football beat writer whose stories you've been enjoying all semester. They are very capable hands that came all the way from California to write for the Collegian, and we are very lucky to have him and his knowledge and expertise.

But at this time, I have to draw a twisted parallel. As I write, I'm watching the press conference about Nebraska coach Tom Osborne stepping down from his position as head coach/offensive coordinator of Cornhusker football.

We're stepping down at the same time. My career is just beginning. He just put an end to his.

As a college football fan, I am deeply saddened by this news. There is no one on this planet who could make a case against Osborne's coaching skills — the 25 consecutive winning years and the 254-49-3 career record speak volumes.

I'm stepping down to take time to find a job. He's stepping down because the time he's spent at his job has taken its toll on his health.

I realize K-State fans will be somewhat thrilled to hear this news — after all, how can the Huskers win without Coach Tom?

But bear in mind, Nebraska is known for its ability to reload. No doubt that means at the coaching level, too.

There are few coaches in NCAA football who compare to Osborne in terms of winning success. But as he repeatedly said in his press conference, "I don't think I've done that. I've been part of it. The staff and players will go 59-3 without me."

It takes a big coach to say that and really mean it. You'd think that selfishly, they'd like to attribute some of the team's success to themselves.

But not Coach Tom. He knows how lucky he's been at Nebraska and the emotion was shimmering in his eyes as he thanked every single person who helped him with his achievements.

What is it like to take a team, an entire athletic program, to the greatest heights it has ever known, only to have to end it because your body won't let you continue to achieve more?

Coaches have stepped down for this reason before. But Dec. 10, 1997, will be a black day in sports history from now on.

Not unlike Wildcat coach Bill Snyder, Coach Tom is revered in Nebraska and all across the country as well. I can't imagine the feeling in Lincoln, Neb., and throughout the state, knowing Jan. 2, 1998, will be the end of a magical era in Nebraska football.

I'll still be around here, covering basketball and writing columns people like, dispute, disrespect or detest. Like Coach Tom, I love what I do. But unlike Coach Tom, I have the power to see that it doesn't end yet.

Coach Tom might still be around, too — I'm sure the Huskers will look for a place for him in the program. He said he wanted a break, but he expected to get bored with that break pretty quickly. He just wanted to get out before someone had to carry him out or ask him to leave, and he always did things in the classiest way possible.

I have tried to do things here in the classiest way, as well. We all make mistakes, and although it hasn't been a perfect semester, it's been a perfectly successful semester. I am grateful for all the opportunities this job has allowed me, especially the Christmas vacation in the desert I will soon enjoy.

Originally, I wanted to use this column to thank all the sports writers, Collegian staff members, friends, family, roommates and teachers who have had to put up with my exhaustion, my absence, my excuses and my last-minute pleas for help. I still thank them.

But I want to thank Coach Tom as well, for giving me something to watch and aspire to and write about.

No one will miss my editorial skills — the Collegian reloads so fast that if you blink, you miss an entire semester. But Coach Tom, we'll miss you and all that you stood for regarding excellence and success.

The Big Red Machine will still roll, but it has lost its lustrous finish.

Big shocker; Cats 6-0

Dies, Rhodes return to Wichita, score in double-figures to lead K-State

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

When the crowd at the Levitt center in Wichita was yelling, "sellout, sellout," they weren't referring to the capacity crowd of 10,526, but to the fact that Wichita natives Manny Dies and Shawn Rhodes chose to play basketball at K-State instead of Wichita State.

Each Wichita native scored in double figures to lead the Wildcats to a 90-83 overtime victory over the Shockers. This was revenge for Wichita State's 74-59 victory over K-State last year in Bramlage Coliseum. Dies had 25 points and 13 rebounds to lead all players on the floor, and Rhodes added 11 points for the victorious Cats, who improved to 6-0 for the first time since the 1986-87 season. Wichita State dropped to 2-5.

Dies said it was good to return home.

"It felt good to come home and play in front of our crowd," Dies said. "We expected to come in here, and for them to give us a tough game, and that's exactly what we got, but we stepped up and were able to get the job done."

K-State head coach Tom Asbury said he expected Dies and Rhodes to have big games in Wichita.

"I know they wanted to put on a good performance, and I think they both did," Asbury said.

K-State had to play the game without Duane Davis, who is serving a suspension for being arrested for DUI early Sunday morning, and Marcus McCollough, who is out with a neck injury after an automobile accident. As a result, Asbury decided to pull the redshirt of forward Charles Dinkins.

Wichita State jumped out to a commanding 24-11 lead early in the first half, fueled by four three-point field goals by the Shockers. That was the largest lead either team would have all night. K-State answered with an 11-0 run to pull the Cats within two points.

The Shockers extended their lead to 32-24, and after a foul was called on Wildcat guard Adam Lopez, Asbury was called for a technical foul. Shocker guard Terry Hankton made two of four free throws to extend the lead to 34-24, but K-State scored the final eight points of the half to send the Cats to the locker room down 34-32.

Despite 33-percent shooting, the Shockers took advantage of 11 offensive rebounds and six three-pointers to lead by two. K-State shot 48 percent for the half, but attempted 16 fewer field goals than their counterparts.

Woodson tackles odds in running for Heisman

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — The baby laughed and splashed as he always did. Charles Woodson was 6 months old and loved his bath. His mother smiled. Then, for the first time, she noticed his arches.

"They just didn't look the way they should," Georgia Woodson said.

Charles was diagnosed as having clubbed feet.

For the better part of the next year, Charles Woodson wore leg braces. They secured his legs to each other, preventing him from walking.

Woodson

"We had to carry him because he had to wear leg braces all day," his mother said. "He basically couldn't walk at all."

Until he was 4 years old, he had to wear corrective shoes. Children being children, he was teased.

"He didn't want to wear them," Georgia said. "He fought it."

Woodson has been fighting — and winning — ever since. He went on to become Ohio's best high school football player, then an All-American at Michigan. Now he is a top candidate for the Heisman Trophy. The winner will be announced Saturday.

He already has earned the Walter Camp award, also honoring the nation's top college football player. Only five times since the award was first given in 1967 has the Camp award gone to someone who didn't win the Heisman.

Still, the odds are against Woodson. A defensive player has never won the Heisman.

"If the Heisman doesn't come around, it doesn't," Woodson said. "I'll still be happy."

That is exactly what his mother would expect him to say. She said her son was always "laid-back and quiet, so much so you never knew he was in the room."

The child from a devoutly Pentecostal house never caused trouble. And he honored his mother's directions to do his homework before play.

"He was never a 'Me, me, me' person,'" his mother said. "It was always 'What can we do as a team?'"

Woodson has little recollection of the braces and shoes of his toddler years.

"I just found out about it a couple of years ago," he said. "But I'm glad that my mother and father caught it early."

His legs were fine by the time Rex Radeloff, the biology teacher and retired football coach at Ross High School in Fremont, Ohio, first saw Woodson in seventh grade.

"He made things happen," Radeloff said. "He's one player I'll never forget."

When he arrived in Ann Arbor, the coaches assumed Woodson would want to play offense.

"I told them defense was my first choice," Woodson said. "In 10th grade, I started playing defense. Mainly because we already had a great tailback. Once I started playing it, it just started growing on me. I liked it a lot.

"I think it's a lot more aggressive. You have 11 people running to the football, trying to get there at the same time. There's a big celebration after the hit. It's kind of hard to describe."

Michigan coach Lloyd Carr decided to use Woodson in as many ways as possible — defense, offense, special teams.

"After Charles comes off the field with the defensive unit, it's his job to tell the coaches when he's rested enough to go in and play on offense," Carr said. "As the season wore on, and every game got bigger and bigger, Charles was up on that sideline just about all the time saying, 'I'm ready to go. Put me in.'"

The No. 1 Wolverines went 11-0, won the Big Ten championship and can wrap up their first national championship since 1948 with a victory over Washington State in the Rose Bowl on New Year's Day.

Woodson had seven interceptions this season, second-best in the nation.

"You hear about these so-called All-Americans, but this guy is the real deal," Minnesota coach Glen Mason said. "If there's a better player in the country, I don't know who he is."

He has averaged 21 yards on 11 pass receptions, 8.6 yards on 33 punt returns and 5 yards on three runs. Woodson also completed a pass and scored four touchdowns.

"He's the best player I have ever played with and the best in the nation," Michigan strong safety Marcus Ray said. "I'm not sure he needs any added pressure, but we all know it."

In the Wolverines' 20-14 victory over Ohio State, Woodson caught a 37-yard pass to set up Michigan's first touchdown, returned a punt 78 yards for another score and thwarted a Buckeyes rally with an interception in the end zone.

"He took over the game," said Ohio State wide receiver David Boston, who had taunted Woodson in the days before the showdown. "Big players show up in big games."

But it was his interception at Michigan State that might be remembered most. Spartans quarterback Todd Schultz tried to throw out of bounds but Woodson made a tremendous leap. He snatched the ball with one hand, then managed to keep one foot in bounds as he tumbled to the turf.

"I always knew he would excel," his mother said. "He always wanted to be the best at whatever he was doing."

This might be Woodson's last shot at the Heisman, even though he's only a junior, majoring in sports management and communications. Many think he is ready for the NFL and would be a top-five draft pick. If he does leave school, it would be with Carr's blessing.

Woodson is less certain how his mother might feel about that. All his big decisions have gone through Georgia Woodson, from the days of leg braces and cumbersome shoes. This one is no different. They will discuss it after the Rose Bowl.

"We'll just talk everything out and go from there," he said.

Higher-ranking Cats will choose team status after inspecting accommodations in Arizona

In most cases, there's no question about who's home team and who's away. But in bowl situations, that is one of the first questions.

In K-State's case, the Cats post the higher ranking and get the privilege of deciding whether to be the home team. Coach Bill Snyder said the situation is presented so that it's "close to all things being equal."

"There's a home team package and a visiting team package," Snyder said.

"It includes where you stay, where you work out, where your practices are and what locker rooms you use. We haven't decided yet."

The obvious decision would seem to point to being the home team, but Snyder said the equality factor leaves room for question.

"Both hotels are extremely nice," Snyder said. "The workout facilities — one is at a high school and one is at a junior college — seem to be well taken care of."

Snyder said K-State representatives went to Tempe to scout out the facilities, and they will return today. A decision will be made based on what they discovered.

Although Snyder didn't like recalling the first time he visited Arizona State's facilities — the Sun Devils delivered Snyder his first loss as the Cats' coach — he said either side would be fine.

"The locker room is normally the case, and will be a part of it," Snyder said. "When we were there the first time, the visiting locker room was fine."

Junior tight end Justin Swift said he assumed Snyder would want to go the home route.

"We've played most of our games at home," Swift said.

And the Cats were undefeated at home this season in their six games. This bodes well for the luck factor, but Swift also mentioned a comfort factor.

"We've been practicing in purple," Swift said. "The quarterbacks are getting used to it, used to looking for that color."

And matching the vast numbers of fans that will be wearing the same color can only be good luck, also.

"We probably play better in purple, anyway," Swift said. "It'll be like a home game for us."

Truer words were never spoken. The Cats have not lost a game in the purple uniforms since Oct. 5, 1996 at home against Nebraska. In fact, since 1990, the Cats have only lost five home games, including last year's Nebraska game.

So maybe the "home" mentality is a good idea. Especially because ticket sales are rapidly approaching the 20,000 mark and the crowd will be painted purple.

"We have such great fan support," Swift said. "It's going to make it that much more enjoyable to see it in the stands."

Whether the players have a say in the matter is unknown. But most of them have an opinion on the subject.

"I would probably like to be the home team," sophomore linebacker Mark Simoneau said. "I like the purple jerseys better. It's not necessarily an advantage, but more of a luxury."

Sophomore defensive tackle Damion McIntosh will be attending the third bowl game of his career, with the first being the Holiday Bowl his redshirt year. He said the thing that was the most different would be the change of uniform. The fans would be the same.

"I don't know if it's that much different," McIntosh said. "They'll cheer anyway. We're their team, whether we're in purple or white."

Coach feels recruits will contribute early in basketball season

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Normally, freshmen have to wait a long time to see significant playing time on the court. But Wildcat women's basketball coach Deb Patterson said both of her high school recruits have the potential to do so when they arrive at K-State next season.

Kristin Rethman of Centralia High School in Kansas and Essence Perry of Lawton High School in Oklahoma signed national letters of intent in November to play with the Cats.

Rethman, a 5-9 guard, averaged 21.9 points and 5.6 rebounds as a junior. She played on the 27-1 state runner-up team in Class 1A in March.

Perry, a 5-6 point guard, averaged 16.3 points and five steals per game. Her steals average led all Oklahoma players last season, and she was the preseason All-Southern Conference Player-of-the-Year.

"Kristin has the potential to play next year," Patterson said. "It's hard to judge until you get them on the floor, but she has the ability and potential."

And even though the Cats added two possible point guards this season in freshmen Dee DeShay and Kim Woodlee, Patterson said she thought there was room for one more.

"I definitely think Essence could come in and compete for the starting point guard role," Patterson said. "The situation has got the potential to push both Dee and Kim. It'll be good for the program. I think there'll be time and opportunity for all three to play."

Perry reminded Patterson of senior guard Brit Jacobson in terms of her style of play. Because Jacobson will be gone next year, filling her shoes is important.

"Essence is strong, athletic and will add a great dimension on the floor," Patterson said. "She has quickness and speed. She can go by people and get to the basket, and she can shoot threes."

Although Perry is a player with National AAU Tournament experience, she still comes in as an inexperienced freshman. Patterson said she had only one wish.

"I just wish she could be on the floor with Brit for a year," she said. "Their games are different. Essence has a more patient game."

Perry's capabilities at the point could mix things up a little with the other two guards assuming those duties now. Woodlee played the off-guard position in high school, and Patterson said it wouldn't be a bad thing if one of them ended up at the two next season.

"It will present interesting scenarios for us," she said. "Kim's true position is the two. Right now I think Kim may be a possibility. It will be interesting to see how she develops at the point guard position."

Perry, who was recruited by Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and New Mexico, didn't know a thing about K-State until the Cats began to recruit her. Rethman has grown up with the Cats and loves the school, Patterson said.

Of all the players she could compare Rethman to, Patterson chose Brewster High School graduate Josh Reid.

"Josh came in with a great high school career," Patterson said. "He can really (shoot) the basketball. He came in from a small school. From what I know of Josh, he seems similar to Kristin."

Rethman is a four-year honor roll member as well as a three-year student council member and yearbook editor. This background is one Patterson said presents a total package to the program.

K-State sponsors 1st women's calendar

KADY GUTTON
staff writer

The guys have had their turn, and now the women will have theirs. University Calendars is sponsoring the first Women of K-State Calendar contest.

The competition will take place the first three Wednesdays and Thursdays of March at the Wareham Opera House. Men will compete on Wednesdays and women will compete on Thursdays.

"We've decided to have the contest at the Wareham rather than in a bar because we're trying to get away from the bar atmosphere. It adds a little more class," said Bill Price, owner and operator of University Calendars.

Anyone can enter the contest as long as they are enrolled at K-State and are at least 18 years old. Athletes who do not have a scholarship are welcome to apply, but athletes with a scholarship could jeopardize their eligibility by applying.

A few changes have been made in the contest. A corporate sponsor has been signed, and this year's winners will have a chance to get paid for appearances.

"This summer, we were at the Country Stampede for all three days and were probably one of the more popular tents. Next summer, when the winners are doing calendar signings, they will get paid between $10 and $20 an hour for their time," Price said.

The new calendars will be sold in Wal-Marts across the state, and calendar signings will take place throughout the year.

The competition consists of three rounds: formal, casual and athletic. The formal round has the competitors in formal dresses or tuxedos, the casual round requires nice, date-style clothes and the athletic round will use work-out wear.

"This isn't a bikini contest, we try to keep the contest clean and no lewd behavior is tolerated. A good thing to remember is that if you have a question, either ask or don't do it onstage," Price said.

"Being licensed by K-State automatically means it's going to be a clean product," he said.

The contest is not affiliated with the Delta Upsilon calendar in any way, and anyone who auditioned for that calendar or who has tried out for past calendars is eligible for this year's competition.

"You don't have to be a supermodel or have aspirations to be a model. It's just going to be a lot of fun," Price said.

Parents responsible for Christmas toy frenzy

MARY RENEE SMITH
staff writer

Santa's job gets harder every year. Just before Thanksgiving, a barrage of new toys hits the market. Santa and his parent helpers have to sort through the lot and decide what to get every good girl and boy.

Each year there is a hot new toy, the toy that sells on the black market for hundreds of dollars and has parents driving like madmen from store to store. Last year's toy of choice was the Tickle Me Elmo, a stuffed red monster with a maniacal laugh who vibrates like an adult toy.

Sesame Street strikes again this year with the Sleep and Sing Ernie. Ernie, dressed in striped pajamas, sings himself to sleep and then snores like your grandfather in a recliner. While sleeping, his chest rises and falls like a scene from "Alien." I have seen parents showing this toy to children in the store. Children don't seem amused. What is fun about an orange guy sleeping?

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu

Most children I know see right through the Ernie toy to what it really is, a ploy to get them to take a nap.

I find it hard to believe that children are the cause of the black market on toys like this. Children aren't placing ads in the paper offering the playthings for hundreds of dollars. Children aren't paying out hundreds of bucks, either. Adults, grown-ups, big people — they are the driving force behind the toy frenzy each year.

Baby dolls have come a long way from Betsy Wetsy. There are dolls that cry, sing, fall down, laugh and play ring-around-the-rosey. There is even a doll that catches a cold and blows bubbles out its nose. A few years ago the craze was the doll that did nothing but look cute — the Cabbage Patch Kid.

Remember Cabbage Patch Kids? They are still around. This year there is a Cabbage Patch Kid that brushes its teeth. The doll comes complete with pretend toothpaste and foaming toothbrush. It is a great thing to teach children to brush their teeth, but a foaming toothbrush is gross.

Barbie is getting into the dental hygiene business this year, also. You can buy a Barbie dentist complete with dentist chair and little patient. The gross part is the sounds. The little patient makes the spitting noise. There's also the sound of that suction thing the dentist uses. The most interesting thing about Dentist Barbie is it appears she is wearing nothing but a lab coat.

The traditional boy toys are fairly tame this year. Jurassic Park clothes, race-car sets and models. Dinosaurs that can roar, walk and even can be dissected will be appearing under trees across America on Christmas morning.

Classic toys still rule, even if they are high-tech versions. There is a Lego CD-ROM. What fun is that? You can now play Monopoly online. Monopoly just isn't the same without Cool Ranch Doritos and Cherry 7-Up.

Santa is busy making his list and checking it twice. Santa, I have just one request. Leave the dentists, dolls and dinosaurs with the elves.

Kansas City bands produce memorable music with a mean wallop

PHIL KELLUM

Revolvers
"Marley" EP
Locket Love Records

Like the band's name suggests, the Revolvers really pack a mean wallop. Its fast, upbeat pop-punk sound is a lot like the Descendants meets the Ramones. It's a blast to listen to.

The EP is kicked off with the title track, "Marley."

It has some great guitar harmonics and pick slides from guitarist Mike and really good vocals from Justin that are actually sung, not screamed like most punk bands. It's an incredibly catchy tune that will have you singing along like mad.

Music Review

The second song, "Marrianna," is faster and poppier than "Marley," if that's possible. It sounds a lot like something the Queers would do.

When Justin and Mike sing the word "Marrianna," it's catchier than any entire song you'll hear on the radio. Just that one word. It's awesome.

Flip the record over and, lo and behold, there's two more songs about girls. "Ten Seconds Then" is a bittersweet love song that's all about wanting to go back in time and make a relationship better if you had the chance.

Drummer Buddy's rhythms are cool on this song. They're not flashy and out there. They're simple and propulsive. It's the perfect length; it doesn't drag on and on.

The final song, titled "Far Between," is a very melodic power-pop number that again features some killer vocal harmonies from Mike and Justin and a cool bass line from bassist Chris.

It's a song about missing a girl and seems like it was written from the perspective after a breakup, with lyrics like "And I want to know if you're thinking of me."

This is a great single that just hints at how great the Revolvers are. It's one of the best local releases in quite some time.

If you're a fan of bands like the Queers, Ramones, Descendants and Mr. T Experience, definitely check out the Revolvers.

Mr. Marco's V7/Sandoval
split EP
(Nova Coast/Lucky Penny Records)

This is a bizarre coupling of bands, but it works rather well. It's an affordable way to check out two local Kansas City, Mo., bands on one piece of wax. Mr. Marco's V7 and Sandoval contribute two songs apiece.

Mr. Marco's V7 recorded its side at a very unusual venue — Larry's Sunflower Minigolf in Kansas City, Kan., in July. It was recorded straight to a two-track recorder.

The opening song is "Shanty," which is a weird, off-kilter song that mixes lounge, rockabilly and swing into a bizarre musical cocktail that goes down smoothly.

The rhythm plods along and lurches around, but it's also watertight. The band goes from lurching along to jazzy interludes in a split second.

"Shanty" is a perfect song for sipping a nice martini or gin and tonic to, and I'm sure the band would agree with that.

"Cirrhosis (Impromptu Blues)" closes out Mr. Marco's V7's side.

It's a short, bluesy number that quickly disintegrates into a free-for-all noise jam that crashes about wildly and drunkenly and ends unexpectedly to cheers and maniacal laughter. In the background you can hear someone exclaim, "I'll never drink again!"

Mr. Marco's V7 also features drummer Chris Fugitt, formerly of old-school Kansas City thrash metal kings Mooncalf.

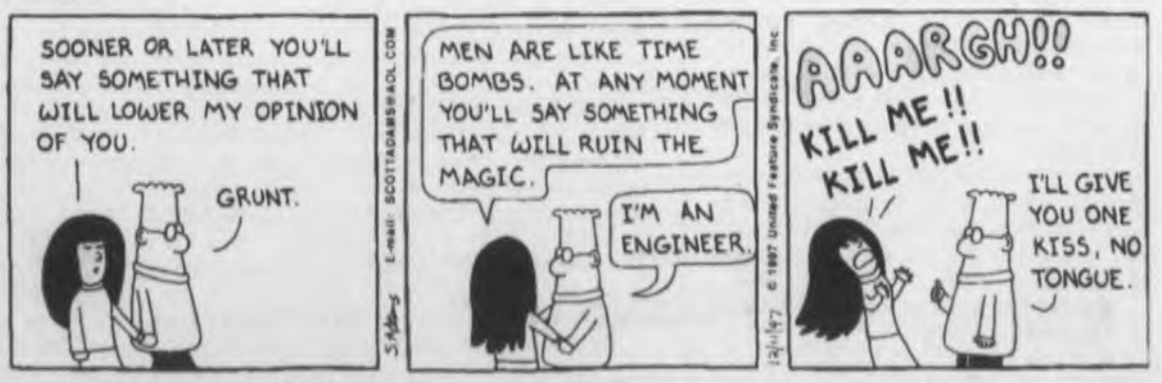
I would like to see these guys play live, because I'm sure it would be a blast.

Sandoval takes the B side of the record and uses it to showcase their brand of no-depression-style country rock.

"No Room In The Graveyard" has a great pedal steel guitar being used with an awesome solo that blew me away. I'm a sucker for pedal steel guitars. It's a song about dying, as the title implies.

"Abductee" is a driving rockabilly song that is absolutely hysterical. It's about alien abduction and makes fun of the whole thing. The chorus is really funny — "I'm just a redneck abductee. Please listen to me."

Sandoval is a raw and raucous band that reminds me a bit of bands like Wilco or Blue Mountain, except rowdier.



I think it would be fun to get loaded up on cheap beer and dance around like a fool at their shows. I can't do it at home because it would skip too much on my turntable. Oh well.

This is a cool record that exemplifies the true spirit of split singles —two bands with great songs on one cheap single. Right on.

2 K-Staters selected for top positions in regional residence hall organization

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

Two students became the seventh pair of K-State students named to the positions of regional director and regional director of finances for the Midwest Affiliate of College and University Residence Halls.

Paul English, senior in history, and Joe Ashley, senior in journalism, were selected.

MACURH serves as a voice of campus residence halls to help residence hall associations. There are more than 50 schools within the region, which includes Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota and Manitoba, Can.

English and Ashley were elected and began their one-year terms at the MACURH regional meeting on Nov. 15 at the University of Iowa in Iowa City, Iowa.

Due to the nature of the top two positions and the amount of correspondence needed, students applying for the jobs are usually from the same school.

English said he decided to run due to the lack of communication he'd noticed while participating within MACURH in the past.

"A lot of people weren't understanding what was going on," English said.

English said he decided to ask Ashley to run with him because of his ability to see the big picture, which contrasted nicely with English's detail-oriented approach.

"He's a very good leader," English said. "He reaches compromise very well."

Ashley said he thinks their background clinched the nomination.

"I think we won on experience," he said. "Paul had a lot of experience already, we were pretty packed either way."

To apply, the team had to submit an intent to bid one month prior to the November meeting and then submit their written bid for critical review on the eve of the election. Then they gave a 10-minute oral presentation as well as a 10-minute question-and-answer session.

Valerie Averill, MACURH regional adviser, said the duo did not have any challengers, but this did not assure them the win.

"They (the delegates) have the option not to bid if the candidates are not good," Averill said. "The students that elected them felt comfortable with Paul's experience."

English's duties include presiding over regional business meetings, making sure all members are fulfilling their jobs, creating and maintaining good communication between member schools and voting in the national meetings.

Ashley is in charge of the $20,000 budget for the region, proposes next year's budget, records meeting minutes and takes care of e-mail and list-serve discussions.

Averill said English's and Ashley's goals matched the organization's needs and interests. She said the two have big challenges ahead, because the students they work with are scattered and have so many different goals.

"Their objectives are two-fold," Averill said. "They need to create good team cohesion, and they need to make sure that member schools maximize membership."

Study finds alcohol in moderation reduces risk of death by 20 percent

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — The biggest study ever of the health effects of alcohol concludes that a drink a day can cut your risk of death by about 20 percent.

Many studies over the past two decades have shown that a little alcohol is good for the heart. However, others have found an increased risk of breast cancer and other diseases.

The latest research, conducted by the American Cancer Society, attempts to add up the pluses and minuses and calculate the net effect of alcohol on health.

Like most other studies, this one found that modest drinking is, on balance, healthful. The ill effects, including cancer, are greatly offset by alcohol's benefits to the heart.

"The best advice to the public is, nothing in excess," Dr. Michael J. Thun, the study's lead author, said.

The researchers gave questionnaires to 490,000 men and women and then followed up nine years later, after 46,000 of them had died. The findings were published in Thursday's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

Among the results:

- Men and women who averaged one drink a day had a 21 percent lower risk of death than did nondrinkers.
- The benefits decreased as people drank more. Among those who averaged four or five drinks a day, the risk of death among men was 10 percent lower, while among women it was 7 percent lower.
- Women who consumed at least one drink a day had a 30 percent higher risk of dying from breast cancer than did nondrinkers. Drinkers also faced a higher risk of dying from cirrhosis, alcoholism and cancer of the mouth, throat and liver.
- Overall, drinkers had about a 30 to 40 percent lower risk of dying of cardiovascular disease than did teetotalers.

Those who got the biggest benefit from drinking were people who had bad hearts.

"It shows that the net effect of alcohol consumption on overall mortality is influenced not only by how much people drink but also by their background health risk," Thun said.

Alcohol appears to protect the heart by raising levels of HDL, the good variety of cholesterol, and it may have other beneficial effects on the circulatory system as well.

Until now, two of the largest studies to look at this question were the Harvard-based Nurses Health Study and the Physicians Health Study. They found that moderate drinking lowers women's risk of death by 17 percent and men's by 22 percent.

An editorial by Dr. John D. Potter of the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center in Seattle noted that men in the latest study averaged one drink a day, while women consumed less than one. This is less than half what Americans typically consume.

If the general population drank more like these people did, Potter wrote, "we would see more of the benefits and less of the harm associated with alcohol."

Anti-smoking initiative calls for price increase of $1.50 per pack, fines, fewer advertisements

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — Congress should raise the price of cigarettes by $1.50 a pack, restrict access to tobacco and stress the dangers of teen-age smoking, witnesses told a House subcommittee.

But a price increase alone would do little to reduce youth smoking, two of three expert witnesses testified Tuesday to the House Commerce subcommittee on health and environment.

"There is no single magic bullet," said Leonard Jason, a DePaul University psychology professor. "The best approach is a combination of tools, including restricting access and advertising, school-based programs and price increases."

Economic studies estimate that a 10-percent price increase would reduce adult smoking by about 4 percent and teen smoking by 7 percent, said Michael P. Eriksen, director of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's office on smoking and health.

A third witness — Howard Beals, a George Washington University professor who has worked as a consultant for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. — disagreed. He said the most effective approach would be educating teen-agers about the consequences of smoking and imposing penalties for tobacco use.

Several members of Congress have introduced bills that would raise prices by $1.50 a pack, and anti-smoking groups have taken up the call in hopes that Congress will act next year on a proposed settlement reached between tobacco companies and state attorneys general in June.

Under the deal, tobacco companies would pay $368 billion over 25 years, curb their advertising and pay fines of up to $2 billion if teen smoking, which has increased through the 1990s, doesn't drop 30 percent in five years. In return, they would be protected against future lawsuits and win limits on government control of nicotine.

The $1.50 increase was not part of the settlement. President Clinton has called for raising prices gradually if teen smoking doesn't drop significantly over 10 years.

The tobacco industry has said the June agreement by itself would cause cigarette prices to rise by at least $1.50 a pack over 10 years.

Beals said the single most important factor in teens' decision to begin smoking is the behavior of their closest friends.

"The odds that a teen whose best friends of the same sex all smoke are more than six times higher than for a teen with no smoking friends," he said. "Teen-agers smoke because, judged by their own preferences, the benefits of smoking exceed the costs. To discourage teen-age smoking, policies must seek to reduce the benefits that teens derive from smoking, or they must seek to increase the costs that teens who smoke must bear."

Beals said his research also shows that cigarette advertising might influence a teen-ager's choice of brands, but it doesn't appear to entice them to begin smoking.

But Eriksen said advertising plays an important rule by affecting young people's perceptions of the pervasiveness, image and function of smoking.

CDC data show that teen-agers are nearly three times as likely as adults to smoke the most heavily advertised brands of cigarettes, and the glamorization of tobacco use in the media also appears to be a substantial influence, he said.

"Young people give the following reasons for smoking: to improve their image, specifically to impress peers and achieve a sense of identity," Eriksen said. "These themes are reinforced by the images of tobacco advertising that portray smoking as a popular part of a positive, active and fun lifestyle."

Public library construction to be finished by March

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

If construction schedules go as planned, the city's second significant library should open in late March 1998.

For the past year, Manhattan Public Library has been undergoing a $3.7 million, 31,000-square-foot expansion that will increase the library's stacks area and provide space for developing technological services. Nearly $300,000 of that money was privately given. K-State's Hale Library, a $30 million, 350,000-square-foot expansion of Farrell Library, opened its doors in October after two years of construction.

City library staff members are anxious, if a bit excited, to see the project realized. The new parking lot opened Nov. 28 and construction has moved indoors for the most part.

Once the expansion is nearly complete, the old library building will be renovated, so the library will be closed for a few weeks during the spring semester.

Fred Atchison, library director, said he and the library staff have been waiting a long time for this. The project was delayed for a few years because of a legal battle about annexing more land southeast of the library and the removal of a historic house.

"A community doesn't get a chance to have a library project like this very often," Atchison said. "It really is a unique moment. That's how the Library Board, architect and staff went into it."

The expansion's architect is Brent Bowman, the architect responsible for Hale's design and the year-old Manhattan airport terminal. The main contractor is the Altmar Co. of Topeka.

"Brent demonstrated a real appreciation for the significance of this library," Atchison said. "His whole focus was how you get the most from this site, how you relate to the surrounding community and how you relate to the city's main street — how you come up with an expansion that would do justice to the original building."

A bearing on the project

The existing library building was opened in 1968 after an old Carnegie Library building proved too small. The current edifice, designed by Manhattan architect William Eidson working with his wife, Patricia Eidson, has been expanded a number of times.

"He put a lot into this initial design," Atchison said. "People still react to this structure when they walk in — the openness, the glass, it fits into the general Flint Hills environment.

"They built a structure that, I think, was a fairly unique design. It has a real bearing on how this project began."

The Eidsons also designed the First Lutheran Church on Poyntz Avenue.

Although the current library construction has taken even more space from the library's public areas, space is limited even without temporary plywood walls dividing rooms.

Large print and new fiction stacks jut into circulation space. Old carpet is nearly worn through to bare concrete. There are few tables and chairs at which to sit. Even the staff is hidden away in the basement, lodged in rows of desks with limited elbow room.

"Expanding stacks have taken up public space," Atchison said. "The building was really starting to compromise the way we could serve the community in a safe manner."

Bowman is an architect who likes placing buildings in context and recognizing the importance of a building's neighbors. The expansion's genuflection to the original building's design is readily apparent from the street.

The original building appears massive — it's a boxy design with an exposed concrete structure and large limestone walls, which are occasionally pierced to let light pour into the main public areas. One feature of the new building is the addition of a Poyntz entrance, one seen by the library staff as an important engagement of the city's main street.

New features

Rosalie Pettle, assistant director for operations, said the expansion will provide, among other things, a new and increased children's department.

The new building, which links to the old by way of a soaring three-story atrium, will also house a library for people with disabilities, space for the North Central Kansas Library Regional Headquarters and a public auditorium. The atrium, besides integrating the library, also includes the new Poyntz entrance and a south entrance.

"In our new expansion, we're able to renovate the old building to put our collection together in an understandable way," Pettle said. "We'll have a true reading room on the first floor and a business library."

Another developing feature is a telecommunications center that could provide Internet access. It's part of a link between the city, the library and K-State. It is hoped some funding could come from the City/University Tax Fund.

The initial phase of the project was the linking of the computer systems of Hale and the public library to give patrons of both libraries access to the other. It was funded with the special projects money.

"With this collaborative effort, it doesn't matter where you are, you can use the collections of either library," Pettle said.

The project also fits into CORE, the Community On-Line Resource Exchange, a non-profit organization trying to establish a community network. CORE brings together Riley County, the school district, K-State, the health community, the city, Chamber of Commerce and both Hale and the public library.

Troubled past, hopeful future

The initial plans for the library created a statewide controversy when several neighbors fought plans to remove a historic house from the area to make room for the expansion and a larger parking lot.

Atchison said he thinks it will take some time before the neighbors, who were against the expansion, begin to feel good about the library. He said the contractors have worked hard to keep the project from disturbing the neighborhood by cutting down on noise and trash.

Gary Ellis, an attorney for the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, lives on Houston Street a few houses down from the library. He helped lead an effort in 1994 to stop the addition to the parking lot on a site formerly occupied by a historic home.

Ellis said his view of the project has changed little, although he still uses the library.

"I don't think it currently blends in with the rest of the neighborhood," Ellis said.

He said one of the original frustrations neighbors had was the library staff or the city never approached them with the project. During the construction phase, however, progress updates have been given to neighbors.

"There were numerous lessons learned," Ellis said. "You have to be active in supporting preservation. It has to be a community resource."

During the neighborhood uproar, Ellis helped found the Manhattan-Riley County Preservation Alliance. That organization has also been active with the continuing drive to preserve Manhattan's historic depot.

He said he doesn't think the city staff learned much from the library experience.

"I would be concerned because I see the same things going on with the Anderson project," Ellis said, referring to the city's controversial plan to widen Anderson Avenue.

Other criticism of the project has been as simple as whether the library needs the expansion. The library staff is quick to defend comments from residents that libraries will become obsolete because of technology. This same argument surrounded the addition of Hale.

Judith Edelstein, assistant director for services, said a public library is a different place from any other in a community.

"A public library is a community space where people can go and be, ask questions and get resources," Edelstein said. "Information isn't the only thing a library is about."

The larger auditorium could also lead to the library becoming more of a multipurpose community center.

"There's a sense to which the library has a neutral space quality when there are community or political issues," Edelstein said. "The library says this is a place where all points of a view are represented — in the books we have, the magazines, the materials."

VIOLENCE

somebody. I wanted to help women. I began to see the plight of women. I had no idea that there were gender imbalances. It seems odd when the police say, 'No, women bring violence upon themselves. We're not going to enforce this restraining order. You must have done something.' That truly is a gender imbalance of power," she said.

At the Crisis Center, Foster said she started learning that her husband's actions were not acceptable.

"At home, it was always my fault, that's how I believed," she said. "That's common among battered women. If I could just get the house clean enough, he wouldn't get angry. If I could just lose enough weight, he would be happy. If I could just manage to keep the house and children in order, it would be OK."

Foster said she feared for her life in Missouri. At the time, her husband had found out where she was staying. He pounded on the door, and again, Foster called the police.

"The police came. It was a miracle they actually came. Maybe it was because there were witnesses; I don't know, but they arrested him.

By the time Foster's husband had been arrested, she had collected and saved enough money to move.

"I didn't know what my choices were. The center gave me choices and taught me that I have a right to not be hit," she said.

As a child, Foster never witnessed any physical violence. She was not raised in an abusive environment.

Foster said her husband was a teenage sweetheart who she remet after high school, and after four months of dating, they married. Gradually, strange things in their marriage began to happen.

"Now, this was someone I loved. He didn't hit me the first time I saw him. I would have never married a jerk. But then again, he didn't scrape half the food off my plate, and tell me that I didn't need to eat. No, he brought me flowers, he courted, he loved me — and I loved him."

Foster compared their relationship to a stick, whittling away a little bit at a time. She didn't notice it at first, but then a little more whittled away.

"The first time he shoved me, he apologized profusely. It reminds me of the saying, 'When you put a frog in boiling water, it will jump out. If you heat it slowly, it will boil to death.' That's exactly how it was for me," she said.

Foster said she thinks if her husband had abused her right away, she would have gotten out of the relationship sooner. But, ever so slowly the abuse became a part of her life. She said her desire was to make it better. Leaving him was not on her mind, but rather, making things right.

She told herself to be quiet, not to yell so much. But regardless whether she was the perfect mother and wife, he would find some reason to be angry.

"That's the way abusers are, and that's the way he was," she said. "I couldn't do anything good enough."

Foster's husband expressed low self-esteem, and by that point in their marriage, her esteem was even lower.

"Love is a very awkward, powerful emotion. My perception of love at that moment in my life was distorted. Loving and forgiving is a lot different than loving and tolerating," she added. "I couldn't tolerate it anymore."

Foster lived in fear after leaving her husband. She said women have a 75-percent greater risk of injury or death after they've left the home, rather than those who stay. She said 6,000 women a year die from domestic violence; it's the No. 1 health hazard for all women.

She had not come in contact with her husband for years, besides a few times, in which he asked for money. After two years alone and on her own with her children, Foster took time to heal. She remarried and has been married for three years.

"By then I was able to identify the kind of guy I used to go for, the kind of guy that I could make his world better. This time it was different," she said. "I found someone who had goals. I found our relationship boring at first, but I was just used to all the highs and lows that my life was filled with as a battered wife. I wasn't used to the 'normal.' We have our normal disagreements, but everything is based on equality."

Foster graduated from K-State with a degree in social work in July 1996.

"Graduating was the ultimate goal. Wow, was that an ego booster. It was another step up my ladder."

She applied at the Crisis Center in hopes of helping women and people like herself. As a parent-child advocate, she works with families and children. She watches children learn how to smile, laugh and have fun.

"I love my job," she said. "It gives moms the opportunity to bond with their children. The women who come to the Crisis Center are all so unique and different, yet they have the same pains and struggles. Because of where I've walked — I've walked in their shoes — each of us walks our own path. I think that brings a unique perspective for women, especially looking at the way I am and who I am today.

"There is no specific kind of woman in domestic violence. Every woman has the potential to be a victim. I go to the high school and I do classes on domestic violence and talk about the characteristics of battered women. When I asked the question of, what would you do if your boyfriend pushed you, more than the majority of the girls agreed that they would only have a talk with him. They are accepting of the violence," she said.

Foster continues to step up her ladder of life. Although today, in her eyes, it's more like a paved road.

"The road crew's already gone through now. It's a much easier road to travel," she said, cradling her son in her arms.

"The focus of domestic violence is on the perpetrators and not the victims. When the perpetrators are held accountable by the religious community, the community at large and the law enforcement, that's when we're going to see a change in domestic violence."

BASKETBALL

Asbury said. "I think they stayed in it in the first half on their offensive rebounding."

K-State continued its run in the second half with three-pointers by Rhodes and Lopez to lead 38-34. Wichita State stormed back to tie the score at 40, but another Rhodes triple sent the Cats out to a 47-42 lead.

The Shockers rallied and took a 60-51 lead on a three-pointer by guard Chris Grill with 11:25 left. K-State came back to within one at 60-59, but would not take the lead for the rest of the half. K-State tied the game at 69 and again at 71, but Shocker freshman Maurice Evans made one from behind the arc for three of his team-leading 23 points, and Grill hit a turnaround jumper over Rhodes to take a 76-71 lead, which the Shockers would keep into the last minute of regulation.

K-State stormed back with guard Aaron Swartzendruber drilling a triple from the left baseline to pull within two. After a defensive stop by the Cats, guard Ayome May hit a turnaround jumper with seven seconds left to send the game into overtime tied at 76.

The Cats took the momentum from the second half into overtime. K-State never trailed in the extra session, and took advantage of 10 of 14 free-throw shooting in overtime to win by seven.

"We knew that once we got into overtime, if we could continue playing as hard as we did in regulation, we'd have a good chance to come out of here with a win," Dies said.

Despite shooting 56 percent from the field for the game and 62.5 percent in the second half, K-State won the game at the free-throw line. The Cats drilled 28 of 38 free throws, while Wichita State only got to the line half as many times, shooting 8 of 19.

In addition to Dies and Rhodes, Swartzendruber added 14 points for the Cats, and Pero Vasiljevic had a career-high 10 points for the Cats.

K-State returns to action Sunday afternoon against Arkansas-Little Rock. The game will be at noon at Bramlage Coliseum.

"Kristin is intense, competitive and hard-working," she said. "She could step in at the two or the three, which is interchangeable for us."

Rethman's team lost to forward Nicky Ramage's alma mater, Little River, in the state championships last year. Patterson said players coming from smaller school have to make even more adjustments than they realize when they enter the college level.

"It's very challenging," she said. "They have to have patience as well as persistence. You can't simulate it for them until they get there. A player has to give herself time to make the transition."

Perry's high school is much bigger than Rethman's, at about 1,100 students. But she's ready to rise to a challenge like this one, Patterson said.

"Essence is a very independent individual," she said. "She has a strong desire to maximize herself, and she saw she'd have the opportunity to do that here. She's very intelligent and somewhat mischievous and has great strong values as we do. It's what attracted her to K-State."

Patterson said she is looking for a post player at the community college level to round out the 1998 recruiting class.

reach a compromise with Senate.

Sally Sowell, director of administrative services for Lafene, said that increasing fees by 4 percent while reducing operating reserves to 10 percent would mean Lafene could keep operations as is. A 4-percent increase in private fees translates to $100,000 more for students to pay.

"The philosophy of the operations of the health center would change dramatically if this bill passes," Sowell said.

The bill, Senate Bill 97/98/87, is last on the agenda for Student Senate tonight.

"We've done our job, and we've done it very, very well," Tarara said. "I think we're making a wise recommendation."

Senators debate health fee

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Student Senate was scheduled to take final action on the Student Health Privilege Fee during its Thursday night meeting, but no decision on the bill had been reached at press time.

The bill, as it was recommended to the Senate by Privilege Fee Committee, proposed continuing the Student Health Fee at its current level of $2,507,603 per year.

Also in the legislation was a recommendation that Lafene Health Center institute a $5 per office visit charge to compensate for financial shortfalls. The bill recommended the $5 charge, in addition to a 5-percent cut in the health center's reserve, to make up for financial shortfalls without an increase in privilege fees.

But in a meeting with administrators late last week, Privilege Fee Committee members and other students learned that the administration would not support a new per-visit charge.

Governmental Relations Chair Patrick Carney said administrators have clearly expressed their disapproval of the charge.

"We can try to mandate it. But we've already been told and essentially warned that if you do, we will ignore it," he said.

In its Wednesday meeting, Student Health Advisory Committee members discussed the legislation and the administration's stance against new user fees. They proposed a 4-percent increase in the fee and a 5-percent increase in fees for services at the health center each year for the next two years.

The 4-percent increase would add about $2.88 per full-time student per semester to the Student Health Fee, Tarara said.

At press time, an amendment to the bill that implemented SHAC's recommendations was being discussed on the Senate floor.

What else happened at Student Senate

• Bill 97/98/87 passed 50-5. This bill increased the University Counseling Services Privilege Fee by about 90 cents per full-time student per semester to a total of $446,110. The fee increase was prompted mainly by salary increases at University Counseling Services, which uses 97 percent of its budget for salaries.

• Resolution 97/98/54 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution presents Student Senate's proposal for a fall break and reading day before fall and spring final exams. If approved by Faculty Senate, university administration and the Kansas Board of Regents, the calendar change would cancel classes on a Monday and Tuesday during the second or third week in October to create a four-day weekend known as "fall break." Classes on the Friday before finals week during the fall and spring semesters would also be canceled to give students and faculty a chance to prepare for exams. For the fall break proposal to take effect, classes would have to begin on Thursday of the third week in August. This would put the new calendar in compliance with regents guidelines that require 75 class days per semester.

• Bill 97/98/89 passed 54-0-1. This bill allocated $209,273 to various campus services from the Educational Opportunity Fund for fiscal year 1999. The EOF funds, which are allocated to state universities by the Board of Regents, are used to support campus organizations including the KSU Child Development Center and the Academic Assistance Center.

• Bills 97/98/71, 83, 90, 92-94 passed by various affirmative vote totals. These bills allocated funds to University Activities Board-registered organizations for special projects during fall 1997 and spring 1998. KSU Aikido Club; Newman Club; Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Society; Asian American Student Union; Native American Student Body; and Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol all received funds.

• Bills 97/98/95-102 passed by various affirmative vote totals. These bills allocated funds to UAB-registered organizations to fund their operations for the spring 1998 semester. Zeta Phi Beta, Malaysian Student Association, Vietnamese Student Association, Hispanic American Leadership Organization, Black Student Union, Amnesty International, International Coordinating Council, and Congolese Students and Scholars of North America received funds.

Program funds study abroad for students

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Fifty-one years ago, Sen. J. William Fulbright began a program that would change the lives of thousands of students.

For up to a year, Fulbright scholarship students take classes abroad and work on a research project they design, all as part of the Fulbright program.

More than 80,000 American students have taken advantage of the program since it began in 1946. On the other side, 140,000 foreign students have come to the United States.

"The leadership of the world are often these people from Fulbright exchanges. They wind up in positions of authority because of this expertise — this experience starts it," said Walter Kolonosky, Fulbright adviser for K-State and associate professor of modern languages. "The Fulbright is never an end in itself but a means to the next step."

The Fulbright was created to increase world unity by Arkansas Sen. J. William Fulbright after World War II.

The grant pays for people to complete up to a year of study abroad.

"All disciplines are possible," Kolonosky said. "During that year, you get yourself in a very good position for your whole career."

K-State's nine recent nominees could be determining the effect of privatization of Venezuela's oil refineries on the country's people or researching how the French government handles family issues.

"You get international transportation, local transportation and tuition, room and board and you receive a stipend, as a rule," Kolonosky said.

The grant amounts to about $15,000 dollars, depending on the country.

"There's a good opportunity to win a Fulbright because there are over 500 awards," he said.

About 10 K-State students apply each year, Kolonosky said.

"It's amazing how many people don't know about it. Ten is a very small number for a big institution like K-State."

Most recipients are recent college graduates seeking another year of study and experience.

Applicants are judged on the basis of why they want to go to school and the kind of project that they will have. There's two sides, Kolonosky said — the scholar and the continuing student.

James Lehr, senior in education-modern languages, applied to the Fulbright program this year to teach English in France.

"You've got to sell yourself," he said. "You've got to tell them first why you're deserving and second, why they should give it to you."

The application process begins on May 1, and applications are due in the middle of October. The application consists of several pages of general information, a curriculum vitae, a project proposal and three letters of reference.

After the application is written, there is an interview with a campus committee that determines a rating for the applicant.

Karen Ruckert, senior in history-political science, said the short interview with four professors focused on how she would carry out her proposal.

After the interview, the application is sent on to be reviewed by a national screening committee, which might review as many as 900 applications, Kolonosky said.

It selects the applications to be sent to supervising agencies abroad for another round of selection.

For example, an application to Germany would first go through the process in the United States and is then sent to Germany.

"There'll be a Fulbright committee in Germany who would supervise and administer the Fulbright for that country," Kolonosky said.

If it is successful, the student will be notified around May.

The more information students have about the program, the better, Kolonosky said.

"They need information. With the Internet, now it's amazing how much you can find out about institutions abroad.

"In the past, that was a real problem," he said.

Fulbright grants are also available for teacher exchanges and travel besides student scholarship.

Roof project to replace pipes around Eisenhower

LANCE SCHOEN
staff reporter

Construction will begin on Dec. 19 to improve drainage from roof downspouts, window wells and the site around Eisenhower Hall.

The project will replace the original storm piping installed when Eisenhower was built in 1951.

The piping has deteriorated and become clogged over time and the new storm piping will prevent flooding in Eisenhower during seasonal rainstorms, Jack Carlson, assistant to the university engineer, said.

"What happens is that the water will run over the top of the concrete window wells and will get inside," he said.

The drainage piping runs around the perimeter of Eisenhower, then crosses Mid Campus Drive and goes down the middle of Lovers Lane on campus.

Excavation will begin Dec. 23 around the perimeter of Eisenhower, and Carlson said he thinks most of the big excavation should be done before students get back for the spring semester.

"We hope that most of the major excavation will be complete by Jan. 12, but there will still be some minor excavation left that might be noisy while classes are going on," he said.

The project will be done in two phases. The first phase will go from Eisenhower to halfway down Lovers Lane toward Manhattan Avenue. It should be completed by Feb. 19.

The second phase will be the rest of Lovers Lane to Manhattan Avenue and is scheduled to be completed by mid- to late summer.

Police attempt sleep deprivation to wear down murder suspect

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ORLANDO, Fla. — Police negotiators used sleep deprivation and a constant stream of conversation Thursday to try to wear down a murder suspect holding two preschoolers hostage in their home for a third day.

John Edward Armstrong, 39, had demanded a car at the start of the standoff and threatened to kill the youngsters, Malcolm Phillips, 4, and his cousin Tedi Priest, 2, if he didn't get it.

But police have since refused to say what his demands are.

On Thursday, police kept in contact with Armstrong on the phone and on a bullhorn when he wouldn't pick up the phone.

"He's real tired. He's working through what his options are," said Capt. Sal Lomonaco, commander of the negotiating team. "He talks about when the time is right."

Earlier in the day, police were optimistic that Armstrong would eventually release the children. But as the talks dragged into Thursday night with no progress, negotiators became increasingly frustrated.

"We thought we had developed a rapport and a working relationship," Lomonaco said during a nighttime rain. "I don't understand why he hasn't released the children."

Officers would not specifically say what actions they would take to end the stalemate.

Armstrong, 39, is suspected of killing a man and wounding a woman in a nearby park and leading police on a car chase that ended near the children's duplex Tuesday.

He barged into the home at random, chased the youngsters' mothers out at gunpoint and took the children hostage.

The standoff unfolded with repeated televised pleas from relatives of both Armstrong and the hostages to free the children. Dozens of people called police offering to trade places with the children.

Manny Dies sentenced, granted probation

Dies

K-State basketball player Manny Dies was sentenced on Dec. 1 to spend seven days in the Riley County Jail but was granted a nine-month probation and served no jail time.

Dies entered a plea of guilty on charges of criminal damage to property.

Riley County assistant attorney Brenda Jordan said Dies will be required to attend an anger management course and pay probation fees as well as court costs.

Restitution fees will also have to be paid to the plaintiff as stated in the suit against Dies, Jordan said.

Dies was unable to be reached for comment on the matter.

Woodyard penalized for DUI without receiving conviction

Riley County Police Department assistant director Larry Woodyard has agreed to proceed with the penalty for a DUI without receiving a conviction.

Woodyard was involved in a two-car collision in November and was given a DUI after receiving a breathalizer test.

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said Woodyard also applied for a diversion, which is a statutory process approved by the Kansas Supreme Court.

Woodyard will undergo a drug-and-alcohol evaluation and will have to participate in an after-care program if an alcohol problem is found.

In addition, Woodyard will perform 100 hours of community service and pay a fine of $200.

He will also write an essay proposing a solution to the DUI problem.

"He was treated like anyone else would have been," Kennedy said.

$500,000 Hale Library suit remains in preliminary stages

A lawsuit filed in September against the state of Kansas and the Law Company over construction delays in the Hale Library project are still in the pre-trial stages.

Initially, a lawsuit for $500,000 was filed in a Shawnee County District Court by lawyers for Central Mechanical Construction Co. and D.L. Smith Electrical Construction, two subcontractors on the Hale project.

This lawsuit names the state, the prominent contractor law, United States Fidelity and Guaranty, and Brent Bowman and Associates Architects of Manhattan.

A countersuit was filed by the Law Company for $5 million against the state for breach of contract, breach of implied warranty and misrepresentation.

A counterclaim to the charges of the lawsuit by the Law Company has been filed by the state.

The lawsuits are in a pleading stage, where all named parties are preparing their documentation and determining the intentions of the lawsuit documents.

Richard Seaton, university attorney, said it is too early for a trial to be set.

Seaton said the university attorney's office has been cooperating with the state attorney general's office in the lawsuit preparation.

He said the state attorney on the project has also hired an outside counsel who specializes on construction-delay matters.

"The university is not a named defendant, so our office is not counsel on the case," Seaton said.

Jury orders store to pay $1 million to woman for racial complaint

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A federal jury has awarded more than $1 million to a black woman who said a department store security guard stopped and checked her and denied her a free gift because of her race.

An all-white jury on Wednesday decided to award $56,000 in actual damages and $1.1 million in punitive damages to Paula Hampton, a 37-year-old human resources manager.

The lawsuit grew out of a confrontation Hampton and her niece had with a security guard at Dillard's Overland Park, Kan., store in April 1996.

The guard accused Hampton's 24-year-old niece, Demetria Cooper, of shoplifting while the two women were shopping with their three children and another child.

The store found no evidence of theft. The women also claimed they were supposed to have received, but did not, some free perfume after making a purchase.

Elaine Drodge Koch, a Dillard's attorney, said the case was simply one of suspected shoplifting and not racial discrimination.

Indiana quads have different birthdays; 1st born 11 days early

INDIANAPOLIS — Kim and David VanBaale got all four of their children — it just took a few days for the babies to show up.

Doctors delivered one of the premature quadruplets, then stitched Kim VanBaale's cervix closed to give the others 11 additional days to develop.

The firstborn, a girl named Bailey, came on Thanksgiving Day, nearly four months premature. Her sisters — Alexa and Elle — and brother Edwin arrived Monday.

All were listed in critical but stable condition Thursday at St. Vincent Hospital. None weighs more than Edwin's 2 pounds, 1 ounce.

"It was quite a miracle that one baby was born on Thanksgiving and the doctors were able to keep the others inside their mother long enough to give them a better chance," said David VanBaale, a 33-year-old police officer in the couple's hometown of Lebanon, Ind.

The couple had tried to have children for five years before Kim VanBaale, 32, began using fertility drugs, her husband said.

He said his new arrivals are expected to remain hospitalized until the beginning of March, their original due date. Kim VanBaale was expected to go home Thursday.

Chain-reaction accident kills 4, injures 28 on foggy Interstate 5

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — A fiery chain-reaction crash on a fog-shrouded roadway early Thursday killed four people, injured at least 26 and closed Interstate 5 indefinitely.

"Four confirmed fatalities, but we anticipate that may go higher as we pull the vehicles apart," Elk Grove, Calif., fire chief Mark Meaker said.

Nine big rigs and 28 passenger trucks and cars were involved in the early-morning pileup and were turned into a mangled, smoking mass of crushed metal and glass that stretched over a quarter-mile of freeway south of Sacramento.

Capt. Dave Ritter of the California Highway Patrol said 23 of the injured were taken to hospitals and three declined treatment. He said an unknown number of others suffered small injuries.

Fog was apparently a factor, police said.

Passers-by reported explosions, possibly from fuel tanks. The wreckage was still burning hours later.

The southbound lanes were closed, apparently because authorities were afraid of explosions.

Motley Crue members Lee, Sixx arrested at own concert in Phoenix

PHOENIX — Motley Crue drummer Tommy Lee and bassist Nikki Sixx were arrested for allegedly knocking over a security guard at a concert.

Lee urged fans to come on stage at the end of Motley Crue's concert Wednesday night at America West Arena, and hundreds approached the stage, police Sgt. Mike Torres said. When security guard Kenneth Chambers tried to hold audience members back, Lee and Sixx tackled him, Torres said.

Lee and Sixx were booked for misdemeanor assault and were released early Thursday.

Stovall bidding for re-election

SHEYENE FOSTER
staff writer

Carla Stovall, Kansas attorney general, announced her candidacy for re-election in a speech given at the Manhattan Municipal Airport on Thursday.

Stovall said having the opportunity to serve as the Kansas attorney general has been one of the greatest honors of her life, and that she has learned much from her experiences in office.

"I now more fully realize just how great our state is and how much the Office of the Attorney General can positively impact the people of our state," Stovall said.

Stovall said it was this realization that pushed her to run for re-election.

"It is because of this I am announcing I will be a candidate for relection in 1998 for the Office of Kansas Attorney General," Stovall said.

Stovall also recalled some of the challenges of her term.

"The last three years have been a time of challenge and change," Stovall said. "Very quickly I realized that no important decision comes without opposition."

Stovall said, however, that she felt she had been able to meet the challenges of her office.

"I promised when elected that I would not duck the hard issues," Stovall said. "I would stand up for what I believed in."

Stovall said an important focus of her term was protecting victims' rights and establishing more stringent laws and prosecution to deter crime.

Stovall said much has been accomplished in the past three years to enforce the Kansas Consumer Protection Act. The act is designed to safeguard consumers from the threat of scams and other fraudulent business dealings.

"As your attorney general, I have been standing up for the victims of crime," Stovall said.

Stovall said these efforts also included increasing the sentences for violent sex offenders and dealing with domestic violence. Stovall said a new hotline has been started during her term to deal directly with domestic abuse. The number is (888) END-ABUSE.

Stovall said the Manhattan area's hard work and the devotion of the Manhattan Crisis Center Inc. stand out as prime examples of real efforts to eliminate domestic violence.

"Your program for domestic violence here in this area is one of the best in the state," Stovall said.

Stovall said protection of college students was another focus during her term.

"I have been standing up for young people and we formed the CAMPUS task force," Stovall said.

Stovall said the Campus Awareness Makes for Protection and Ultimate Safety program filled a need in Kansas, by increasing communication between law enforcement officers, college administrators, students and their parents.

Stovall said fighting big tobacco companies has been an important battle as well, and one that people need to continue to fight. She said the tobacco companies influence on the children of Kansas is one of the most significant problems.

"You should know that today and every day in Kansas, 30 children will begin smoking," Stovall said. "Ten of them will die prematurely as a result."

Stovall said other battles of her term have dealt with natural and financial resources. These includes disputes about water rights with both Colorado and Nebraska.

It was worth taking the states to court to preserve our natural resources, Stovall said.

"Water and the farms and jobs and communities that depend on it are too important not to do that," Stovall said.

Stovall said though many accomplishments have been made in several key areas, she would like to continue to address these issues on behalf of all Kansans.

"Much has been done," Stovall said. "Much more needs to be done, though, and that is why I am seeking re-election."

Progress on these issues are proof of the progress that has been made and hope for further advancements in the future, Stovall said.

"I am standing before you today with my head held as high as I can because I am so proud of the progresses we've had in the last three years," Stovall said. "I am eager to build on those accomplishments."

Professor uses common-sense approach

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

Finance isn't just dollars and cents. It's also about business and consumers, something Richard L.D. Morse learned from the beginning.

"I didn't come into learning consumer finance from stodgy and traditional finance books, but clearly in terms of what does the consumer need," Morse, a retired professor, said.

Morse began his study of consumption economics at Oberlin College and received his bachelor of arts degree at the University of Wisconsin. He then continued his education at the University of Chicago, completing his master's and doctoral degrees at Iowa State University.

After spending more than three years in the U.S. Navy, Morse began his teaching career as a full professor of family economics at Florida State University.

While at Florida State, Morse used the Consumer Report, a magazine published by the Consumers Union, as a teaching aid. After controversy about the use of the magazine, which was then considered anti-business, Morse began looking for a university that would allow him to use the teaching methods he wanted. In 1955, he found just that at K-State and accepted a position as a full professor of family economics.

"I've been able to live and work without fear of incrimination from the administration for taking stands which were not particularly popular," Morse said.

While at K-State, Morse did more than just teach his classes. He researched and coined the terms finance charge and annual percentage rate. Morse served on the U.S. Consumer Advisory Council under former Presidents Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson. Morse also helped introduce bills in both houses of congress on truth in savings. He is the author of numerous research articles and a book, "The Consumer Movement: Lectures by Colston E. Warne."

In addition, Morse has served on the Consumers Union's Board of Directors for the past 19 years. The Consumers Union and the Consumer Report have been an interest of his since it was first published in 1936, and his family became subscribers.

"I've been involved with the Consumers Union all of my life," Morse said.

In 1987, Morse retired from K-State, but didn't stop his contribution to K-State's society. Tony Crawford, chair of the department of special collections at Hale Library, said Morse and his wife, Marjorie, have been supporters of the library expansion and generous contributors to the consumer archives.

"As a result of their work, we have attracted donations of collections from consumer leaders from around the country," Crawford said.

These donations have made the consumer archive possible, which is now a research aid for people working on topics related to the consumer movement, Crawford added.

The consumer archives project has kept Morse involved in the study of consumer economics long after his retirement, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

"His interest following his retirement has been to find a place for his consumer movement manuscripts and collections," Hobrock added.

However, there is more to Morse's retirement than consumer finance. For the past 10 years, he has balanced his time to include his research, improving K-State's consumer research capabilities and traveling with his wife.

"In 1955, I told her I thought we could come to Manhattan and spend a year or two," Morse said with a smile. "That's where I lied a little."

Planning, preparation keys to avoiding holiday debt

JULIE LINDAMOOD

Christmas is the season of giving. It's also a season full of stress for many people who don't have the money to cover their generosity.

With careful planning and preparation, people can give at the holidays without too much stress, said Margaret Dukes, consumer credit counselor at Consumer Credit Counseling Service.

"My advice for holiday shoppers is to set up a cash reserve for gift giving and for travel and, each month, set aside money for those projects," Dukes said.

Many banks will work with customers to find a plan that allows them to have extra cash at the holidays, said Pat Dembkowski, customer service officer at Commerce Bank.

"We can transfer funds from their checking to their savings and they'll get the interest on it, and it will just build up over the year," Dembkowski said.

Besides saving money throughout the year, some students work for extra money, said Rachel Svaty, sophomore in accounting and finance.

"I work and save up for Christmas by putting a little of my paycheck into the bank each month," Svaty said.

Dukes said the most important things to do are limit unplanned purchases and avoid discounts at stores if you have to pay with your credit card. She said the best ways to follow these plans are to give yourself plenty of time to shop, make a list and check it twice, pay in cash and stay away from impulse shopping.

"The best advice is to prevent holiday debt," Dukes added.

At Consumer Credit Counseling Service, Dukes and other counselors can help set up spending and debt repayment plans and give tips and skills for money management.

Dukes said there is a one-time $20 counseling fee, but because it is a nonprofit organization they will work with people and won't turn anyone away.

The key is to get help before you're too far in debt, she said.

"It is a lot harder to get people out of trouble than it is to equip them not to get in trouble," Dukes said.

Editorial board uncovers Santa's naughty, nice list

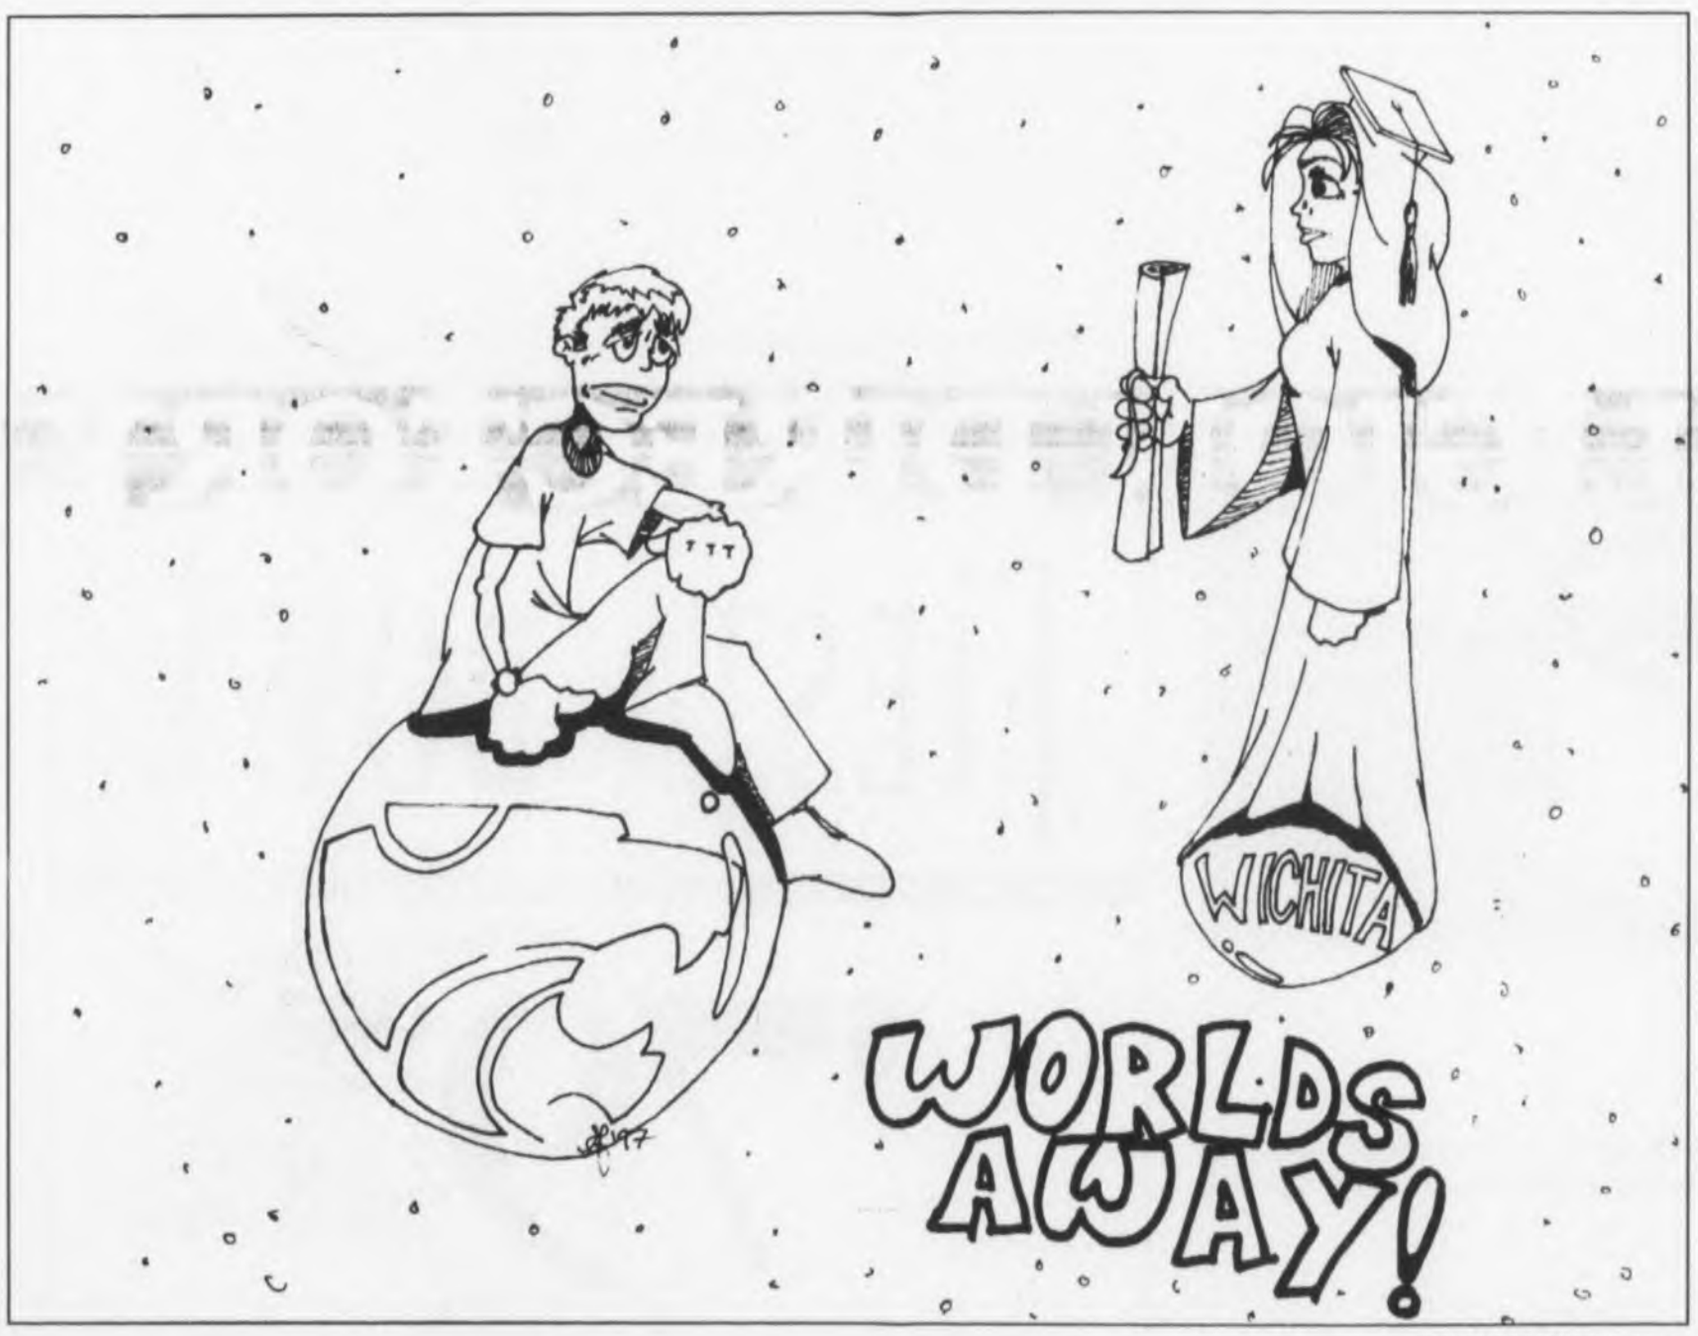
Silently and swiftly, members of the Collegian editorial board hacked into Santa's World Wide Web site and uncovered his annual naughty and nice list. Here's a peek at who made the lists and why.

Let's start with the nice list. Hmm, it's a little shorter than we'd hoped.

- Those notorious squirrels that make the campus so lively and interesting.
- The women who serve the biscuits and gravy every morning.
- President Jon Wefald for giving the Collegian staff that shiny new atlas.
- The basketball team for going 6-0 so far this season and defeating Wichita State University.
- Bill Snyder and everyone involved with the football team for making it to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.
- Jonathan Winkler, K-State's newest Rhodes Scholar.
- Annie Wetterhus for being such a great cross country runner.
- The livestock and crops judging teams for bringing K-State more national recognition.
- Tom Osborne for not making fun of K-State during the rough times when our football team wasn't so stellar.
- Sock White for filling in for columnists.

Just finished deciphering the naughty list. Here we go.

- The deer who crashed into that classroom in Waters Hall.
- People who don't stop for pedestrians.
- Student senators for beating the Collegian in the first volleyball matchup.
- Willie (We know about you).
- Larry Woodyard, Riley County Police Department assistant director, who was arrested for DUI.
- Parking Services for making another no-parking spot in front of Kedzie Hall.
- Community members who tried to close off Laramie Street.
- Spice Girls and Hanson. Enough said.
- "A Purple Affair."
- Dick Vitale for charging K-State to speak and then making a commercial where he screeched the virtues of stadium expansion, baby.
- President Clinton dropping K-State as a possible speaking appearance while he was in the state. What's up with that? Maybe now that we've got a Rhodes Scholar, he'll make an appearance.



Oh no, are those sleigh bells we hear? Better wrap it up. Have a happy holiday season, everyone.

From a distance

When a relationship is separated by miles, hope and optimism are the best chances for survival

SHANE FOSBURG/Collegian

K-State seniors will walk into Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday, walk across a stage and walk into their futures. I'm in a relationship with one of these seniors.

She, unfortunately, will start her future in Wichita while I remain at K-State for four more years. We're playing against the odds and trying to maintain our relationship despite the distance between us.

I've never thought of myself as being overly sentimental. My laissez-faire relationships with my friends and my family have proven to me that I usually keep those I care about at an arm's length. But this relationship is different.

In this relationship, I go insane whenever we're apart. I never get tired of her. Just the thought of her moving 130 miles away is more than I can bear. Knowing that I won't be able to see her every day tears me apart.

Thanksgiving break was a disturbing experience for me. We were apart for less than one week, and I was pulling my hair out. I thought about her all the time. My sister, who noticed how often I brought up the relationship, concluded that I must really care for this girl.

But what's about to happen is much more severe than a one-week break. We're about to be apart for years. Sure, we're both planning on making several visits, but what's upsetting is there will be times when I'm missing her and I won't be able to see her.

What's really scary is that this has happened to me before. After high school, I was in a relationship that tried to survive despite the fact she was attending the University of Kansas. However, I became too lonely, too jealous, too suspicious and too insensitive for her to handle. I made her feel guilty about being so far away.

That relationship ended two months into the school year. If I'm not careful, I could end up doing the same thing again.

In some sense, the situation is silly. I've known this person for five months — we've been together for about four. It's been four months, and I'm fretting about being 2 hours and 30 minutes away. 150.2 minutes away.

And it's for that reason neither of us are ready to make some huge sacrifice quite yet. Our relationship is too premature for me to be moving or transferring to another university. Although the possibility of living closer to each other someday hasn't been ruled out, we're both levelheaded enough to realize that maybe this thing won't work.

But to be quite honest, I think it will work. I really don't think I've felt like this about someone before. Aside from her, I've never really been able to talk to anyone about my religion, my family or my future. She listens to me, she understands me and she laughs at my jokes.

What it's going to take is a lot of tolerance and a lot of patience. I hope she will be able to put up with how sad I'm going to be, and I hope I've learned from my past mistakes.

Every time I think about our impending struggle, I can't help but think back at how it all started. I think of the mutual friend who helped bring us together. I think of the impossible first date that somehow worked. I come to the conclusion that this relationship wasn't a fluke. It was meant to happen. Now it's just a matter of whether it was meant to last.

For the most part, our relationship has been very private (well, until now). I haven't had to run off to my friends and tell them something about her. Actually, she's been that friend. She's everything I've ever wanted.

They say true friendships can conquer the obstacle of distance. And while I truly hope this one does, I must admit I'm a little scared. However cliché it sounds, only time will tell what happens to us.

We're going into this future anxious and optimistic, yet painfully aware of how much we're going to miss each other.

Architectural wonders warran more than just 1 columnist's view

When I first laid eyes upon the architectural wonders on our campus, I was simply amazed. The modernism shown in every brick laid on this land-grant community just called out my name.

"Brandi," it called. "Write a column about us and the other architectural wonders of the world. We're tired of sole representation by Russell Fortmeyer."

What could I do? I had to set forth and calm the voices. Always the voices.

When I look at buildings, such as the Guggenheim, the Cologne Cathedral or even those McDonald's along the interstate with huge play areas, I shudder at the thought of all that wasted space. Let's talk about the usable square footage over the total square footage for each of these examples of modernism. Vaulted ceilings, flying buttresses thrown all akimbo and huge statues of Ronald McDonald all take up usable space.

Now let's take a look at the hallowed ground of this university. The star in this example (and it really shouldn't be any surprise to any fan of the Jack-Kerouac-angst-ridden-modernism-movement) is Denison Hall. It fits into my favorite category of architecture, that being "short-n-squatty." Square. Simple. Denison is the epitome of fine building design. When I sit in my German class in the basement of Denison, I look at the wood-paneled walls and know the architect dad on "The Brady Bunch" would be proud.

And it's not just the basement that has appeal. The mosaic-like tiles making up virtually every part of the inside of Denison make me feel like I'm in a public swimming pool. Swimming? In December? Get out!

But it's true. Yes, Denison has the same wit and charm as the YMCA. Who can beat that? Just be sure to bring your own towel, and remember there's no running.

The north facet of Denison is another example of why that building is just pure sex. Who needs windows when you can have a nice wall of unblemished rock? And, now that you understand my view on wasted space, you'll understand what I mean when I say there'd be nothing to see if there were windows there anyway (nudge, nudge, that's you, Hale Library).

Anderson Hall is another building high on my list of America's Top 100 Buildings. Of course, the whole high ceiling thing (and those gargoyle statues, yuck!) takes it down a few notches, but there's one quality about it that keeps it on the list – the steeple. It pokes proudly up through the frozen trees in the winter, and the sun shines upon it in the summer. A jack-of-all-trades steeple.

My main contention with the steeple is one of practicality. Besides it's high aesthetic value, the steeple also provides a place if anyone ever goes nuts and decides to start picking people off with a rifle. I think if I were to do that, the steeple would be a prime location.

However, having been built in the pre-war era (and I point this out because few people realize that both world wars have provided humanity with all sorts of building materials, like rock), the steeple was constructed out of sod, twine and jute. Therefore, it probably wouldn't hold weight well, so leave your picking off of people for another building.

Fortmeyer likes to sing the accolades of the likes of the Getty Center. Well, here's a little secret about that Los Angeles museum. It was really named after Getty Lee, the lead singer of Rush. Have you ever been to "Lakeside Park," Russell? I'm sure it's just another example of wasted space and void of wood paneling. "Closer to the Heart?" More like "Closer to the Colon." I hate to burst your Gilded Age bubble, but it's true. Give me a quality compact Ozark Trails tent over a billion-dollar space eater.

"Lowbrows unite!" Fortmeyer would cry, rallying his troop of T-square carriers (both of them). But this isn't a matching of the wits here. It's just the truth.

My final contention surrounds the topic of building materials. Limestone seems to be the popular choice around K-State. Fortmeyer seems to prefer Sears aluminum siding when praising building design. But that's not where the future is, folks. And it's not in plastics, either. It's in Popsicle sticks. Sturdy, dependable and stained a variety of fruity colors. It's the ideal building material to push us past the 21st century, straight into the 22nd.

I think Frank Lloyd Wright would agree.

Manning tired from 2 years of Heisman Trophy hoopla

Manning

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. — If college football fans are tired of hearing the words Peyton Manning and Heisman Trophy, imagine how Manning must feel. For three seasons, it's as if "Heisman Trophy candidate" has become part of the Tennessee quarterback's name.

"I get tired of talking about that," Manning said. "I really do."

But only twice has he actually refused — after a crushing defeat against Florida in 1996 and after last weekend's victory over Auburn in the Southeastern Conference championship game.

There are two main reasons for Manning's longstanding connection to college football's most prestigious honor. He had a great year as a sophomore to put his name in the mix and he came back for his senior season.

He has said all along he didn't spurn the NFL and millions of dollars for another season in college to play for individual awards. He wanted an SEC title.

"People think I really want to win this award," he said. "People think I need this award. That really isn't the truth. I was never taught to play for individual awards. I don't want to take anything away from the award. I know it would be an honor to receive it. I respect the people who have won it before. For me personally, it's not that important."

Manning came to Tennessee with an impeccable pedigree. His father is Archie Manning, an Ole Miss legend who starred in the NFL with the woeful New Orleans Saints. Because of his name and sparkling high school credentials, big things were expected of the younger Manning.

And he delivered.

Manning is the leading passer in SEC history. He surpassed Georgia's Eric Zeier with a 73-yard touchdown pass for the winning points in the SEC title game. He also owns a slew of Tennessee records.

This season, Manning completed 60 percent of his passes for 3,819 yards. He has 36 touchdowns and just 11 interceptions.

Stories of Manning's dedication are legend in Knoxville. The coaches say they've never had a player more thoroughly prepared.

Offensive coordinator David Cutcliffe tells of having to run Manning out of the film room, and of adding extra preparations to his own routine so he'd know at least as much about the offense as his quarterback.

Manning is just as efficient in the classroom. He graduated with honors in speech communication after only three years and played this season as a graduate student.

He's also a favorite with the media. He speaks intelligently and never dodges the cameras, even after losses.

"I've never had a player more accessible to the media," sports information director Bud Ford said. "We had an hour Tuesday and an hour Wednesday. He never missed one of those. He was available after every game for as long as anybody wanted to talk to him."

Ask Manning what he's proudest of, and football wins are only part of the answer.

"All I've ever tried to do here was to be a good, loyal team member," he said. "I've missed one practice in my career. I've always taken pride in that. I've come to work every single day, tried to get better and tried to help my team win games."

Coach Phillip Fulmer never tires of talking of the examples Manning has set: the return for his senior season, community activities, classroom work and more.

"The character, integrity and leadership are a representation of what college football should be about," Fulmer said. "Plus, with the numbers he's put up, there's no question in my mind that Peyton Manning is the best player in the country."

Manning knows better than to become consumed about the Heisman.

"My sophomore year I was hoping to have a chance to go to New York. I was excited," he said.

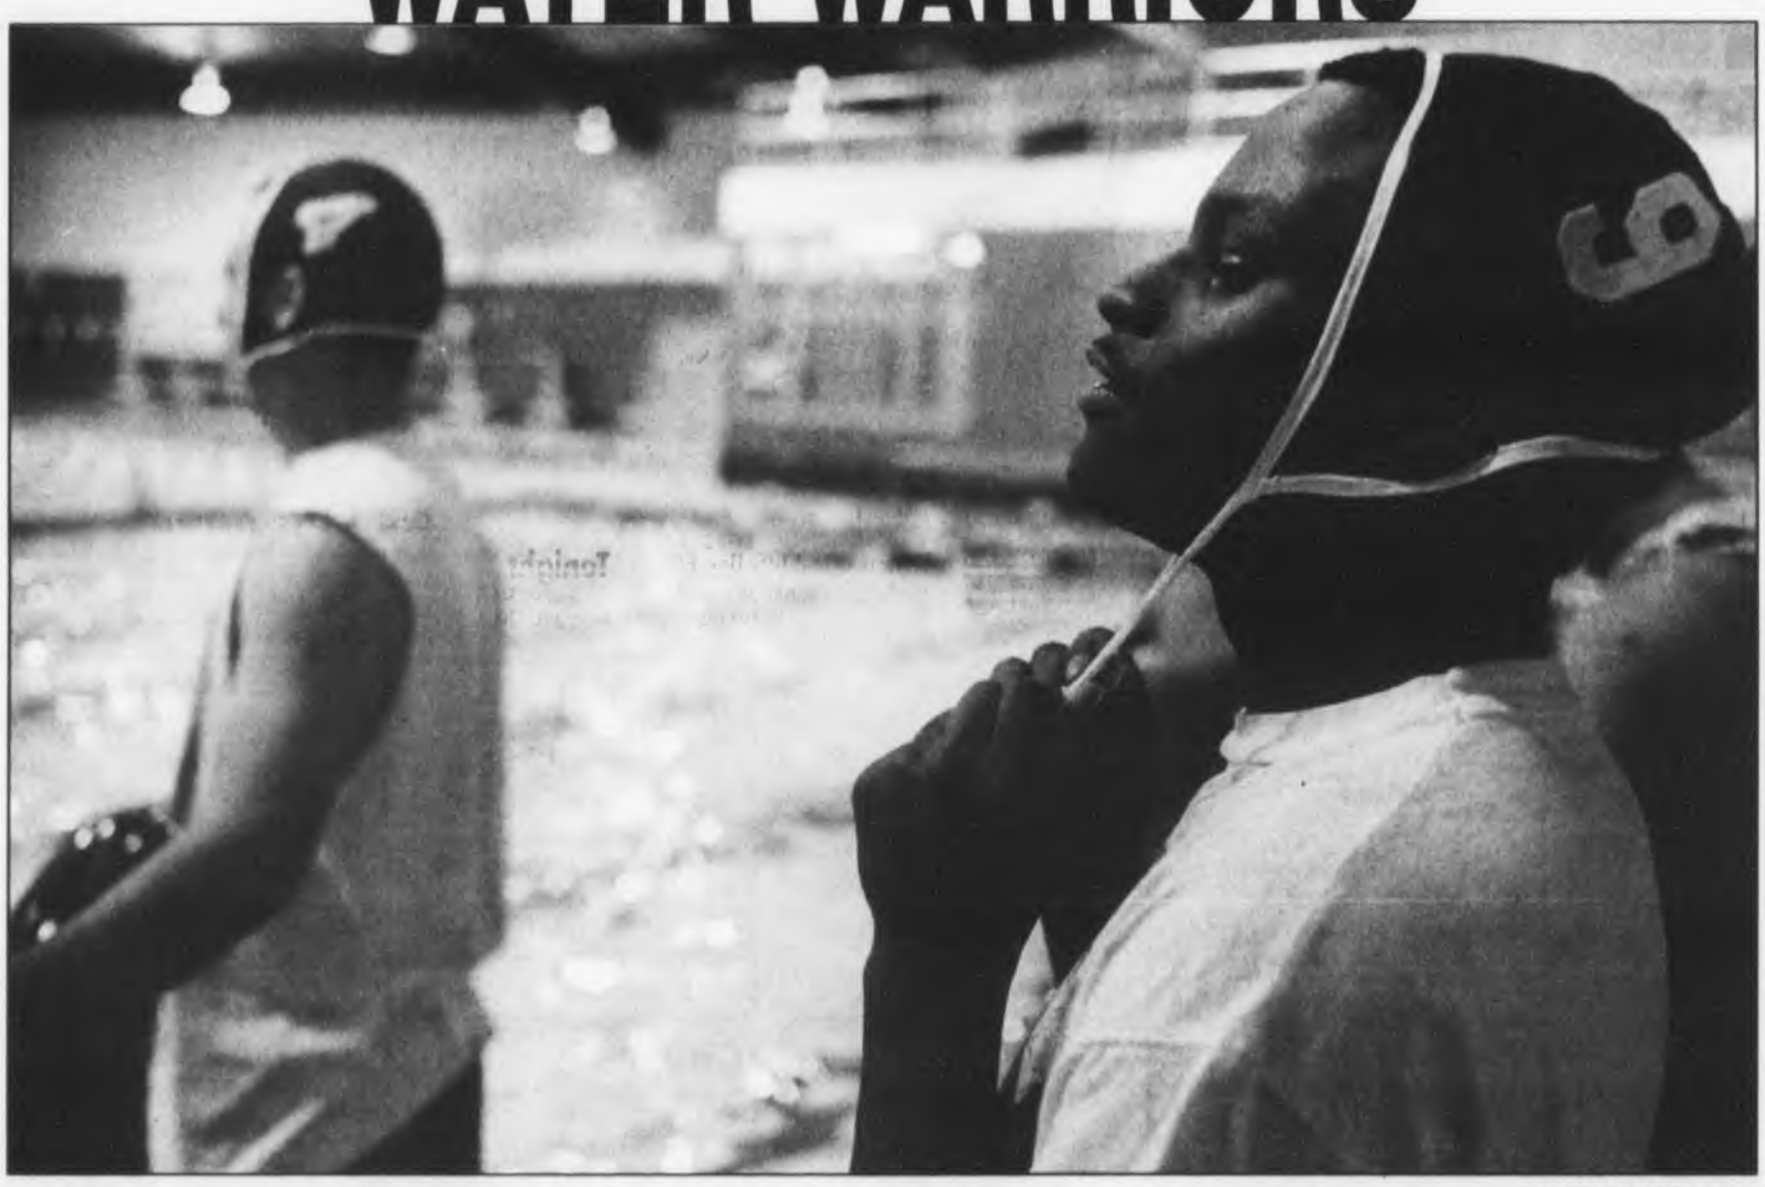
"Then I helped my team come back to win against Kentucky and Vanderbilt and found myself dropping (in the race), and I didn't get to go. I was a little disappointed. But it kind of taught me a little bit about it. From that point on I knew you can't worry about it."

Manning finished sixth in the balloting that year.

Last season, a four-interception half against Florida in the third game of the season wrecked his chances. He finished eighth.

"I was fine with that," Manning said. "This year it sounds like (Michigan defensive back Charles) Woodson is in the lead, and that's fine with me. I think about the Heisman because people ask me about it every day. But it doesn't stay on my mind very long. It doesn't keep me awake at night. It's obviously there, but I've never had any control over the situation."

Manning said his perspective comes from his father, who taught him to play for the team. It also comes from his brother, Cooper, who had to quit football at Mississippi because of a neck injury while Peyton was in high school.



"After the Kentucky game (when he threw for 523 yards and five touchdowns) people were asking me if I was mad because I had the best game of my career and lost ground in the Heisman poll," Manning said. "My brother was having neck surgery the next Monday. Talk about setting your priorities. All that's really important to me right now is my brother's health."

A quarter-century ago, Archie Manning was the front-runner for the Heisman, but injury kept him from it.

"My dad has never mentioned that thing to me one time in his life," Peyton said.

"It's never bothered him one day in his life. My family ... we'll take it, but we don't need it."

WATER WARRIORS

BEFORE FACING THE THETA SIGS ON Nov. 18, Jerome Stokes, graduate student in human resources and member of the Big Toobs, ties on his swimming cap. Theta Sigs won 9-4, and Big Toobs' record dropped to 1-1 in the double-elimination tournament.

Major Infractions win intramural water polo title in 3rd attempt

staff writer

The third time was a charm for the Major Infractions on Wednesday night in the finals of the intramural water polo tournament.

After two consecutive years of reaching the finals and losing, the Major Infractions, who finished the season at 4-1, won the tournament in third quest by beating the Theta Sigs in the finals.

The Major Infractions made their way through the winners bracket into the finals of the double elimination tournament, so they had two chances to beat the finalist from the losers bracket.

And both chances were required. The Theta Sigs nipped them in the first game 8-7. The second game and the championship went the Major Infractions way as they posted a 6-4 victory.

"I think both teams were tired in the second half of the second game and I thought our teamwork was better to enable us to win," said team captain Travis Rau, senior in architectural engineering, after his team outscored Theta Sigs 2-0 in the second half.

Rau said communication is the most important part of the game.

"It's like any sport — it takes teamwork," he said.

"You get pretty tired in the tubes. You have to know where everyone is."

Teamwork came easy to the Major Infractions because the players have spent three years together and more than half the team is seniors.

"It makes it easier because we're used to everybody and know where we're supposed to be," Rau said.

Co-recreational water polo teams consist of seven players. Teams can have either a male or female goalie, but they must have three males and three females as field players. All players have inner tubes they must stay on, and the games last 24 minutes.

Rau said the women on his team did a great job.

"I think they're the most important ones out there," Rau said. "The girls make the difference."

Rau also said that teams were more competitive than in years past.

"This year, the teams were a lot better. Every team we played was pretty good," he said.

"It was a fun year."

6-0 Cats to endure tougher schedule over semester break

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

For the first time since the 1986-87 season, the Cats have started with a 6-0 record.

Here is a quick look at some key games down the road:

Arizona — Dec. 30, Tucson, Ariz. Provided that the Cats can get past Davidson in the first round of the Fiesta Bowl Classic, they would have a probable matchup against the defending national champions. Arizona is led by the guard tandem of Miles Simon (17 points per game) and Mike Bibby (16.4 points per game).

Missouri — Jan. 3, at Manhattan. The Tigers (3-4) will be the Cats' first Big 12 game of the season. They have losses to Duke, Kentucky and Arkansas, all top-25 teams. Senior forward Tyron Lee leads the Tigers with 13.6 points per ame. Forward Kelly Thames and guard John Woods also average more than 10 points per game.

Oklahoma — Jan. 7, at Norman, Okla. The Sooners (5-3) were picked No. 2 in both the Big 12 preseason coaches' and media polls. Four Sooners, Corey Brewer (15.6), Ryan Humphrey (10.6), Eduardo Najera (11.6) and Evan Wiley (10.4), are averaging double-figures in scoring. Humphrey was the Big 12 Preseason Freshman of the Year in the coaches' and media polls.

Baylor — Jan. 10, Waco, Texas. Senior center Brian Skinner, Big 12 Preseason All-Conference First Team selection in the coaches' and media polls, has led the Bears to a 3-3 start, averaging 17.5 points and 11.8 rebounds per game. The Bears' three wins came against Troy State, Eastern Washington and Arkansas State. They lost to Arizona 83-68 at Waco on Monday.

Holiday season takes women's basketball on cross-country road trip

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

When the Wildcat women's basketball team returns to Manhattan, the students won't be far behind. Beginning Saturday, the Cats embark on a four-game road trip that will take them to points north and west.

Saturday, sophomore center Angie Finkes returns home to play on a semi-familiar court at Ohio State. Finkes, a native of Springfield, Ohio, played on the Ohio State court her junior year in high school during a tournament and said K-State should have a strong fan base Saturday.

"My high school team is coming, and my mom bought 50 tickets, I think," Finkes said. "It's not just nice for me, but for the rest of the team also. It won't be the home court but we'll have the fan advantage of being on a home court."

At last year's game at Ohio University, Finkes and then senior forward Andria Jones had their share of fans. But Finkes said Columbus is closer to her hometown, so the cheering section will be larger.

Then the Cats have a bit of time off before taking on Marquette Dec. 21. On Dec. 28, the team will travel to San Diego to meet San Diego State. On Jan. 4, the Cats shoot north to Lincoln to play Nebraska. They return to Manhattan Jan. 7 to play intrastate rival Kansas.

But throughout this time, Coach Deb Patterson said the team is focusing on the fundamentals of offense.

"It's about what each play demands of each player," Patterson said, "and knowing that player's strengths and weaknesses and who they're about to play."

For instance, at the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic championship game vs. Utah on Saturday, Patterson said newcomer Ewa Laskowska, sophomore forward Nicky Ramage and Finkes were playing a game of musical positions on the floor.

"Angie struggled the other night, so she came out," she said. "The only other five we have left is Ewa. She has to play the five because at this point, (freshman forward) Brandy Harris and Nicky can only handle the four. And then (junior guard) Jenny Coalson was having a very bad night. And (freshman guard) Morgen Finneran couldn't handle the three. That left Ewa at the three, which meant I had to put Angie back on the floor at the four."

All this switching around is enough to make a player's head spin, and Patterson agreed.

"Do they know the basics? Yes," she said. "You just watch your players and what they have to remember, and you'll be dumbfounded."

But as far as where her team is at this point in the season, Patterson said she is more than pleased.

The schedule, with Kansas and Nebraska coming up in less than a month, is just getting more difficult. The teams were picked to finish fourth and fifth respectively in the Big 12 preseason coaches' poll. And although K-State was picked to finish ninth, Finkes said she wasn't surprised the Cats were 5-2.

"I think most of us are upset that we're not 7-0, because the two losses were games we were capable of winning," Finkes said. "We have a lot of talent, even though we're really young. And we really want to win."

Patterson has taken note of this positive attitude, and she has one as well.

"I think we'll get nothing but better and better and better at doing what we do," she said.

"Right now I'm not in a hurry to add more. I want to get good at what we know."

late release
Local cd finally available

KADY GUYTON
arts and entertainment editor

OK, music fans. Listen up, because the Manhattan Project compact disc has finally, finally, finally been released. In honor of this event, there will be a release party at Bombers tonight, but more about that later.

Review — Music

The Manhattan Project CD is a great sampler of local bands. The whole thing was recorded live during one weekend in August at Bombers. Each band that played has one song from its set with crowd noise included. Back Porch Mary's second-to-last local performance has also been saved for posterity.

The CD kicks off with Red Eldon playing "Paul Part Deux." The interesting thing about a recording like this is that oftentimes the bands sound better on the recording than they did at the live show. This is really apparent on Red Eldon's song. The vocals are a lot crisper and the loud drunk standing behind me did not manage to get on the track. It's sort of like the fun and ambiance of a live bar show without the crowd hassles. Can't beat that.

Back Porch Mary played "Reelin' With the Stink of Whiskey," a definite roadhouse song. Mike Krug's sandpaper vocals gave out on him at a few points but the overall effect was good.

Podstar, the youngest band but probably one of the tightest playing groups, come across really well with "Tim's Asbestos Breath." The vocals are clear, and the guitar playing is sharp. It will be interesting to see how these guys shape up as they get older. They have an excellent start already.

Sufferbus starts its song with some advice on moshing. "If you're going to do that moshing thing, make sure you hit somebody in the face. All right?" Then it launches into "Brunette." The beginning of this song makes it clear it's recorded at a live show. The crowd can be heard clearly, but it's not distracting.

Ruskabank kicks off with "Hothead," and its fans are clearly captured. Dave Spiker's vocals sound great. I've only seen these guys live at packed venues so it was a nice treat to have a recording I could rewind and listen to closely. Ska works best live, but loud on headphones is the next best thing. The microphone screeching would have been a nice thing to edit out, but it only happens once, so I can live with it.

After that is El Fontain. I suppose you could call it Manhattan's super group because all the members are from other local bands. This means we get to listen to a lot of musical experience in one place. "357" shows off the multi-layered guitar playing, and Marty Robertson's vocals seem to float over the instruments.

The next three songs are a little more heavy. Porphyria, the lone metal band, played "D." This song on headphones is almost too much for one person, but I survived the live show and this was much quieter. The audience yelling in the middle of the track was a nice touch.

Jiffy Boy, sometimes called the fastest band in town, live up to that with "Ex Post Facto." It's loud, it's fast, it's pure Jiffy Boy. That's pretty much all you need to know.

Chick Scalletti is a little disappointing. It sounds kind of muddy. I'm not sure if that's a reflection of the editing, the band or just bad karma. "Stuck Back Down" seems to drag and I got the feeling the band got bored about halfway through the song. So did I.

After all that, Woodshed feels like a breath of fresh air. "Slipside" has a very light, bouncy tune that matches Jeff Lees' vocal really well. It sounds very Top 40, but it's a nice closing song for this CD.

Now about that release party: 9 tonight at Bombers. There's a $5 cover charge. That gets you in the door and Jiffy Boy, El Fontain, Porphyria and Ruskabank will be handling the entertainment.

Podstar will be promoting the CD at Streetside Records at 5 p.m. on Monday. There will be free in-store promotions throughout the show.

Let's hear it.

Holiday album brings different music, artists together for charity

MARY RENEE SMITH
staff writer

It seems every Tom, Dick and Harry who thinks they can sing or play an instrument puts out a Christmas album. Deciding which holiday offerings are worth the money can be a chore. This year's best pick might be "A Home For The Holidays," a benefit for Phoenix House.

Sure, there are a number of benefit compact discs released in time to take advantage of the spirit of holiday giving, but this one is actually good. The Phoenix House is an organization helping young people with drug addition through education, counseling and other support. The liner notes get a bit deep at times trying to draw metaphors between the Christmas carols and drug abuse, but just listen to the tunes.

Only at Christmas time could you find the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, Vanessa Williams, Gloria Estefan and Joan Osborne on the same album with the Livemongers, Bon Jovi and OMC. Richie Sambora, Boys II Men, Dar Williams, Suzanne Vega and Brian McKnight also give renditions of some traditional and not-so-traditional Christmas songs.

The biggest surprise of this album is Wendy and Carnie Wilson's (of Wilson Phillips fame) version of "Hark the Herald Angels Sing." This arrangement of the classic carol varies from the traditional just enough to make it interesting but is close enough to the version we all know to sing along.

Review — Music

Suzanne Vega sings a lesser-known yule time lullaby, "Coventry Carol," which has become my new favorite Christmas tune. The song has a haunting melody that will follow you through the season.

Gloria Estefan adds a Latin flare to the release with "Arbolito de Navidad," a Spanish language tribute to the Christmas tree with an upbeat tempo.

The biggest disappointment comes from the Mighty Mighty Bosstones. The song "X-mas Time" sounds too much like the Mighty Mighty Bosstones impersonating Bruce "The Boss" Springsteen and lacks the drive and beat of good Bosstone tunes.

The album could have also done without Bon Jovi's "I Wish Everyday Could Be Like Christmas," written by Jon Bon Jovi. There is something wrong with singing a song you write yourself for a holiday album full of musical people who are singing traditional carols.

"A Home for the Holidays" is a great way to get into the spirit of the season by getting a great collection of Christmas tunes while supporting a good cause.

TCI, HALO close to agreement on Univision

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

In a meeting Thursday, TCI of Kansas gave the Hispanic American Leadership Organization a possible solution for getting the Univision channel added to the Manhattan cable line-up.

Since August, HALO has pushed for community support to get Univision, an all-Spanish speaking channel, added to the Manhattan cable system. Univision is the No. 1 cable network in the United States, and is the fifth most-viewed network in the United States. It only trails the CBS, ABC, NBC and Fox Networks in number of viewers.

Richard Cofer, general manager of the Manhattan/Ogden cable system, met with Leo Prieto, junior in pre-medicine and president of HALO at K-State; and Carlos Contreras, sophomore in business and arts, to discuss the proposal.

"We are working on a compromise in an attempt to get Univision on a sharing basis with another channel," Cofer said.

The proposed channel that would share space with Univision would be the Knowledge TV channel. Cofer said Univision would air from midnight to noon, while Knowledge TV would air from noon to midnight. He said this would work well because most of the night programming on Knowledge TV is only infomercials.

Contreras said this is a step in the right direction.

"We're glad he's willing to compromise. It's a good step, but not a final resolution," Contreras said.

One problem with the proposal, according to Contreras, is that Univision wouldn't reach many people because of its time slot.

"Many of the people that this channel would benefit are in the work force and school. They wouldn't be able to watch it because of its time slot," Contreras said.

Cofer said although the time slot might be at night, he cannot give Univision its own channel right now at the expense of other popular programming.

"People could possibly tape them (Univision shows),and play them at different times. People already do this during the day," Cofer said.

Contreras, Cofer and Prieto said the proposal is only in the discussion stage and that nothing is final.

Prieto said he will go to Chicago after meeting with Cofer to consult with marketing executives from Univision on today.

"I'll be updating them on our progress in Manhattan, and they will give me some input about the situation," Prieto said.

Although he sees the initial talks as a stepping stone, Prieto said HALO will continue to push for support from the community, in order to get Univision its own channel.

Univision has already gained official support from the K-State Student Governing Association and other local groups. Prieto said HALO will also be working to get the support of Mayor Bruce Snead; Dan Yunk, superintendent of Manhattan public schools; President Jon Wefald and the Manhattan City Commission.

"Channels such as BET and Univision promote multicultural diversity. For a prestigious university and its community to be deprived of such programming takes away vital threads of society that are so important in today's world," Prieto said.

K-Stater to throw out 1st pitch for Royals

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

Batter up. Baseball fans can expect to see Jake Worcester, sophomore in agricultural economics, throwing out the first pitch at a Kansas City Royals baseball game next summer.

"This is just one of the fun duties I get to do as the American Royal Student Ambassador," Worcester said.

Worcester, and Sherri Moeller, a sophomore from South Dakota State University, were selected from a field of 32 candidates to represent the American Royal for the next year.

"I could have named any number of people who I felt were just as deserving as me, so it was quite an honor to be named," Worcester said.

The American Royal is the longest-running livestock show in the United States. In addition to the livestock show, the event sponsors rodeos, art contests and even a barbecuing contest.

"When I found out that I was selected, it was a really overwhelming feeling," Worcester said. "Immediately, they showered us with gifts, and I met so many wonderful people right away that I can't really remember everything."

The two ambassadors remained in Kansas City after the livestock show and made appearances promoting agriculture as well as the American Royal.

"We attended many American Royal functions, including rodeos, concerts, horse shows, dinners and luncheons," Worcester said. "We also had the opportunity to do radio and newspaper interviews, speak at local clubs and organizational meetings and even meet some of the most influential people in Kansas City."

Ambassador duties will continue for Worcester until next November.

"Next on our agenda is a summer internship with Farmland Industries and the American Royal," he said.

"We will be working with four other interns facilitating the Youth Leadership Conference that Farmland hosts each year."

In return for Worcester's contributions to the American Royal, he received a $5,000 scholarship, courtesy of Heartland of America, McDonald's and Coca-Cola, Inc.

"We also received new suits from Mark Shale, rings from Vinca Opal Gallery, boots from Olathe Boot Company, a leather jacket from Ambiance Furs and even shirts from Nigro's Western Store," Worcester said.

Abra Ungeheuer, sophomore in agricultural economics, served with Worcester as a Kansas State FFA officer and said his outspoken personality will be great for the position.

"From the first time I met him, I saw he had a real interest in agriculture, and he does a great job promoting it," she said.

"I know he will be able to make a real difference in the lives of youth. That will be a very positive difference."

Associate dean takes pride in success stories of students, colleagues over past 34 years

staff reporter

Scattered throughout the office of David Mugler, associate dean and director of academic programs for K-State's College of Agriculture, are subtle reminders of the success stories of former students and colleagues — the same people he has influenced during his 34 years as an administrator at K-State.

"That's what has been fun about this job," Mugler said. "Seeing the success of our students, our faculty and our alumni."

However, Mugler attributed the success of the College of Agriculture to the strong team work ethic the college has.

This team effort has led to numerous department awards, including Mugler's recent certificate of recognition from the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges for longtime service in administration of academic programs in agriculture. Mugler said the awards are an added benefit, but helping students is the most important part of his job.

"I've got the best job on campus because I get to work with the students and with our alumni," Mugler said.

Miles McKee, professor of animal science, said Mugler wants students and faculty to do well and be as excited about agriculture and life as he is.

"I think he has brought a great deal of warmth and a feeling of being a part of something through his whole administrative career," McKee said.

This feeling is what makes students and faculty proud to be part of the college, McKee added. Kelli Ludlum, junior in animal science, said Mugler's concern and compassion for students are what make the college one big family.

"He takes a personal interest in everyone," Ludlum added. "Not just how they are doing in classes, but on a personal level."

Mugler insists the praise is because of the team effort of the College of Agriculture staff and his enjoyment of his job. All the success stories, which began when Mugler came to K-State as an undergraduate, are almost over, because he will retire in June.

"Having all this fun for 34 years is probably about enough," Mugler said. "I ought to let someone else have a little fun."

Microsoft can no longer mandate its browser program; $1 million a day fine rejected

Federal judge orders Micrsoft to stop forcing installation of its Internet browser as a condition for buying Windows.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A federal judge on Thursday ordered Microsoft Corp. to stop forcing computer makers to install its Internet-browsing program on PCs as a condition for buying its popular Windows program.

U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson, however, rejected a Justice Department request to fine the software giant $1 million a day for alleged violations of a 1995 court order aimed at preventing anticompetitive practices in the software market.

Jackson issued the decision in response to a Justice Department lawsuit that charged Microsoft violated the 1995 order by unfairly leveraging its market dominance in Windows software to gain market share in the Internet browser market.

Browsers, such as Microsoft's Internet Explorer and Netscape Communication Corp.'s Navigator, enable computer users to find and retrieve information on the Internet.

In his decision, Jackson argued that forcing Microsoft not to bundle the Internet browser with the Windows 95 will not cause a significant hardship for the company because it already sells the product separately.

"Microsoft will remain free to market and promote (Internet Explorer) just as it presently does — or in any other manner it sees fit — so long as (computer manufacturers) are given the choice of whether or not to accept the product," he wrote.

Joel I. Klein, assistant attorney general and head of the Justice Department's antitrust division, welcomed the ruling even though the judge didn't fine Microsoft.

"What is most important is that choice will be restored to the market," Klein said. "They were taking their monopoly in Windows 95 and saying you can only get that if you take our Explorer."

"It sends a clear signal to competitors that they are free to develop, innovate and compete on a very level playing field," Klein said.

Jackson appointed Harvard Law School professor Lawrence Lessig, a leading national expert in technology law, to be a "special master" and rule by ay 31 on the legal issues raised in the case.

In the interim, he said Microsoft "shall cease and desist ... from the practice of licensing the use of any Microsoft personal computer operating software ... on the condition, express or implied, that the licensee also license and pre-install any Microsoft Internet browser software ..."

Microsoft spokesman Greg Shaw said in Redmond, Wash., the company was pleased that the judge didn't hold it in contempt.

"This is clearly a preliminary decision, and the court agrees with our position that more facts are needed," he said. "We remain confident that what we are doing is good for the software industry and good for consumers."

Shaw said the decision "refers to licensing agreements going forward" and does not void any licensing agreements Microsoft already has. But he said its effect on Windows 98 — a new software product due out next year and expected to fully integrate the Web browser with the operating system — "is a little unclear."

Netscape welcomed Jackson's ruling.

"What we've been after is a level playing field, and we believe this is an important step in establishing this," said Lori Mirek, Netscape's senior vice president for marketing. "This is an interim step, but we hope they take long-term action on this."

The judge ruled that part of the 1995 court order "does reach Microsoft's controversal licensing practices in some respect" but said the ultimate question of whether Microsoft was violating the agreement "remains to be decided."

"Without the benefit of further evidence in the record, an attempt to answer that question would be premature," Jackson said.

The 1995 court order and consent decree resolved an earlier Justice Department suit accusing Microsoft of engaging in anticompetitive practices by pressuring personal computer makers to pre-install Windows programs on their PCs.

The department sued Microsoft again in October, alleging that its bundling of its browser program with Windows 95 violated the earlier agreement.

Justice officials argued that Microsoft forced computer makers that pre-install Windows 95 also to have the Internet Explorer prominently displayed on the computer's opening screen.

The government sought to show that the Windows 95 operating system and the Internet Explorer were conceived as separate products.

But Microsoft said Internet Explorer represented an evolution of its operating system and that the 1995 court agreement gave it leeway to incorporate new features in Windows.

Jackson said the possibility of Microsoft reinforcing its Windows 95 monopoly while also monopolizing the Internet browser market "is simply too great to tolerate indefinitely until the issues are finally resolved."

In denying the Justice Department's request for civil fines, Jackson wrote that he couldn't find 'clear and convincing evidence that Microsoft violated a clear and unambiguous prohibition in the earlier court order.

He said Microsoft had offered a plausible interpretation of the 1995 court order and whether it allowed it to sell the browser program with Windows.

Analysts said the judge's decision could be read several ways.

"The judge did not throw Justice's case out the door. Nor did he rule with Justice and say, 'Microsoft, you're bad,'" said Jim Balderston, analyst at Zona Research in Redwood City, Calif.

"He just said 'Stop, and I'm going to review it further.'"

"We think it would be dangerous to make a prediction on how the judge is going to rule based on what the judge has done today," Balderston said. The suit is complex because of the technological questions involved and the extensive filings by both sides, he added.

Defense fails to explain key evidence

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Terry Nichols' defense rested in the Oklahoma City bombing trial Thursday without explaining some of the key pieces of evidence against him, including a receipt for a ton of explosive fertilizer in Nichols' kitchen drawer and a letter to Timothy McVeigh, telling him to "go for it."

Nichols never took the stand, and even his final witness, his wife, Marife, was unable to provide an alibi for him on the critical day before the blast when prosecutors say he helped McVeigh build the bomb.

"Prosecutors are going to sleep better tonight than the defense," said Andrew Cohen, a Denver and analyst for both bombing trials. "I think the end of the defense case was a disaster."

Closing arguments are scheduled for Monday, and the case could go to the jury that after.

Nichols faces the death penalty if convicted in the April 19, 1995, bombing that killed 168 people, the deadliest act of terrorism on U.S. soil.

When he huddled with his attorneys later in the day outside the presence of the jury, Nichols appeared agitated, standing, jabbing his finger in his chest and gesturing to documents on the table. Defense attorney Reidureiter patted him on the back. Nichols finally nodded and sat down.

Lead defense attorney Michael Tigar had promised jurors in his opening statement he would explain where Nichols was on the day before the bombing. Prosecutors contend he and McVeigh built the bomb that day at a lake near Nichols' Herington, Kan., home.

Marife Nichols, a 24-year-old mail-order bride from the Phillipines, said she woke up that morning and Nichols wasn't there.

She said when he finally showed up at 1 p.m., he told her he had been at a gun show.

Two prosecution witnesses had testified that they saw a Ryder truck at the lake on the morning before the bombing. Other prosecution witnesses said they were at the gun show and Nichols wasn't there.

But Tigar called a dozen witnesses for the defense who said they saw a similar Ryder truck at the lake as much as a week before prosecutors said it was there.

"One of the most efficient things Tigar has done is dilute the government's case," Cohen said. "The jurors will have to either lump these reports together or throw them all out."

For example, prosecutors showed jurors two 55-gallon barrels from Nichols' home similar to plastic fragments found at the bombing scene; Tigar produced three barrels from recyclers of similar construction and showed they were not unique.

In other areas, though, the defense came up short.

It had no explanation for guns stored in Nichols' home that prosecutors say were stolen from an Arkansas collector to help finance the bombing.

Nichols also had no explanation for a receipt with McVeigh's fingerprint for a ton of fertilizer that was wrapped around two $50 gold coins, tucked behind tea towels in his kitchen drawer. Marife Nichols testified Thursday that McVeigh had never visited their home.

Nichols also didn't explain a letter he wrote to McVeigh that his ex-wife, Lana Padilla, found among his belongings five months before the bombing. In it, Nichols wrote two cryptic phrases: "You're on your own," and "Go for it."

Prosecutors say Nichols worked with McVeigh for months on the bombing preparations, a plan hatched in retaliation for a government raid on the Branch Davidian compound near Waco, Texas.

During McVeigh's trial, prosecutors called 137 witnesses in 18 days, and the defense rested after 25 witnesses testified in 3 1/2 days. During Nichols' trial, prosecutors called 98 witnesses in 20 days.

Lana Padilla had testified for the prosecution that she found a black ski mask in a storage unit Nichols had rented. Prosecutors say Nichols wore the mask when he stole the guns.

Lana Padilla said Nichols told her he used the mask to scare his new wife as part of a practical joke, but Marife Nichols testified Thursday that she had never seen it.

After a brief rebuttal in which witnesses tried to counter sightings of other Ryder trucks at the lake, the prosecution rested. Victims patted lead prosecutor Larry Mackey on the back as he left the courtroom, telling him, "Good job." Other victims hugged each other in the aisle.

"We're just thankful it's over with. This has been a real ordeal for all of us," said prosecutor Patrick Ryan.

Commerce Bank institutes 75-cent check-cashing fee

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

A 75-cent check-cashing fee went into effect Jan. 1 for all non-customers of Commerce Bank who use the service at the bank's counter in the K-State Student Union.

The fee was created to offset expenses incurred by Commerce, which has served the Union since July 1997. Commerce officials and Union Governing Board members agreed the 75-cent fee would better serve both entities.

"We were looking for a happy medium with Commerce and still trying to acknowledge the fee hitting students," UGB President Patrick Carney said.

Ted Haggart, Commerce Bank president, said check cashing for non-customers involves several expenses and risks. The cost of staff supervision, return check collection and check processing and clearing must all be paid by the bank.

Haggart said the bank also risks taking a loss on checks that cannot be covered because of insufficient funds.

"It didn't make sense to cash checks at no fee and incur a loss for an unlimited basis," he said.

Union Assistant Director Jack Thoman said the Union had previously cashed checks at no cost, taking the losses and absorbing the fee through its funds. With the arrival of Commerce, the Union no longer had to find employees to perform this service.

Thoman said he had spent much of his time overseeing the check-cashing counter.

"I had 10 percent of my salary going to support check cashing," Thoman said.

Commerce's takeover of the check-cashing operation decreases expenses for the Union, allowing it to use the money on other resources. Thoman said the money saved will help the Union lower its deficit.

Haggart said the goal of the fee is not to make a profit, and 75 cents is about the average cost of cashing a check.

UGB had initially agreed to a 50-cent fee last fall, but it was ultimately determined that adding an extra quarter would better cover the bank's expenses.

"Seventy-five cents is what they understood as our cost," Haggart said. "We really needed that amount simply to break even."

The bank will continue cashing personal and two-party checks up to $50 per check. Students and employees who have a Wildcat Account or any other account with Commerce will be exempt from paying the fee.

"I believe Commerce is providing the same service, and in some respects, a better service," Carney said.

"They can provide more services than we could with a check-cashing window."

The anticipation that more students would open accounts at Commerce also played a small role in the decision to create a fee. Haggart said there is an incentive to open new accounts to avoid the check-cashing fee.

Carney said it's a possibility the fee could be changed. During its last meeting this spring, UGB will analyze expenses from the bank to determine whether a 75-cent fee is still warranted.

"If their numbers are high, we have to entertain the possibility of a check-cashing fee going even higher," Carney said.

The information counter in the Union provides free check cashing of up to $20 per check when the Commerce window is closed. Thoman said ATM use has increased while check cashing has declined.

"There are ways around the check fee," Carney said. "It's just a matter of whether students want to take these options."

75 CENTS WORTH OF CHANGE

Students who wish to cash checks at the Commerce Bank counter in the K-State Student Union will now pay a fee that didn't exist when they left for the winter break.

That is, if they don't have an account with Commerce Bank.

Non-Commerce customers must now pay a 75-cent fee for every check they cash at the counter.

The bank will still cash personal and two-party checks up to $50, but only Commerce account holders are exempt from the new fee.

The information counter will cash checks up to $20 for free, but only when the Commerce Bank window is closed.

Legislature creates 2 select committees on higher education

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Two new select legislative committees were created on Wednesday, one that deals directly with higher education.

House Speaker Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, and House Minority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, announced the creation of the Select Committee on Higher Education and the Frontier 2000 Committee. A select, or special, committee lasts one year and is created at the speaker's discretion.

The higher education committee will focus on restructuring the governance of the post-secondary education system. Its creation was in response to Shallenburger's dissatisfaction with a proposal by the interim Committee on Community College Governance, which recommended no significant changes to the state's governance of its community colleges this past summer.

In a press release on Wednesday, Shallenburger said, "A lack of action by previous legislatures and the lack of a statewide plan has hampered the ability of our colleges, universities and students to advance. Kansans are demanding a higher education system that will adapt to the changing needs of the global marketplace."

The goals of the committee include reviewing the use of technology in higher education, determining if other revenue sources besides property taxes could be used for funding, examining the goals and missions of Kansas institutions and reviewing studies of post-secondary education funding.

John Potter, executive assistant to Shallenburger, said the committee will try to find a solution to various problems facing higher education.

"We're looking 10 years down the road and looking for what's going to work," Potter said.

The committee will make an initial report by the 30th day of the 1998 session and issue a final report this term.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she wishes the committee well, but she does have reservations.

"I'm not certain I have a great deal of confidence in who they selected as chair," Oleen said.

Of the bill that is now in the legislature from this past summer's Committee on Community College Governance, Oleen said she is not hearing much support for passage of that committee's proposal.

The Frontier 2000 committee will focus on Kansas issues in the new millennium and long-term planning in the Kansas House of Representatives.

K-State fall break could become reality

Good idea?
The Collegian editorial board gives its take on the proposed fall break. See Page 4.

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

The idea of a fall break from classes might become reality if it meets with approval from faculty and the Kansas Board of Regents.

A proposal to create a university holiday was passed by Student Senate on Dec. 11, which would give students a two-day break in mid-October, creating a four-day weekend.

Registrar Don Foster said the College of Veterinary Medicine has had a fall break for several years, and the rest of the university could also benefit from a break to interrupt the 12-week period between Labor Day and Thanksgiving break.

"It would give students a four-day weekend to get their perspectives back and recharge for the remainder of the semester," he said.

Rhett Trujillo, chairman of the Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee, said the proposal is far from final. The resolution must now be passed by the faculty Academic Affairs Committee and faculty Executive Board before making the Faculty Senate agenda.

Ultimately, it must be approved by the regents before taking effect.

The creation of a university reading day was also part of the Student Senate resolution. The reading day would be a day of no classes on the Friday before final exam week during each semester. Trujillo said it would allow students more study time before taking exams.

"Learning material right up before a test, it is often difficult to absorb that material, then turn around and take the test," Trujillo said.

The fall semester now consists of 76 days. The addition of three vacation days to K-State's calendar would leave 73 class days, two short of the 75-day minimum set by the regents.

One possible way to accommodate the calendar change would be to begin school two days earlier in the fall. That would accommodate the fall break and reading day, bringing the total to 75 days.

Trujillo said there are only two Big 12 schools other than K-State that do not have either a reading day or a fall break. The reading day would also provide students with the opportunity to talk with their teachers without having conflicts with other assignments, as the university and its facilities would remain open, Trujillo said.

But Foster said the reading day, which would create a three-day weekend before finals week, might not be as attractive as the fall break proposal.

Faculty Senate will decide the fate of the resolution in about two months, when they are presented with a final draft of the proposal.

"Your first reaction is that it would be nice to have a break to break up the long stretch," Faculty Senate President James Legg said. "The devil's in the details, and I haven't seen any details yet."

Trujillo said the earliest he can conceive the idea taking effect would be for the 1999-2000 school year, pending approval by the organizations examining the proposal.

"I don't see very many problems at all," Trujillo said. "In the end, it would be a positive thing for everybody."

University of Kansas also examining benefits, drawbacks of October break

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

A proposal being studied at the University of Kansas would allow students a fall break, a plan similar to the resolution passed by K-State's Student Senate.

The KU plan would give students a two-day break in mid-October. The proposal must now be approved by Calendar Committee members, said Sandy Wick, assistant director of the honors program at KU.

"It would give us all space to breathe and rest a little bit," she said.

Beginning school earlier in the fall is a possibility to accommodate for the days taken off for fall break, Wick said. Elimination of KU's stop day has also been discussed, but with the tradition the university has with stop day each semester, Wick said it might be difficult to see the day dropped.

Stop day allows students time to study before taking exams, and gives faculty the opportunity to have meetings and prepare for finals. Wick said tradition might be the only reason the day is not eliminated.

KU's final exam schedule differs from K-State's. Instead of a week, beginning on a Monday, for final exams, KU students begin finals at varying points of the week, depending on the year.

Wick said when finals begin mid-week, stop day provides a needed break. But when the exam period starts on a Monday, as at K-State, the stop day doesn't seem necessary.

"When stop day falls on a Monday or Friday, what's the point?" she said. "You get used to it. It's kind of a psychological thing."

Carol Holstead, chairwoman of the Calendar Committee at KU, said students and faculty are more stressed in the fall and would benefit from a break. She said the fall break would not be looked at in the same way as spring break.

"For spring break I see Padre Island, and for fall break I see, 'Wow, now I can get a start on my term paper,'" she said.

The KU proposal must still be approved by several campus organizations, and could take effect by the 1999-2000 school year. The Kansas Board of Regents must approve the proposal before the fall break can be implemented.

DAILYPLANNER

The Daily Planner is the Collegian's campus bulletin board service. Items in the planner can be published up to three times. Items might not appear because of space constraints but are guaranteed to appear on the day of the activity. To place an item, stop by Kedzie 116 and fill out a form or e-mail it to collegn@ksu.edu by 11 a.m. two days before it is to run.

- Hale Library will be host to Charles Bonwell, an author and professor of history, who will present a University Teaching Scholar's Chair Workshop on Active Learning at 8:30 this morning in the Hemisphere Room, on the fifth floor of the library.
- The K-State Singers will perform a free concert with the Adelaide Connection Vocal Jazz Choir, an Australian singing group, at 8 tonight in All Faiths Chapel.
- Sigma Gamma Rho sorority will meet at 3:30 p.m. Saturday in the Union Council Chambers for an informational tea. Casual dress is encouraged.
- Lutheran Campus Ministry Worship will meet at 7:15 p.m. Sunday in Danforth Chapel.
- Career and Employment Services will present an orientation for World Wide Web résumé registration at 7 p.m. Tuesday in Paslay Lecture Hall, Durland 173.
- Volunteers are needed for K-State's Conversational English Program. Help an international student speak English and learn firsthand about a different culture. If interested, contact Alan Aubert at the International Student Center, 532-6448 or by e-mail, aaubert@ksu.edu.

Harassment case against President likely to proceed, Clinton says

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton said Tuesday that it is "probably" inevitable he will stand trial for sexual harassment in the lawsuit filed by Paula Jones.

Clinton is scheduled to give a sworn deposition in the case on Saturday at the downtown Washington offices of his attorney, Bob Bennett, a source close to the case said Tuesday.

In an Oval Office interview, Clinton was asked by U.S. News & World Report whether it seemed inevitable that the lawsuit would go to trial on May 27, when jury selection is set to begin.

"Probably," Clinton replied with what reporters described as a resigned smile and slow shake of his head.

"You know, I let my other people talk for me on that because I just try to put it over in a little box and go on and do my work."

Clinton rarely speaks publicly of the case and has been known to bark at reporters who question him about it. With Jones' settlement demands reaching $2 million and $3 million, negotiations for an out-of-court resolution have stalemated and proceedings move beyond the evidence-gathering phase on Jan. 30.

Since the lawsuit was filed in May 1994, Clinton aides and attorneys have charged that Jones' accusations were fabricated and backed by the president's political enemies.

New position created to benefit readers

A recent study showed 94 percent of the student body at K-State reads the Collegian, and, having worked on the editorial side of the paper, I know 94 percent of those readers have something to say about it.

Good.

What you have to say helps the Collegian improve, grow and truly become the campus's paper. We want to hear from you. If we are to get better, we have to hear from you. That's where I come in.

This semester I am taking up a new position at the Collegian as the readers' representative. Fancy words for a guy who gets paid to listen, I know, but when it's one of your few skills, I guess you just have to go with it.

I'll be meeting with the editors on a regular basis and telling them what you, the readers, have to say about how they are doing. And yes, I can be obnoxiously stubborn and they will be forced to listen.

In the next few months, I will be meeting with various groups on campus, taking surveys and asking you what you want from your paper.

Was our coverage fair?

Are you having trouble getting a paper in the morning?

Are the sports polls easy to read?

Are you doing something exciting you want us to know about?

We do care, but in a sea of a dozen editors, a handful of designers, several photographers and a plethora of writers all walking in a different direction (some of us backward and on our hands), it seems like one voice can get lost a bit too quickly. Luckily, I can be loud enough for everyone. (I'm getting a bull horn and everything.)

But it can't work without your help. In past years, people have called timidly and have been thrown around the newsroom until we can find the right person for them to talk to about a problem.

Sometimes it's hard enough to find someone to talk to people — and it makes us wonder how many others out there just didn't feel like speaking up.

The editors need the perspective of the readers to make sure that when mistakes happen, they can at least prevent it from happening again. Is that misplaced photo caption the fault of the photographer, reporter, editor, designer or copy editor? We don't always know right away.

My job is to listen to what all our readers have to say about the Collegian, the bad and the good. I'll know the appropriate person to relay the message to later. E-mail me, fax me, call me, stop me in class and tell me whether the crossword puzzle was too hard or too easy.

I've got time to listen. I'll do the footwork for you, so you can get on with your day.

That includes more than just individuals. Campus organizations are a significant component of this university and have something to say, so I will always be available to groups. My evenings tend to be freer than I'd like, but that means I can always make myself available to meet with your organization.

I'm willing to listen to all your complaints and compliments and I can help answer any questions you have. I have made a home out of Student Publications Inc. for four years now. I've heard most of the questions and can most likely answer them.

But first, you have to ask.

This isn't just the Collegian employees' paper. They can get the news themselves. Make your money count and make sure you are getting everything you want out of your newspaper. If you're not happy, let them know by letting me know. (Insert cliche of choice here, but we really do want to know.)

Commission approves Anderson expansion despite complaints

MATT KREPS
Kansas State Collegian

Even after five hours of mostly negative commentary by citizens, the Manhattan City Commission voted 4-1 on Dec. 16 to go ahead with the Anderson Avenue expansion project.

The project, which widens Anderson Avenue from 16th Street to Sunset Avenue, adds a left-turn lane to the stretch of roadway and also includes coordinated traffic signals, which will move vehicles through the area in groups, minimizing stops at red lights.

Storm drainage improvements will also be made as part of the project.

Construction should begin in early 1999. City Engineer Jack Messer said he expects disruptions in traffic flow for most of the year. However, the finished project is intended to make Anderson Avenue safer for pedestrians and able to handle larger traffic loads, he said.

"It's just a problem that has to be addressed, and we had to do something about it," City Commissioner Roger Reitz said.

Messer said the designs will be modified to remove the right-turn lane proposed south of Memorial Stadium, decreasing the plans from six lanes to five in that area.

Plans called "office checks" will be sent to the Kansas Department of Transportation for review, Messer said. After KDOT reviews the plans, any small changes suggested by KDOT or other sources will be made and the city will plan for construction.

"Essentially, the design team has been instructed by the City Commission to proceed with the plans and we are doing that," Messer said.

Messer said construction could stretch between February 1999 and November 1999.

"The construction on this project is such that it essentially takes an entire construction season," he said.

In the vote, Commissioner Karen McCulloh was the lone vote against the project.

McCulloh said her vote was not against the idea of expanding Anderson Avenue, she just had reservations about this particular plan.

"I'm concerned that this is not the real solution to the problem," she said.

McCulloh also said she did not like the fact that after five hours of input by the citizens, the commission voted to go ahead with the project with only a few small alterations.

McCulloh said she has reservations about the sewer alterations.

The construction plans call for widening the sewer lines under the street along the expanded area. However, the sewers will narrow once again at Anderson Avenue and 16th Street. McCulloh was concerned this could cause flooding in residential areas.

"That looks to me like that could be a plan that has some problems," she said.

She would like to look into widening the sewer lines farther so an overflow would occur in the City Park area away from private homes.

Commissioner Ed Klimek said the decision was difficult, but he thinks the project is in the best interest of the city.

"The main reason I voted for it is the improvements are needed," he said.

Klimek said traffic and safety issues make the project a priority. In 1994 and 1995, there were 86 accidents in the three intersections involved in the widening, he said. A majority of them were considered preventable according to city statistics.

Opponents of expansion project say Anderson process was flawed

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan City Commission's Dec. 16 approval of the Anderson Avenue expansion project ended several community members' public outcry against the plan.

But it didn't end their opposition to the project and to the system that created it.

John Exdell, philosophy professor and Anderson-area resident involved in the movement against expansion, said he felt the issue had been decided before it reached the City Commission — and before citizens had a chance to speak out.

"I think it was basically a done deal. The public was not really given a chance to shape the project as it should have been or a chance to have influence over its outcome," he said.

Dave MacFarland, another resident who spearheaded the drive against the plan and a radio and television professor, agreed. In a speech to commissioners during their Jan. 6 meeting, MacFarland criticized the process that led to the expansion's approval.

Not only was public input lacking during the first months of the project's development, MacFarland said, but the project received no review from the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board. Because the idea for expansion stemmed from city-employed engineers and not outside entities, members of the board didn't have to examine the Anderson proposal or take public comment on it, he said.

When the project finally came before the commission last month, MacFarland said commissioners were unlikely to reject a plan drawn up by their own staff members.

"The commission depends on city staff to get information and to have information upon which it can make decisions," he said. "The commission then is reluctant to slap the hand of city staff or to do anything that is going to get the city staff upset at the commission, because the commission needs city staff to help them do their job.

"And so when city staff puts something forward, the tendency of the commission is to say, 'Well, yeah, in the absence of any glaring problems here, we ought to take the city staff's advice.'" MacFarland said.

Exdell said the Anderson Avenue Steering Committee, which developed the project in its initial stages, was a significant source of concern. Members of the committee included four K-State staff members, city staff members, Mayor Bruce Snead and a handful of neighborhood representatives.

One of those representatives, Tim Lindemuth, is Director of Publications for the KSU Alumni Association, which plans to build its new headquarters along the newly widened Anderson Avenue.

Exdell said the committee's membership left little room for public input.

"The steering committee was not representative of the interested public," he said. "The university's interests dominated this project from the beginning ... and when the plans were finally announced, there was only an opportunity for public comment, not really public involvement in the shaping of the project."

Bill Muir, assistant to the vice president for institutional advancement and a member of the steering committee, said

University would benefit greatly from fall break

A mid-semester break is needed to interrupt the monotonous 12-week fall stretch that begins at fee payment and ends mere days before the Thanksgiving holiday.

The short return after Thanksgiving offers a stop-and-go schedule during which students rest for less than a week before they return and immediately begin hitting the big projects and finals.

A two-day break in mid-October would create a four-day weekend and offer students a chance to regroup, visit family and catch up on assignments before Thanksgiving hits.

Although peer pressure is an arbitrary consideration, students from nine other Big 12 schools are already enjoying the fall reprieve.

The Kansas Board of Regents, as well as the K-State administration, should evaluate the advantages this break would offer to weary students and occasionally overworked staff and faculty. The College of Veterinary Medicine, which boasts of stringent academic requirements, understood potential student fatigue and instituted a fall break several years ago.

The trade-off is returning to classes two days early to ensure the required 75-day semester minimum established by the regents. Although shaving a couple days off the historically long summer break won't be missed by the majority, other issues should be considered by university planners. Planners should strive to coincide the start of classes with local public schools to accommodate students with children.

A footnote in this debate is the suggestion of a "reading day" without activities, assignments or meetings before finals week. The argument is solid, especially because even high schools understand the advantages of a "day off" before exams.

K-State has already structured a Monday through Friday finals week schedule that allows for a weekend off beforehand. An established policy mandating time to review without big projects and tests the week before finals is more helpful than a third day off. The fall break is the one worth fighting for.

The Collegian editorial board represents the prevailing opinion of editors and at-large campus community members choosing to participate in the discussion and debate of issues. During a regular academic week, the editorial board meets Sunday at 3:30 p.m. and Monday through Thursday at 5:30 p.m. Stop by the Collegian newsroom, Kedzie 116, if you're interested in joining the editorial board or submitting letters to the editor or guest columns.

I am brand spanking new to this page — both as an opinion editor and periodical columnist. As a long-time Collegian reader, though, I understood the significance of locating intelligent, interesting and funny columnists. I found 11. The overwhelming majority are new to this page. Reading fresh columnists might feel like being on a blind date at first, so here's some vital statistics to hook you in:

• Lisa Dethloff is a senior in political science from Burr Oak, Kan. An arts and sciences student senator, Dethloff said the Student Governing Association is her life. She's an employee at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and calls herself the biggest Batman fan in the world.

• David Fairbanks is a senior in electronic journalism from Goodland, Kan., home of America's first helicopter, and an out-of-house Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity member. Although a former Collegian city commission beat reporter and city editor, Fairbanks said he always wanted to write columns. As a young man, he was an extra in Paul Newman's movie "Mr. and Mrs. Bridge."

• Russell Fortmeyer is a fifth-year senior in architectural engineering from El Dorado, Kan. A former student senator, Fortmeyer worked for Ove Arup, a British engineering firm, during the summer and winter. He is a devoted fan of blaxploitation and has a crush on Pam Grier. This is his sixth semester as a columnist.

• A queen of attending Newton High School proms, Brandi Hertig is a junior in print journalism and English/creative writing. She is active in the Manhattan Mennonite Church's bible study and considers herself a Super Dillons super employee. This is her fourth semester as a columnist.

• Scott Hopper is a junior in psychology. He attended high school in Frankfurt, Germany, although his family now calls Leavenworth, Kan., home. A former varsity cheerleader for the Wildcats, he has been a reserve military police officer at Fort Riley and works for the K-State Police.

• Pamela Manning is a senior in radio and television from Lenexa, Kan. An honorary member of the "adult students who have stayed in college too long" club, Manning is a production assistant Dole Hall. She has worked as an on-air personality in Kansas City for several years and continues to commute there on weekends.

• Santos Ramirez is a senior in criminal justice and women's studies from Kansas City, Mo. A resident of Jardine Terrace Apartments, Ramirez is an active member of Hispanic Awareness Leadership Organization. He also works for New Student Services giving campus tours.

• Paul Robben is a senior in chemistry and biochemistry from McPherson, Kan. A Goldwater Scholar and member of Mortar Board, Robben was a leader for the Enhanced University Program through the Academic Assistance Center. He spent this summer making asphalt as an intern for Koch Materials Co. in Wichita.

• Although a long-time contributor of Collegian letters to the editor, Jason Rucker is a new face on Page 4. A senior in animal science from Peabody, Kan., Rucker is a member of Sunset Zoological Park's chimpanzee organization and works at the K-State veterinary medicine diagnostic/necropsy lab. He said he's proud to have competed on K-State's poultry judging team.

• Sam Sackett is a sophomore in public relations from Fort Scott, Kan., who free-lances as a Collegian photographer. On the staff of Station Cafe, he is also a Christian Challenge member and has worked for the City of Fort Scott. Sackett said he can triple-curl his tongue and considers himself a Rush Limbaugh ditto-head.

• Ken Wells is a perpetual senior from Caribou, Maine, studying computer science. A third-semester columnist, Wells has earned degrees in English and theater. Acting in part to further his bovine obsession/addiction, Wells boasts that a play he wrote was performed and turned a profit without producing a single casualty. He has also designed audio for theater shows since 1995.

America: the land of the free?

MARNEY BURKE/Collegian

You can drink beer, possess up to three grams of hash intended for personal use, and sunbathe nude in the park. You can get a part-time job at 14 and use the money to travel Europe on the train. No city curfews, no speed limits and plenty of options. Europe is freedom.

Three thousand miles away, however, America prides itself on its own freedoms, such as freedom to vote and freedom of speech. What the Constitution failed to mention was that these are not total freedoms. America is conservative.

Over the years, the government has subtly imposed laws to govern and restrict our "freedoms."

America is not the icon of international freedom some might think it is. America, with its new socialist attitude, uses blanket laws to correct the wrongs of a few. Control has become the key element in today's government. The government will decide what is good for the population — not the individual. Europe's liberalism is immediately evident in its degree of censoring mass communication. It is less severe than America's.

Europeans don't hide their bodies or censor their children. They recognize beauty and share it with others. Europeans are not necessarily more promiscuous because of this, but more mature. Daily newspapers, magazines, advertisements and billboards all contain pictures America would consider inappropriate. Television is bombarded with nudity that has become such common practice, it is seldom shocking.

When we censor our population in America, we teach them that the body is "dirty." This is absolutely not true. The body is a beautiful creation Europeans have been able to appreciate successfully. When America gets past its Amish attitude, then it will have matured. In Europe you have the option to sunbathe nude. In America you would be arrested. Is this freedom?

In America, because of the higher legal drinking age, a subculture devoted to false identification and illegal drinking was created. Alcohol is now more taboo. Prohibition didn't work in the 1920s and this version doesn't work now. Raising the drinking age doesn't hinder the willing, it promotes criminal activity.

VIEWPOINT

SCOTT HOPPER

Scott is a junior in psychology. You can send e-mail to Scott at hoppa@ksu.edu

Instead, individuals need to be taught how to respect alcohol. At 21, people are thrown into a world they know little about. America has created a generation of binge-drinking alcoholics. It's no wonder Germany has a smaller proportion of alcoholics. Europeans have learned to respect alcohol at an early age.

A few more controversial European practices include drugs and prostitution. The theory behind legal regulation is that people are going to behave on their own.

By controlling and taxing drugs and prostitutes, the government can make the best of a bad situation. Drugs are safer, and prostitutes are cleaner in Europe. Although users and frequenters are placing themselves in harm's way, they have the choice legally. They are experiencing freedom.

Freedom means being able to choose your own path. Somewhere in America's little more than 200 years, we lost sight of that concept. I want the option to allow my children to taste beer without being prosecuted. I want to sunbathe nude if I choose. I want a choice, and I don't want to have to live in Europe to realize it. This is the land of the free and at sometime, we lost the concept of real freedom.

Manhattan used to be that damn town I had to live in. Newton was home. But things changed. Now Manhattan is the place where we all experience a good deal of emotion and the fondness I have developed for this place makes it

IMPOSSIBLE TO GO HOME

Perhaps you'll agree with me when I say you really can't go home again.

Truth be known, I never really understood the meaning of that annoyingly Garrison Keillor-esque saying until this winter break.

Initially, I found myself giddy with the idea of having free use of a washer and dryer, not to mention food I didn't have to purchase. And cable — glorious Multimedia Cablevision.

I'm not sure when the facade crumbled. Maybe it was when my mom ate the last of the frozen waffles. Or maybe it was when I had to take our dog Louisa to the vet because she had poop stuck to her butt.

Whatever it was, it was just the beginning of what proved to be a most decidedly uncomfortable break.

Newton, Kan., is a relatively small town — a town that likes to revel in the idea that it's better than the other Mennonite towns in Harvey County. (That's my theory, anyway.) This was the perfect environment to have many strained let's-catch-up-in-the-middle-of-this-crowded-store conversations with people who never would have talked to me when I actually lived in Newton.

It's not so much that I don't like talking to people — I'm just never sure what to say. I probably look normal on the outside during one of these special moments, but I'm usually all sorts of sweaty, trying to figure out something clever, or at the very least, something without being crass, to say to this person. After all, I hadn't seen most of these people in a long time — what wacky event from the past two years was I supposed to highlight?

My job at Newton's paper, The Newton Kansan, put me in that situation more times than I can count. For some reason, I had to cover every story that required traveling to Newton High School, which was a veritable petri dish of sweaty situations. And when I called people to interview them, I felt dumb saying "Hi, this is Brandi Hertig at The Newton Kansan," because chances were very good they already knew who I was.

But it's also more than that. I guess it really occurred to me that Newton has been going on with its own business ever since I moved away, and now I'm not really a part of it anymore.

And I kept referring to Manhattan as home. I missed people here. So much, infact, I made an ass out of myself staring at some guy at the recreation center who looked vaguely like one of last semester's columnists. I searched the crowd at the Fiesta Bowl on television looking for someone I knew. (I didn't realize it took so many Collegian photographers to shoot a football game.) It wasn't just specific people I missed. I missed the familiarity of this place.

SCOTT ANDERSON/Collegian

Newton used to be familiar like that to me, and Manhattan was that damn town I had to live in.

There are all sorts of goofy sayings — most probably from Zig Ziglar — that can be used to explain this phenomenon. Stuff like "Home is where the heart is," etc. Stuff your grandma wears printed on pink sweatshirts. But I'd rather come up with an explanation of my own.

During one conversation in Newton with a former English teacher, he told me that the friends you make in college end up being more important to you than ones from high school. If that's true, then perhaps the same goes for the town you go to college in. This is the place where we experience a good deal of emotions — stress, happiness, hangovers, etc.

Like it or not, Manhattan is the place where we really grow up.

Memorial service to be scheduled for student

▶ NICHOLAS STEICHEN DIES IN WRECK ON TRIP BACK FROM BOWL GAME.

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Nicholas Allen Steichen was considered a best friend by many, his father said.

"Nick's life was a life based on friendship," John Steichen said. "His life was completed at 23, I guess. And God took him home."

The younger Steichen died in a car wreck on the way home Jan. 1, the night after he saw K-State win the Fiesta Bowl.

STEICHEN

A memorial service will be at Creighton University on Friday. Nick Steichen's brother Steven Steichen said. Steichen was a graduate student at Creighton. Kaye Ness, who knew Steichen at K-State, said a service at K-State is still being planned.

In the car with him were Tim Stevenson, 23, K-State senior in agricultural economics, and Stevenson's cousin, Kyle Brooks, 21. The three were riding in a 1994 two-door Ford Taurus owned by Stevenson's fiancee's grandmother. Steichen was driving, Stevenson was in the front seat and Brooks was in the back.

Sgt. Dan Day of the New Mexico State Police said the car failed to turn on a bend of Interstate 25 and crashed into the guardrail at 11:17 p.m. about 35 miles south of the Colorado-New Mexico state line.

Evidence suggested that Steichen had fallen asleep at the wheel. He was pronounced dead at the scene at 1:15 a.m., Jan. 2.

Brooks and Stevenson were taken to Miners' Colfax Medical Center in Raton, N.M. Stevenson was released with minor physical injury, but Brooks had to be taken to Community Memorial Healthcare in Marysville, Kan., near Blue Rapids, where his parents live.

Brooks was released Thursday with several broken bones, a concussion and short-term memory loss. He said he has trouble remembering the accident, and will probably take a semester off from school at K-State-Salina, where he has studied piloting.

Janice Brooks, Kyle Brooks' mother, said she's more worried about Stevenson and Steichen's family.

"We're just so lucky (Kyle) made it through," she said. "My heart goes out to Nick's family."

Joy Hubele, Tim Stevenson's fiancee, said she is still trying to deal with his best friend's death.

Sherrill Livergood, Stevenson's mother, said she worries for her son. Steichen was to be Stevenson's best man for his wedding this summer.

"People don't realize how deeply Tim did love Nick," she said. "They were true friends. It was special."

Nick Steichen graduated in spring 1997 from K-State, summa cum laude with a degree in kinesiology. He was past president of the Kinesiology Student Association and was the recipient of the Eva Lyman Award, the largest scholarship offered by the department.

He had moved to Omaha, Neb., after graduation to attend Creighton University's doctoral program in physical therapy.

"You could tell by his grades he was a student," John Steichen said.

Nick Steichen was born April 25, 1974, in Salina to John and Mary Sauber Steichen. He graduated in 1992 from Marysville High School, where he played football, basketball and played saxophone in the band. His father said people called him "Picky Nicky" for his perfectionism.

He loved sports, John Steichen said, but had to work at it.

"He wanted to play sports so bad," he said. "He came home one day and said, 'Dad, I want a Soloflex.' I told him, 'You're old enough, you could get a job and pay for it.'"

Not long after, Nick Steichen started working at the Pizza Hut, and stayed there all through high school. He split the price of the Soloflex with his dad and would continue working out and watching his diet through college.

At K-State, he got a job at Raoul's Escondido, waiting tables and bartending, and stayed there three years, working long hours to pay his way through school. Mary Martinez, owner of Raoul's, said regular customers would come in just because of Nick, who cracked jokes in the style of Jim Carrey and livened up the room.

Jeff Reihs, Steichen's supervisor, said he worked 20 or more hours a week and would go the extra mile for all customers, not just the tables assigned to him. The customers and staff called him "Nick at Night," and most probably never knew his last name, he said.

"He'd take the busy nights — Friday, Saturday, Sunday," Reihs said. "It was almost always smiles for him."

Kaye Ness, who was vice president of Kinesiology Student Association with Steichen, said his sense of humor was well-known among kinesiology students.

"He was very, very, very funny," she said.

"You couldn't be around him without laughing, that's for sure."

Steichen's funeral was well attended, Martinez said. The services were Jan. 6 at St. John the Evangelist Catholic Church, in Lawrence, where the Steichens live. He was buried at Mount Calvary Cemetery.

Friends, family and classmates from K-State and Creighton all shared stories with employees of Raoul's, past and present, and managers from the Marysville Pizza Hut. She said she feels for Steichen's family, but is impressed by how well they're handling themselves.

"He was going to do so much," she said. "Their faith helped them through this."

TODAY'S WILDCAT BIRTHDAYS

Football offensive tackle Ryan Cummings turns 20
Track team member Zach Davies turned 22 Wednesday

ROUND-UP

NBA

Hawks 108, Mavericks 82

ATLANTA — Steve Smith scored 29 points, and Dikembe Mutombo added 21 points and 19 rebounds as the Atlanta Hawks pounded the Dallas Mavericks 108-82 Wednesday night for their fifth-consecutive victory.

Smith, who scored 35 points in Atlanta's win over New York on Tuesday night, shot seven of nine from three-point range and was 10 of 15 overall with six assists. Michael Finley led the Mavericks with 25 points.

It was the fourth-straight loss for the Mavericks (6-31), who have lost 19 of 20 and own the third-worst record in the league.

Spurs 89, Wizards 79

WASHINGTON D.C. — Tim Duncan had 28 points and 16 rebounds, and David Robinson added 20 points and 14 rebounds as San Antonio broke its four-game losing streak to Washington.

The Spurs have won 15 of 17.

The Wizards, who lost consecutive games at the MCI Center for the first time, were led by Chris Webber with 27 points and Juwan Howard with 21. Rod Strickland had 18 points and 12 assists for his team-leading 20th double-double.

Pacers 100, Pistons 93

INDIANAPOLIS — Reggie Miller scored 25 points, including a key three-pointer with 26.4 seconds to play, as Indiana defeated Detroit despite a season-high 26 turnovers.

Indiana overcame a season-high 37 points by Grant Hill, who matched his career-high with 15 field goals and attempted a career-high 29 shots. Joe Dumars added 23 points for Detroit, one off his season-high.

Rik Smits and Mark Jackson chipped in with 16 points each and Jackson had 11 assists.

Raptors 109, Clippers 101

TORONTO — Damon Stoudamire tied his career high with 36 points to lead Toronto to its sixth victory.

Stoudamire, who scored 22 points in the first half, took 31 shots before leaving to a standing ovation with about a minute to play. He iced the victory with a pair of three-point shots in the final four minutes as the Raptors won at home for just the second time in their past 18 games.

Marcus Camby added 20 points, Doug Christie had 14 and John Wallace added 14 off the bench. Stoudamire also had 11 assists.

Lamond Murray had 23 points and 10 rebounds for the Clippers, who lost their fourth in a row and fourth straight on the road.

Bucks 101, Warriors 95

MILWAUKEE — Glenn Robinson scored 12 of his 31 points and Armon Gilliam had 10 of his 20 in the final period as Milwaukee won its third straight.

Ray Allen and Terrell Brandon added 18 points each as Milwaukee (18-19) pulled within a game of .500. The Warriors, who lost their eighth-consecutive game, were led by Donyell Marshall with 20 points and Joe Smith and Tony Delk with 19 apiece.

NCAA Top 25

No. 2 Duke 88, Wake Forest 52

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. — Shane Battier led Duke's stifling defense in an 88-52 victory over Wake Forest on Wednesday night, the Demon Deacons' worst loss in the nine-year history of Lawrence Joel Coliseum.

The Blue Devils (15-1, 5-0 Atlantic Coast Conference) won their sixth consecutive game by scoring 29 points off 20 turnovers.

Duke, which has an average winning margin of 28 points in conference play, got 15 points from Chris Carrawell, 13 from Trajan Langdon, 12 from Steve Wojciechowski and 10 apiece from Roshown McLeod and Mike Chappell. Battier wound up with four points, 10 rebounds, four steals and three assists in 20 minutes.

Tony Rutland had 15 points for the Demon Deacons (8-6, 1-3), who lost for the sixth time in eight games and are off to their worst start in the ACC in six years.

No. 3 Kansas 83, Texas A&M 65

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — Paul Pierce and Eric Chenowith led a second-half scoring surge and the Jayhawks took advantage of Texas A&M's icy second-half shooting.

Chenowith led Kansas (20-2, 4-0 Big 12) with 16 points, nine in the second half, and Pierce scored 11 of his 15 points in the second half as the Jayhawks won their fourth straight and 12th in 13.

The Aggies (6-8, 0-4) stayed close, trailing 45-37 at halftime, but the Aggies missed their final seven shots of the first half and their first eight of the second half, allowing the Jayhawks to break the game open with a 12-2 run to start the second half.

Michael Schmidt led the Aggies with 16 points.

No. 13 Iowa 61, Ohio St. 46

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Dean Oliver doubled his average with 17 points and Iowa floundered offensively but still had enough firepower for the win.

The Hawkeyes came in averaging 87 points a game, but had 21 turnovers and shot just 43 percent from the field. Iowa (14-2, 3-1 Big Ten) won for the eighth time in its past nine games. It was the Hawkeyes' eighth straight win over Ohio State — their longest winning streak in the 122-game series.

Jason Singleton scored 16 points and matched his career high with 10 rebounds for Ohio State (7-9, 0-3), which has lost six in a row.

George Washington 78, No. 18 Xavier 73, OT

WASHINGTON D.C. — Freshman Mike King made two free throws with no time remaining in regulation, then scored six of his career-high 16 points in overtime for George Washington.

King, playing only because of a second-half injury to leading scorer Yegor Mescheriakov, scored all of his points over the final 6:16 of regulation and in overtime. King forced overtime when he hit two free throws with zeros on the clock to tie the score 68-68 after he was fouled trying to put back an offensive rebound as time expired.

No. 22 Arkansas 89, Florida 84

FAYETTEVILLE, Ark. — Kareem Reid scored 18 of his 25 points in the first half and made both ends of a 1-and-1 with 24 seconds left as the Razorbacks survived an impressive Florida rally.

Reid's free throws made it 87-84 and came after Tarik Wallace stole an inbounds pass after a Florida timeout. Wallace made two free throws 13 seconds later for Arkansas (14-2, 3-0 Southeastern Conference).

Kenyan Weaks had 22 points for the Gators (8-5, 2-2), who trailed by as many as 13 points in the second half but went ahead 82-81 on Dan Williams' layup with 3:40 remaining.

Missouri 70, No. 25 Oklahoma St. 64

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Freshman Brian Grawer made seven of eight free throws over the final three minutes as the Tigers beat the Cowboys for the 26th time in 28 games at Hearnes Center.

Albert White had 16 points for Missouri (9-6, 2-2 Big 12), which didn't have a field goal over the final 5:58.

Adrian Peterson had 27 points for the Cowboys (12-2, 2-2), which has lost two of three and lost in its first game as a ranked team since the end of the 1994-95 season.

K-State entered Wednesday's game against Iowa State as losers of 3 of 4 previous games. But the Cats were back in Bramlage, where they're 9-0 this season, playing like

The Iowa State Cyclones came to Bramlage Coliseum looking for their first Big 12 Conference road win. The Cyclones left without that win, as the Wildcats shot 47 percent for the game and downed the Cyclones 77-59.

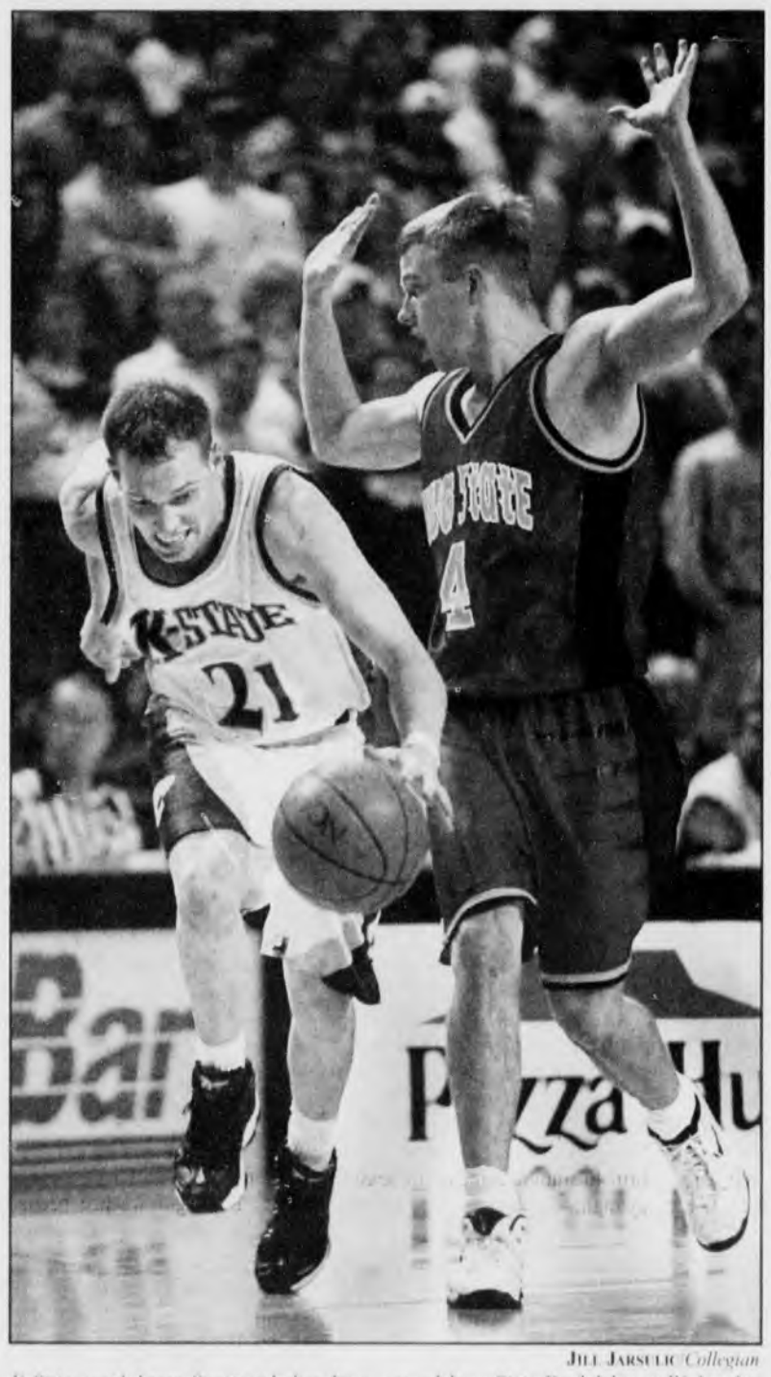
Junior forward Manny Dies, arguably the Wildcats' unofficial MVP of the game, was one rebound shy of achieving his fourth double-double this season and the sixth of his career, scoring 27 points and grabbing nine boards.

"Manny's playing very well right now, and it's a good time for him to be playing that way," Coach Tom Asbury said. "He saw a lot of opportunities against some pretty young players to make some good shots."

Asbury started senior Aaron Swartzendruber for the first time and junior Ty Sims for the fourth time this season in place of usual starters junior guard Ayome May and sophomore guard Josh Reid. The two players earned these positions during the road games during winter break, Asbury said.

"Aaron and Ty started because they both have been giving us more than Josh and Paco recently," Asbury said. "On those two road games against Baylor and Oklahoma, significantly."

Reid said he thought Sims' starting in his place was well-earned.



"I missed practice yesterday, and Ty's been playing well lately," Reid said. "Ty's a good ball player."

The lineup included junior forward Shawn Rhodes, and Dies said the three forwards make for a strong group.

"With the three of us in there, you've got three forwards in there," Dies said. "It makes us real strong inside. All three of us in the starting lineup are a good lineup."

For the first four minutes, the Cats scored on nearly every possession, making a strong 10-3 run. Dies then scored the next nine points for the Cats as the Cyclones tried to pick things up on offense. Reid came in off the bench at the 11:43 mark and nailed two three-pointers

Wildcat forward Manny Dies had a simple explanation for his offensive explosion in the 77-59 win over Iowa State.

"I came out and played hard," Dies said. "When you play hard like that, that's what happens."

Dies scored a career-high 27 points while also securing nine rebounds, two steals and blocking four shots. He added seven of nine free throws to his list of accomplishments.

K-State coach Tom Asbury expanded on Dies explanation, citing the technical reasons for Dies' monster offensive production.

"They front the post and put a lot of pressure on the passer," Asbury said. "But if you can get a nice pinpointed pass, you're going to score."

Dies was on the receiving end of many of the pinpointed passes from the perimeter. He poured in 17 points, grabbed eight rebounds and blocked three shots in the first half.

"I thought Manny was as active and as focused for the first 10 to 12 minutes as he has been since he's been here," Asbury said.

Dies added an exclamation point to his performance with a ground-shaking dunk on a transition play with seven minutes remaining in the game.

Asbury said Dies' offensive game was

Men's Hoops REWIND

Dec. 14: Aaron Swartzendruber led the Wildcats with 14 points, including four three-pointers, as K-State beat Arkansas-Little Rock and improved to 7-0.

Dec. 20: K-State, behind 19 points from Shawn Rhodes, beat Virginia Commonwealth 76-70 and moved to 8-0 for the first time in 18 years.

Dec. 28: The Cats played a tight game with Davidson in the Bank One Fiesta Bowl Classic, gaining a double-digit lead only once. K-State beat the Wildcats 70-63, starting 9-0 for the first time since 1957.

Dec. 30: K-State finally met its match, the defending national champion Arizona Wildcats in the Bank One Fiesta Bowl Classic championship game. On Arizona's home floor, K-State only trailed 58-44 at the break. However, Arizona went on a 27-0 run to start the second half en route to a 125-87 win.

Jan. 3: The Cats, paced by Josh Reid's 28 points, handed Missouri its worst loss in 91 years of basketball, 111-56. K-State had a 53-22 lead at halftime.

Jan. 7: Corey Brewer's 26 points were too much for K-State to handle. The Cats lost at Oklahoma, 71-64.

Jan. 10: Baylor beat K-State 73-62, handing the Cats their second straight loss and third loss in four games. Brian Skinner led the Bears with 20 points and 13 rebounds.

K-State's Brit Jacobson made clutch baskets Tuesday night to help the Wildcats jump back into the game at Missouri, but it wasn't enough as the Tigers won, 72-56. With the loss, the Cats dropped to 7-6 overall, 1-2 in Big 12 Conference Play

Fresh off a win against intrastate rival Kansas, K-State's women's basketball team suffered a 72-56 defeat to Missouri on Tuesday night. The loss dropped the Wildcats' record to 7-6 overall, 1-2 in Big 12 Conference play. The Tigers improved their record to 8-6 and 1-3 in the conference.

Missouri scored the first five points of the game, one in which they would never trail. A layup by Nicky Ramage on a pass from Brit Jacobson allowed K-State to tie the score at seven, but the Wildcats would never take the lead.

The Tigers used a 15-2 run from there to propel them to a 35-21 halftime lead. A pressure man-to-man defense by Missouri forced K-State into 18 turnovers by the break. Three Wildcats had four turnovers by halftime.

"Defensively, they caused us a lot of problems, particularly in the first half," K-State coach Deb Patterson said. "We let them intimidate us defensively. We played a very tentative and scared first half."

K-State started the second half on a 14-8 run to reduce Missouri's lead to eight points. Missouri's lead grew to 56-43 with seven minutes left in the second half.

The Cats put on another run to put some pressure on Missouri. Baskets by Jenny Coalson and Jacobson helped K-State battle back. After the Tigers' Ekpe Akpaffiong made a layup, Angie Finkes was fouled and made one of two free throws, but Coalson grabbed the rebound and found Kim Woodlee for her fourth three-pointer of the contest, cutting Mizzou's lead to 58-51.

The Tigers extended their lead to 61-52, but K-State had the ball with three minutes and 30 seconds left in the second half. While the Cats were bringing the ball up the court, Patterson was whistled with a technical foul. Kendra Jones drained one of the free throws to

JILL JARSULIC
Collegian

Well, football is officially over in my life.

The Kansas City Chiefs once again became the Chefs for the playoffs — chefs as they cook Super Bowl snacks for their families at home.

And I'm slowly recovering from my addiction to the weather in southern Arizona. I've admitted I have a problem with ice and snow, and I'm told that's the first step. Now I just need to get a job in Phoenix.

While I job hunt (I mean, since I now have spare time), I've managed to compile notes of sports-related bests and worsts of 1997:

Sucky luck: Martin Gramatica. This guy came back from a season-ending injury to become the first K-State player to win a national award. What happens? The unthinkable. He misses two key field goals in the bowl game. If it had happened to a guy who talks the talk but fails to walk the walk, he'd get few sympathy points. But Gramatica doesn't talk. He doesn't even whisper about how good he really is. No one deserves that bad luck less.

Quackiest call: The passing play on fourth-and-two with less than a minute on the clock in the Chiefs/Broncos playoff game. OK, why the receivers in the previous three plays never ran out of bounds to stop the clock totally baffles me, but let that rest for a minute. The Chiefs have one of the NFL's best short-yardage running backs in Marcus Allen.

Why not use him to get the first down and then worry about the touchdown? If the clock had been stopped earlier, oh well. At least 693 other Monday-morning quarterbacks have similar solutions, I'm sure.

Heisman hopeful: Michael Bishop. He can run faster than a lone car racing down Kansas Highway 177 at 2 a.m. He can leap entire defensive piles in a single bound. During the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl Classic game Jan. 1, CBS did a story about (I can only assume, since I saw it with no sound in a noisy bar in Tempe, Ariz.) the Heisman honor, including Tennessee's Peyton Manning, Washington State's Ryan Leaf and K-State's very own "Arch" Bishop. With Manning graduated and Leaf leaving early for the NFL draft, Bishop's chances are looking more than chancy. Stay tuned, folks.

Coolest catch: Jim Edmonds, Anaheim Angels, at Kauffman Stadium. I know less about baseball than football and basketball, but I know a good catch when I see one. And at that game in June, I was convinced the ball Edmonds laid himself out for couldn't possibly be caught. When he thrust his glove in the air, displaying the ball, I said that catch would be up for an ESPY award. Well, it got my vote.

Gigantic job: USC athletic administration. How do you get pumped for new coach Paul Hackett, a man who helped squash the Super Bowl hopes of the team atop the AFC, the 13-3 Chiefs? Maybe he wasn't ultimately responsible for the loss, but he had a bit to do with it. Although this season was his best ever, many Chiefs fans have no tears in their beer over his departure.

Posh position: Wildcat women's basketball team. Yeah, they're young. And yeah, they'll struggle in the Big 12 this season. A 1998 NCAA appearance isn't likely, but the team loses only senior Brit Jacobson to graduation, and Coach Deb Patterson has several qualified recruits lined up to attempt to replace her. Jacobson's electric spirit on the court and outside shooting ability will be difficult to emulate, but this team will be the hottest ticket in town this fall.

Fascinating future: Wildcat men's basketball team. No one expected the Cats to be 9-0 going into their 10th game. Everyone expected the Cats to lose to the defending national champs, the Arizona Wildcats. However, as Coach Tom Asbury eloquently said, "Find me the moron this (102-56 defeat of Missouri on Jan. 3) didn't surprise." That Missouri team, on a five-game winning streak, had just beaten No. 20 Maryland in Columbia, Mo., and had no answer for the Cats.

The Tigers aren't a bad team. Before losing at Bramlage Coliseum, the Tigers' losses came against then No. 3 Duke, then No. 8 Kentucky, then No. 18 Arkansas and Coppin State. Bring on the Chickenhawks on Saturday. While Wilt Chamberlain is retiring his jersey, the Cats might be retiring some Hawks.

Heaviest hands: Kendyl Jacox. He wears all four bowl rings at all times, and now will have a fifth to add to his collection. Don't make him mad — if he hits you, consider your face rearranged.

Humblest heart: Sorry, Travis Ochs, but I gotta say this — you're a nice guy. He wins the Defensive Player of the Game award at the Fiesta Bowl and says he was simply in the right place at the right time. While this might be true, few players would put it this way. And Ochs should be congratulated for balancing his busy schedule as well — at the Kickoff Luncheon on Dec. 29, he shyly admitted to receiving a 4.0 for the fall semester. I'd struggle with that if I had nothing to do but school. That achievement is up there with the bowl victory.

And by the way, I did pass Spanish — many thanks to those of you who were concerned for me.

Women's Hoops
REWIND

Dec. 13: At Ohio State, Ohio native Angie Finkes led K-State with 15 points as the Cats beat the Buckeyes 67-64. The victory improved K-State's record to 6-2.

Dec. 21: Point guard Kim Woodlee went six of 10 from three-point range, but it wasn't enough to lead the Cats past Marquette in Milwaukee. The Cats went two of four from the free-throw line in the 81-66 loss. Marquette was 23 of 28 from the line.

Dec. 28: The Cats had a pair of five-point leads in the second half at San Diego State, but could not stay on top as the clock ran down. K-State could not score in the last two minutes and 40 seconds of the game. The 57-53 loss to the Aztecs was the third defeat in four games for the Cats.

Jan. 4: K-State had a 35-32 halftime lead, but could not compete during the second half at Nebraska. The Cornhuskers pulled out in front of the Cats, 59-52, with less than eight minutes to play, and went on a 21-6 run to close out the 80-58 final. The loss was K-State's third consecutive and the fourth in five games.

Jan. 7: Back in Bramlage Coliseum for the first time in more than a month, K-State finally found a way to win. The Cats kept intrastate rival Kansas to 29-percent shooting from the field. Freshman Brandy Harris scored a game-high 16 points to lead K-State's 53-47 victory over the Jayhawks.

extend the lead to 10 points, and K-State added only four points the rest of the way.

"It was a game that I feel we should have played better," Patterson said. "It's a very disappointing loss for us and a very good win for Missouri."

Each team had three players in double-figures. K-State was led by freshman forward Brandy Harris, who had a career-high 18 points along with nine rebounds. Finkes and Woodlee each added 12 points. Jacobson, K-State's leading scorer on the season, was kept to four points before fouling out. She attempted only three field goals.

The Tigers were led by forward Julie Helm, the second-leading scorer in the Big 12, who scored 25 points. Akpaffiong added 16 points off the bench and center Kesha Bonds scored 14 while leading all players with 13 rebounds.

The road gets no easier for K-State.

The Cats are playing shorthanded. Their roster had only 11 players at the beginning of the season, and K-State has lost two of those players.

Freshman guard Dee DeShay had knee surgery to repair an injured anterior cruciate ligament. Junior forward Ewa Laskowska, a community-college transfer from Independence Community College, got homesick and returned to Independence, Mo. Laskowska had started four games and was averaging 9.4 points and 4.4 rebounds per game.

Three of the remaining nine players average less than 10 minutes per game, leaving only six players who receive significant playing time. Coalson played her fourth 40-minute game of the season Tuesday night.

within a minute of each other. Reid was four of four from the field, with three threes at the half.

"When you do get in, you just have to do your job," Reid said. "I came off the bench and hit three threes in a row, so it didn't bother me much."

The Cyclones' full-court pressure handed the Cats problems. Sophomore point guard Duane Davis committed a team-high three turnovers in 21 minutes of play. He didn't attempt a shot until the third minute of the second half.

But Swartzendruber, with more experience at the position, rose to the challenge and impressed his coach.

"They try to make sure your point guard doesn't handle the ball," Asbury said. "You're under pressure all the time. But Aaron did that well, only turning the ball over one time."

The beginning of the second half was a tale of fouls on both sides of the court. With nine minutes left in the game, the Cats were giving up a bonus shot. The Cyclones soon followed suit, and the Cats made the most of the opportunity.

Where Cyclone forward Marcus Fizer couldn't sink the front end of his one-and-ones, both Dies and Davis managed to do so, assisting with the Cats' 9-2 run. Junior guard Chris Griffin's 12-foot jumper put the Cats ahead by 20.

Swartzendruber was intentionally fouled by Fizer under the Cyclones' basket with three minutes left, and Swartzendruber lost his contact lens in the battle. As team members searched for it, Cyclone Martin Rancik came onto the court and appeared to be walking heavily around the area the contact lens fell.

Cyclone coach Tim Floyd grabbed Rancik, who claimed to be wiping the floor for water, and pulled him away from the area.

"It was a mistake, and he came up and apologized to me about it," Swartzendruber said. "I think (Cyclone Jerry) Curry finally found it for me."

Defensively, the Cats held the Cyclones to 35-percent shooting from the floor, but the Cyclones beat the Cats at the boards, pulling down 39 to the Cats' 36. Asbury said he was more upset about the Cyclones' effectiveness at offensive rebounding.

Manny Dies, K-State forward, blocks a shot from Iowa State forward Paul Shirley in Wednesday night's game. Dies scored a career-high 27 points while also securing nine rebounds, two steals and blocking four shots.

not entirely perfect.

"He took a couple of questionable shots, but he still had a very good game," Asbury said. "Without those he would have had a great game."

Although Dies gave a masterful offensive performance, he said focus on defense was a key to beating Iowa State.

"I thought we just needed to play hard to come back from two road losses," Dies said. "We just stayed focused and got it done."

Specifically, Dies and the rest of the Cats focused on stopping Cyclone forward Marcus Fizer, who came into the game averaging 14.7 points and seven rebounds a game.

"Fizer was the main man, and as long as we shut him down, we felt we could win," Dies said.

Dies and the Cats played tough inside defense against Fizer, keeping him to 12 points on just four of 11 shooting. He was also kept to three rebounds.

Dies appeared to assert himself as a vocal leader on the court during an incident with Cyclone forward Martin Rancik.

Cat guard Aaron Swartzendruber lost a contact lens when he was slammed to the floor by Fizer.

With Swartzendruber and guard Ayome May on the floor searching for the lost contact lens, Rancik stomped on the floor where the lens had dropped.

Dies had a few words with Rancik after the floor-stomp.

"He just told me what happened, and I didn't really believe it," Dies said.

No,
I don't need money

Call home just to say "hi."

Wanna really surprise your parents? Why not flip your Wildcat Card over and follow the easy calling card instructions and call home just for the fun of it? And when they hear your sweet voice NOT asking for money, maybe they'll finally realize you're not the "irresponsible teenager" they once thought you were.

What a concept. Why worry about carrying cash or checks when there's an easier, safer way to make purchases. The Wildcat Card is the one card to carry for nearly all of your everyday needs. Use it to access your Wildcat checking account for books and supplies, for food and beverages, as a library card and in many campus vending machines. This card also allows access to your financial aid surplus. Transactions are debited directly from your account and detailed on one simple monthly statement.

That's not all. The Wildcat Card also works at many participating merchants off-campus and acts as a universal ATM card, giving you 24-hour access to your account in Manhattan and around the world. (And be sure to let your parents know that, with the Wildcat Card, they can deposit money directly into your account from their hometown bank, free of charge.)

It's that easy. So take the hassle-free way to get things done on- and off- campus—take advantage of the Wildcat Card. For more information call Commerce on campus at 532-3500 or the Campus Card Center at 532-6399.

Annual survey ranks K-State in top of 3rd-tier institutions

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

In an annual survey ranking the best national universities, U.S. News & World Report ranked K-State toward the top of the third-tier institutions.

The news magazine, in its 10th year evaluating higher education, uses 81 statistical measures submitted by the universities and data compiled by several national education associations.

Ronald Downey, associate provost and director of planning and analysis, said his office is responsible for compiling the information sent to the magazine and analyzing the results.

"It bothers the university that we were not higher in the rankings," Downey said. "We really get hammered as an institution over things we have no control over."

According to the Sept. 1 article, the ranking model used made a shift, emphasizing information about the outcome of students rather than raw data input gathered about students entering institutes of higher education.

The methodology specifically weighed academic reputation, retention of students, faculty resources, student selectivity, financial resources and the alumni giving rate.

A public university from a state with a low population base and a fiscally conservative legislature will never have the same funding advantages as a higher-profile private institution, Downey said.

"We don't receive high levels of funding compared to Rutgers or Cal State and that results in lower faculty salaries and a smaller overall budget," Downey said. "We ask the Kansas Legislature and inform them of our needs, but there's a limit to how much we can expect."

K-State's level of student selectivity, specifically the automatic admission of all Kansas high school graduates before qualified admissions begins in 2000, contributes to the overall ranking, Downey said.

"This ranking is not about what the institution does in terms of accomplishments but in who you let in," Downey said. "If you take a wood like pine and want to use it to make furniture, you have to accept that it's less hard and it won't have the same depth of grain as oak."

Downey said he believes qualified admissions will not change the ranking. He said more selective universities typically admit students who are highly motivated and have a higher level of preparedness.

K-State was given an academic reputation score of 2.4 (on a 4.0 scale) and ranked among contemporaries Colorado State University and Oklahoma State University in the third tier. Harvard and Stanford both received a 4.0 in the first tier with Wichita State University at 1.7 in the fourth.

"The reputation will increase with the national exposure and awareness we continue to have," Downey said. "Our number of student scholars, the national awards and being in an Alliance Bowl all add to that reputation."

Top-25 public national universities include the Big 12 schools of Texas A&M and the University of Colorado at Boulder. Big 12 schools included on the second tier also include the University of Kansas, University of Missouri-Columbia and University of Nebraska.

"The president (Jon Wefald) is right in wanting more value-added evaluation of what we do with the students when the students get here," Downey said.

Additional ranking in the article had K-State with a 75-percent retention of freshmen and a 48-percent graduation rate in 1996. The university falls in the 20-26 ACT percentile with an alumni contribution rate of 27 percent.

"We do our best and have an awful lot of evidence about what we're doing that we're not asked to submit," Downey said. "They're ranking the best colleges and are interpreting best as what you have and we are interpreting it as the best we can do. We start out with the average Kansas student and do as much as we can with them."

Opposition skeptical of expansion plans

claims about the committee are unsubstantiated.

"These were open public meetings that were publicized in advance where anybody could come and voice their objections," he said. "We listened to many people, but nobody from the neighborhood except those on the committee even showed up.

But MacFarland voiced the same concerns about the Anderson committee and another committee being formed. That committee, he said, is also missing a neutral public voice.

"I can't see that there's any pain in the ass like me or any obvious community participant who wants to put on the brakes. There's nothing but people who want to grease the thing and make it go faster," MacFarland said.

"They're professional engineers and city staff members who might be well-meaning people, but the fact is you don't have people who are willing to pop up and say, 'Is that what we really need?'" he said.

Muir said the membership of the Anderson committee included representatives from the neighborhood, and that those who are against the project should have attended and spoken during the steering meetings.

"I would suggest to you that there was adequate public notice for those who wanted to speak out about the project," he said. "They had the opportunity."

MacFarland said he believes the commission passed the expansion proposal with the public outcry because too much time and money had already been invested in the process of developing the plan.

"Too many dollars had already been committed and there was too much power pushing it along," he said. "It's classic American politics."

Anderson expansion advocates stress safety

"I really believe safety is one of the issues we are tackling by going ahead with the project," he said.

Klimek also cited projected university growth as a reason for expansion. Estimates from the Kansas Board of Regents project steady growth in enrollment at K-State for several years after the millennium.

Klimek said he has concerns about sewer issues, but trusts the city engineer's report that the narrower area of the system will still be able to handle the water flow.

Reitz also said he supports widening the sewers now because it will save time and prevent construction a second time later.

Reitz said he spent many hours thinking about how he would vote. He said he supports going ahead with the project now because it is important to get it completed as soon as possible. Putting off the vote to consider the issues raised at the December meeting would not have affected his decision, Reitz said.

"Even if it had come later, mulling it over more, I think I would have come to the same conclusion," he said.

Iraq denies U.N. weapons charge

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq stood fast Wednesday in its ban on weapons inspections by an American-led U.N. team, drawing a strong protest from the U.N. Security Council. The chief U.N. weapons inspector, meanwhile, said he had evidence showing Iraq might have tested chemical weapons on prison inmates.

Iraq blocked weapons inspections by a team led by American Scott Ritter for a second day, refusing to back down in a confrontation that has brought the United Nations and Iraq once more to crisis.

In New York, the Security Council issued a statement deploring Iraq's refusal, calling the action an unacceptable violation of U.N. orders.

The unanimous declaration, sought by the United States, was meant to demonstrate support for the head of the U.N. inspection program, Richard Butler, who leaves for Baghdad on Thursday to try to resolve the latest standoff.

U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson welcomed the council action and said the Clinton administration was anxious to exhaust all diplomatic avenues to resolve the crisis with Iraq.

"My optimism is waning considerably," Richardson said. "I think the world community's optimism is waning, too. Patience is wearing thin. But we should not abandon diplomacy."

Council diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, said even Iraq's friends on the council — Russia, France and China — were growing frustrated by Baghdad's continued refusal to cooperate fully with U.N. inspectors.

Iraq said Monday it would block future inspections by Ritter's team, complaining that it was overloaded with Americans and Britons.

Iraq also has contended that Ritter had tried to gain access to a prison to seek information that would support Iraqi opposition claims that Iraq was testing chemical weapons on inmates there, all in an effort to falsely discredit Iraq.

Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz, repeating Iraqi complaints about alleged American dominance of the U.N. inspections in a news conference Wednesday, heatedly denied the alleged chemical experiments had taken place.

"Never, never, ever. It was a sheer lie," Aziz said. "It was being used as a pretext to enter a site."

Aziz also renewed Iraqi demands for an end to the weapons inspections, in which U.N. inspectors are checking whether Iraq has complied with U.N. conditions for lifting 7-year-old economic sanctions.

"It's not a political game — in this matter, people are dying every day," Aziz said. "The Iraqi people and the Iraqi leadership cannot tolerate it forever."

In New York, Butler confirmed that the U.N. inspectors had been investigating allegations that Iraq was testing chemical weapons on inmates, using insecticides.

"We had evidence this may have taken place," Butler said on ABC-TV's "Good Morning America," without elaborating.

Contrary to Iraq's account, Butler said the team that went into the prison wasn't led by Ritter, but by a German biologist.

Richardson, the U.N. ambassador, called the alleged chemical testing "very alarming, very worrisome."

Iraq accuses the United States and Britain of trying to prolong the disarmament process and, therefore, the lifting of harsh U.N. economic sanctions imposed when Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, leading to the Persian Gulf War.

The Security Council has said the sanctions will not be lifted until the U.N. Special Commission on Iraq certifies the nation has eliminated its weapons of mass destruction.

The United States has been the strongest voice for keeping sanctions on Iraq, but has had a hard time keeping fellow Security Council members Russia and France in the fold.

Apple reports net gain after 2 years in red ink

▶ COST CUTS, INCREASED DEMAND FOR COMPUTERS HELP COMPANY EXPERIENCE $47 MILLION QUARTERLY PROFIT.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Apple Computer Inc., helped by cost-cutting and demand for its high-end Macintoshes, on Wednesday reported a $47 million quarterly profit, a welcome bit of black ink after nearly two years of red.

The company surprised the Mac community and industry analysts when it predicted the positive results last week. But analysts said it remains to be seen if Apple can keep making money.

Apple's profit for the three months ended Dec. 26, the company's first fiscal quarter, amounted to diluted earnings of 33 cents a share. The company lost $120 million, or 96 cents a share, during the same period a year ago.

Revenues of $1.6 billion were sharply lower than sales of $2.1 billion a year ago. But the revenues were roughly even with the previous quarter, appearing to signal stabilization.

"Returning Apple to sustainable profitability is the company's No. 1 objective for fiscal 1998, and we believe we're making great progress toward that goal," interim chief executive officer Steve Jobs said in a statement.

Apple, based in Cupertino, Calif., reported the results after the stock market closed. The company's stock ended the day at $19.75 a share, up 25 cents, on the Nasdaq stock market.

The expectation of profit, announced at the Macworld Expo last week, had buoyed the company's stock 20 percent.

The results were in line with revised expectations. Analysts, who earlier had predicted a loss of $10 million, forecast profit of 35 cents a share, analysts at First Call said.

Stock analysts said that while saying Apple was on the right track with its new computers and continued cost cutting, the company needed to do more.

"There's still nothing to suggest that they are really going to start growing their revenues any time soon," said Richard Gardner, an analyst with Salomon Brothers in San Francisco.

He and others said Apple needed to produce computers costing $1,000 or less — the hottest part of the market where competitors are cashing in. The company has said it understands the realities of the market but will not discuss its plans in that area. Analysts expect it to introduce low-cost products later this year.

Apple has lost $1.8 billion in its past two fiscal years. The last time the company earned money was summer 1996.

Magazine to offer variety of literary, artistic styles

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

Multicultural students at K-State now have an output tailored specifically to encourage their own cultural creativity.

"Mosaic," a new multicultural literary and art magazine, is being published for the first time by the Office of Multicultural Student Organizations. Dawnielle Robinson, coordinator of the Office of Multicultural Student Organizations, said she hopes that by providing minority students with this creative forum, more students might learn about different cultures.

"What I'm trying to do with the magazine is expose more people to a multicultural experience," Robinson said. "We're accepting submissions from people from all walks of life."

Contributions will be in a variety of literary and artistic styles, including short fiction, creative nonfiction, essays, poetry and many different artistic media.

"I'm looking for mainly some semblance of multiculturalism in the writing," Robinson said. "I'm really open because this is the first year for it. I really can't be choosy."

"Mosaic" has a staff of several students, the duties of which include layout, design, editing and public relations.

Although only one submission has been received so far, the staff hopes to have a large audience. Staff sent announcements of its publication to other Big 12 schools.

Copies will be distributed to faculty members and can be picked up at the Office of Multicultural Student Organizations once the magazine is published later this semester.

Experience is on the side of "Mosaic," Robinson spent time as editor of "Touchstone," a K-State literary magazine.

"My primary interest originally was writing, of course, and I saw a need to do something with that talent," Robinson said.

Submissions are tentatively due Feb. 16.

Privilege Fee Committee faces full agenda

ANDREW DAVID WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Aaron Otto and the members of the Privilege Fee Committee will be burning the midnight oil this semester as they hammer out the finishing touches on numerous student fee bills.

The committee has set a Feb. 27 deadline to approve the new fees. But committee member Bret Glendening said the committee has given itself one week of leeway.

"There should be no problem finishing the committee work by the deadline," he said.

The committee's self-imposed deadline isn't the only one they face. The Kansas Board of Regents must have the final privilege fee legislation — already passed by Student Senate — by their March meeting.

"The regents must approve our fee schedule during their March meeting, so that is our motivation to be finished by February 27," Privilege Fee Committee Secretary Kimberly Peschka said.

Fees that have yet to be passed include Fine Arts Council, Intercollegiate Athletic Council, Union Program Council and Student Publications Inc. The committee also plans to debate proposed fees for library journal subscriptions and the Course Information Program.

Committee Chair Aaron Otto said Fine Arts Council has asked for a 3-percent increase in their budget for inflationary reasons. The committee will also be looking at restructuring the Fine Arts Council to make it more responsive to students' needs.

Change may also be in store for Student Publications Inc. Currently, the group is funded by a general operating fee. The committee may consider adding money for equipment to that fee, scrapping the idea of a separate fee for equipment that had been proposed earlier.

With the K-State Student Union renovation looming in the near future, Union Program Council has also asked for a budget increase.

"With the loss of space due to renovation, UPC will need this budget increase to continue to draw students to the Union," Otto said. "This is basically a cut-and-dry issue."

The Course Information Program, supported by former student body president Chris Hansen, was originally going to be funded out of Student Governing Association's general budget. Now, a privilege fee is proposed to cover the estimated $22,000 cost.

The program will provide students with access to course critiques by other students. Students will share the expense of this new program with assistance from the provost's office and other campus agencies.

"Most of the classes that are going to be affected by this fee will be lower level courses," Glendening said.

The committee will also look at how club sports and the K-State Marching Band are funded. Currently, both of these receive money through the athletic fee, but that could change if a proposal to separate those accounts passes the committee and Student Senate.

Also on the committee slate is a proposed fee to fund library journal subscriptions. Committee members will decide if students should pick up the tab for the purchase of new periodicals to fill Hale Library.

Library representatives have not been in contact with the committee, but Peschka expects them to present a proposal to the committee before March 1.

Gov. Bill Graves proposed a 4.7-percent budget increase for K-State that will help fund some of the library's needs, but Otto said that won't be enough to solve the problem.

"The budget increase is great and will help — to what extent remains to be seen," Otto said.

The committee will begin debate Monday at their 7 p.m. meeting.

KSU Choir broadcasts specially composed piece in Yugoslavia

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

It was a question from choir director Rod Walker to former SGA Fine Arts Council Chair Beth Hochberg that set the ball rolling.

In fall 1996, the Fine Arts Council had a surplus of funds, and Walker wanted to know how to get some of that money to commission a Yugoslavian composer named Aleksandar Vujic, artistic director for the Belgrade Symphony, to write a piece for the KSU Choir. He submitted an application and the Arts Council passed it.

A year later, Vujic was on K-State's campus.

"He thought it was the most beautiful place he had ever been," Walker said. "He's very taken with the whole situation and the whole place."

On Nov. 11, the choir performed Vujic's "Gloria." This particular version was set specifically for the KSU Choir, but "Gloria" is a religious piece which has been set many times throughout history. Vujic took a unique minimalist approach, setting the piece for mixed voices, piano, and kettledrum.

Vujic was impressed with K-State's choir. In a letter to Walker, Vujic expressed his satisfaction.

"The choir was so well prepared that I had a very easy job at the concert," Vujic said. "I gave only the sign for the beginning, and after that they sang by themselves."

Walker said he was pleased with the level of cooperation.

"It was money well spent," Walker said.

In addition to giving lectures and conducting, Vujic reportedly spent his time walking around taking pictures of the campus with a video camera.

"There's a lot of publicity for the campus over there," Walker said, referring to Yugoslavia.

On Nov. 18, Vujic was the one-hour guest of the State Radio (Belgrade), which broadcasted the KSU Choir and a large part of the concert, along with Vujic's comments on the choir and K-State.

The choir was also broadcast on Nov. 26, as the State Radio gave the second part of the concert.

On Nov. 24, the main government newspaper, "Politika," published a lengthy article about Vujic's visit, under the headline "Gloria in Kansas."

The choir was then broadcast on Serbian television twice, once on TV Serbia, following the evening news, and once on State TV Second Channel.

Plans are in the works for future projects with Vujic and K-State, including a piece he has been commissioned to write for the brass ensemble. Hanley Jackson, a K-State music professor, has been commissioned to write a piece for Vujic.

Walker reported that a release of the choir performance may be available in the future.

"It's not available yet," Walker said. "We may do it. This has all happened so fast."

▶'SOUTHPARK' SERIES TO BE SHOWN IN UNION BY UPC.

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

Comedy Central's popular animated series "Southpark" is coming to the K-State Student Union courtesy of the Union Program Council.

"Southpark" will be shown free of charge at noon on Tuesdays in Union Station. One episode of "Southpark" will be shown as well as an episode of another Comedy Central show. This show will be selected by the network and will vary every week.

The series will make its Union debut Tuesday.

"Since TCI doesn't carry Comedy Central, we talked to them to find out if we could show 'Southpark.' They agreed to send it to us if we would show an episode of another Comedy Central show following 'Southpark,'" Paul Donovan, UPC program adviser, said.

Richard Cofer, general manager of TCI of Manhattan, said there are no plans to add Comedy Central to TCI's programming anytime in the future.

"Any time we want to add something, at this point in time it will probably be at the expense of another service," Cofer said.

"Southpark" is focused on the adventures of grade school delinquents in Colorado, whose parents and teachers are almost as intensely psychotic as they are. All of the characters are distinctly over-exaggerated personalities.

"'Southpark' has been voted one of the best new shows. A lot of people find the humor crass, but just as many find it very funny," UPC President Mike Hodgson said.

The show is still in its first season, and merchandise, including T-shirts, hats and lamps, has already become available in response to the show's immense popularity. Local stores that carry the items say they sell very well.

Numerous websites where fans can download video clips of their favorite episodes and spend time finding out more about the show are devoted to "Southpark."

UPC plans to have drawings and giveaways of items for those who come to view the series. It will give away a lamp at the first show and T-shirts and hats thereafter.

"This will be a publicity boost for Comedy Central and to get the name 'Southpark' out," Hodgson said.

Arts and entertainment page to get overhaul

As the new editor of the Lifestyles page, I have a number of responsibilities to my fellow editors and the writers who put the words on the page, but my No. ! responsibility is to you, the reader.

I promise I will never move the crossword puzzle. It is important to be able to fold the paper just so and exercise your vocabulary skills during class. We are working on a graphic to give precise instructions to less experienced folders.

I've been a columnist at the Collegian for two years, and now, I am stepping into a new role as editor of the lifestyles page. They even gave me a desk. It might just be a clever ploy to get me off the opinion page, but I am excited about the new challenges and experiences that lay ahead.

Australian jazz choir to perform concert

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

You could call it the "Aussies in All Faiths."

Or you could just call it a joint concert of the Adelaide Connection Vocal Jazz Choir from the University of Adelaide in Australia and local favorites, the K-State Singers. Either way, the concert is at 8 tonight. in All Faiths Chapel.

The joint concert was organized between K-State Singers director Gerald Polich and Adelaide director Connaitre Miller, a K-State graduate. She is bringing her group to K-State following its performance at the International Association of Jazz Educators International Conference in New York.

The Adelaide jazz choir performs both jazz standards and contemporary music and features members who are studying at Adelaide's Elder Conservatorium of Music.

Polich said the Singers, which is a show choir, will feature a medley of commercials and ragtime medley. He said the concert should last about 1-1/2 hours.

Paul Donovan is a new program advisor for Union Program Council. Donovan helps oversee the 12 committees responsible for programming in the Union.

JILL JARSULIC/ Collegian

New adviser takes over UPC duties

▶ ADVISER'S DUTIES INCLUDE PLANNING EVENTS, LISTENING.

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

A new face is on the Union Program Council, the group that chooses which events to bring to the K-State Student Union. He is not foreign to UPC, but for the first time he will be paid for his work.

Last week, Paul Donovan began serving as a program adviser to UPC.

In his role, Donovan is one of three people who oversee the 12 committees responsible for programming in the Union. He books events and sets contracts, but spends most of his time assisting students involved with UPC.

Heide McBride, another program adviser, said an important part of Donovan's job is simply listening.

"He listens well to what the students want," McBride said. "Regardless of whether or not he agrees, he listens. He is also not afraid to give his opinion and that's what we're here for."

Donovan has seven years of experience with UPC on the student side of the job. He served three years on the Kaleidoscope Films committee and served as its chair for one year. He then served as UPC president. After taking two years off, Donovan returned as a member of Kaleidoscope and then as chair of the Satellite Theater committee.

While a master's degree is normally required for the program adviser position, Donovan acquired the job with a bachelor's degree in physics and a great deal of practical experience.

His position is in no way related to his physics degree, but allows him to serve in a mentoring role for the students he deals with.

"I think he gets along really great with students," McBride said. "He was already a (committee) chair and even then students came to him for advice on how things are now and how they might be better in the future."

> "IT'S IMPORTANT FOR THE STUDENTS TO BECOME INVOLVED BECAUSE IT SERVES THEM."
> PAUL DONOVAN
> program adviser to UPC

For Donovan, the best and most important part of his job is working with the students and helping them learn to be leaders.

"Working with UPC is more than helping publicize a lecture. It teaches them life lessons," Donovan said.

He encourages students to become involved with UPC by signing up to serve on a committee. He said UPC is always looking for more students to come in and help. There is a vast array of areas to work with including art, films, lectures, bands and comedians. Donovan said something of interest is available to almost everyone.

"On the films committee, they make and distribute posters, take tickets and do movie selecting," said UPC President Mike Hodgson. "Other committees handle booking and are in direct contact with agents. They do publicity and work on-site the day of an event. The art committee hangs shows in the gallery and handles poster sales."

"To become involved, students can come to the UPC office and talk to the secretary about signing up," Donovan said. "It's important for the students to become involved because it serves them."

The UPC programming budget is made up partly of student fees, which might be another reason to become involved in deciding how the money is spent. Hodgson said $70,000 comes from student fees, $30,000 to 40,000 comes from the Union and $30,000 comes from institutional support.

Donovan enjoys his new position and doesn't see himself leaving it anytime soon.

"Right now I'm really happy doing this, so I'm not giving myself a deadline," he said. "I know anything I do in the future will be in a related field."

Radio station hits Manhattan airspace

▶ 'THE BIG KAT,' DEBUTS WITH CHANGES IN PLAY LIST, STATION PERSONNEL.

CHARLIE SIOUX CHARLETON
Kansas State Collegian

There's a new cat in town and it's prowling the radio airwaves. KJCK- FM 94.5 , located in Junction City, is now known as "The Big Kat." The name signifies many changes brought about after a long process that began last August, said J.J. Davis, group program director for Platinum Broadcasting.

"We hired people from all over the country. We have a new staff and a new attitude," Davis said.

> "THE MUSIC CHANGED A LITTLE. I TIGHTENED THE PLAY LIST TO FAMILIAR MUSIC, POWER HITS, NO MARGINAL HITS. THE MUSIC HAS MORE MASS APPEAL" > group program director for Platinum Broadcasting
> J.J. DAVIS

A new logo, in the final stages of development, outwardly marks the changes. Consultants in New Mexico suggested an animal as the symbol for the radio station. That is the trend for radio stations throughout the country, Davis said.

"One station calls itself the Big Dog, so we decided to go with a cat," he said. "It also goes with this being Wildcat country."

The changes are more than cosmetic, however. They were made with expectations that KJCK-FM could become the dominant regional radio station, he said. One of the most significant changes is the station's format. The station moved to a mainstream Top 40 sound, Davis said.

"The music changed a little. I tightened the play list to familiar music, power hits, no marginal hits," Davis said. "The music has more mass appeal."

Davis also said listeners can expect a high-energy delivery. Evenings, listeners can tune in to "Bradley J's Love Jungle" where, Davis said, they hear everything from requests and dedications, to someone breaking up with their current steady, live on the air.

"We'll play the 10 most wanted at 10 p.m. nightly," he said. "That's the 10 most requested songs of the day."

Overnight, listeners to the Big Kat 94.5 will hear the "All Night Cafe," a program from Boston that plays Top 40 songs. The music comes to KJCK-FM thanks to satellite radio.

Satellite radio also plays a big part in the formatting of KQLA-FM 103.5, now also owned by Platinum Broadcasting. In fact, the format is almost entirely all satellite radio programs. Davis said Q103.5 will have local news and weather.

"Almost every station in this market has some satellite programming because it is more cost effective," Davis said.

Platinum also owns an AM station, KJCK-AM 1420.

"It is common to own more than one station in a market because that gives you a stronger chance of being dominant," Davis said.

Changes at the Big Kat 94.5 will have no affect on KSDB-FM 91.9, Len Potillo, DB92 general manager, said.

"We are a niche format. If a local station wants to go alternative or urban, they still can't touch us," Potillo said.

Potillo said satellite radio is cool for stations that feel they need it, but for most it's the actual in-house talent that attracts listeners.

"We prefer live talent for this station. Live talent is where it's at," Potillo said.

If a listener wants to tune to satellite radio, he said it's already available on cable television with DMX, which offers more choices.

"Going on satellite is redundant," Potillo said.

Budget proposals abound for 1998

JESSI BRUNSON
Kansas State Collegian

Gov. Bill Graves set the mood for the upcoming year with his State of the State address when the 1998 legislative session opened Monday.

He presented his budget proposal to the Kansas Legislature during the speech.

Despite recommending many tax cuts, Graves made it clear that higher education would be a priority to receive more funding for the 1999 fiscal year beginning July 1.

Susan Peterson, assistant to President Jon Wefald, said there were three main budget proposals that are very important to K-State: a 4-percent salary increase for all state employees, a 2.5-percent budget increase in the Other Operating Expenses (OOE) fund and a two-part technology funding plan.

Wefald said the proposal is a positive one.

"The governor delivered an excellent message for KSU and other regents schools. Our priority is competitive faculty salaries, so we are pleased with the 4-percent proposed increase in faculty salaries."

The statewide employee salary hike will reward those who have been working harder due to fewer personnel, Peterson said. The additional money will also keep faculty salaries competitive with other universities across the nation.

Perhaps the most important funding issue is the OOE fund, Peterson said. Of the proposed 2.5-percent increase, 0.5 percent will go toward Hale Library funding.

The proposed 0.5-percent increase is a newly dedicated funding source for libraries of every Kansas Board of Regents university, Peterson said.

"This is unprecedented," she said. "The 0.5-percent increase designated for the library is really important. It's an issue we've been fighting for a long time, and K-State should get the credit for convincing the governor."

Technology funding could also be getting a boost. Graves proposed a one-time grant of $5 million to be divided among the six Regents schools and the University of Kansas Medical Center for technological improvements.

A matching funds proposal is the second part of Graves' technology funding plan.

According to the plan, students will pay $1 more per credit hour and the state will match that with $2 per credit hour.

Peterson said if this proposal is passed, $25 million will be collected as a base fund by 2000.

"We have identified $45 million in technological needs. We already put in $2.3 million annually. This will boost the total to about $6.3 million to spend per year," she said.

Another legislative issue that doesn't pertain directly to the budget is higher education governance. Currently public, private and community colleges are governed by several different entities.

"This is not the most efficient use of taxpayers' dollars," Peterson said. "Should we make a 'super-board' to govern all colleges, or continue to have separate (governing bodies), such as the Board of Regents?"

A House select committee on higher education appointed Wednesday will examine this issue in more detail.

Funding issues for fiscal year 1999 aren't yet resolved, however. Graves' proposals must be approved by the Legislature.

Wefald said the proposals have a strong chance of making it to the governor's desk.

"There is an excellent chance of getting this passed by the state Legislature," Wefald said. "We are very confident that Governor Graves' proposal will be accepted as is."

Peterson, who serves as K-State's liaison to the Legislature during the session, agreed.

"Chances are very good," Peterson said.

"The local delegation will work hard to help us, just as they always do."

Budget proposal includes new technology expediture

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Local Republicans and others in the Kansas Legislature responded positively to Gov. Bill Graves' State of the State address Monday, and to his proposals for the fiscal year 1999 budget.

Graves outlined $178.5 million in tax cuts and a slew of spending and policy initiatives aimed at children, education, the environment and abortions.

Representative Jeff Peterson, R-Man., said he thinks Graves' budget is very fair and balanced between the tax packages and policy proposals.

"Everyone seems to be pleased with the budget," Peterson said. "Compared with other years, there seems not to be the controversy there's been in the past."

Peterson said his only contention is with the broad scope of the tax cuts, instead of concentrating on a few areas that could spell more relief to taxpayers.

"Politically, putting together a broad group of tax cuts helps more people and puts together a broad coalition to pass a budget," Peterson said.

Peterson said the House leadership, which has traditionally been at odds with the governor's budget, has been pleased with this year's model.

"We have good economic times — this budget is a sound budget," Peterson said.

House Speaker Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, a frequent foe of Graves' budgets, is pleased with the large tax cuts this year.

Democrats have also been pleased with Graves' budget proposal.

Minority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, said Democrats don't disagree with the amount of Graves' tax cuts, but with where they are taken.

He said the inheritance tax relief would affect too few Kansans and would furthermore benefit them too much, since this tax cut amounts to nearly 30 percent of Graves' total proposed cuts.

Sawyer said the cut would amount to nearly $60 million next year and wouldn't affect the entire state's population, whereas $60 million in food sales tax cuts would affect everyone.

"It needs more balance," Sawyer said. "Cutting the sales tax on food helps everyone."

EDUCATION

Graves proposed a one-time $23-million expenditure on new technology for K-12 schools, Kansas Board of Regents institutions, Washburn University, community colleges, vo-tech schools and other specialty schools. Nearly $5 million of that will go to regents schools, with K-State receiving nearly $1 million.

Graves also proposed a regents plan to charge students $1 per credit hour matched by $2 per credit hour of state money to fund technology enhancements.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Man., said she thinks higher education communities should be happy with Graves' proposed increase of nearly 4.9 percent in overall budgets, but particularly with the technology initiative since it is a critical issue for higher education.

"It's always encouraging when the governor sets the benchmark," Oleen said.

Oleen said she is also happy with a proposed $27 million in research grant increases, saying Graves has his eyes set on both present and future needs.

Oleen expressed some apprehension about the 2-for-1 proposal. She said often when there is a lot of money on the table, the state can make large contributions, but that money can sometimes dry up or decrease in the second year of a matching grant proposal.

"If you become very dependent on a finite matter of matching grants, sometimes you can get burned," Oleen said.

Financial aid applications available on World Wide Web

More info?
Students with questions can contact the Office of Student Financial Assistance at 532-6420 or on the web at ksu.edu/sfa or fafsa.edu.gov/index.html

K-State students can now apply for federal financial aid or for renewal online.

Online scholarship application is not a new idea. The university began offering the option of applying for K-State scholarships online last year. It's now possible to obtain federal aid online through a program that was recently introduced.

Previously, the university could fill out the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA) online on behalf of the students. The new program allows students to personally fill out the forms, said Larry Moeder, director of Student Financial Assistance.

Online application may be more convenient and accessible for some students.

"Applying online is faster and in many cases easier. It saves processing time," Moeder said. He also said that it cuts out the possibilities of error.

When completing the FAFSA form online, students should gather financial records for income earned prior to the year they are applying for aid. The required information includes a social security number, driver's license, federal income tax return, W-2 forms, current bank statements, and records of investments and untaxed income.

The security of the site is guaranteed by the encryption of its accepted browsers. All information entered is confidential and protected by the Privacy Act of 1974.

The FAFSA provides access to federal grants and loans. Applicants may receive Pell Grants, Stafford Loans, Perkins Loans, Federal Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants or qualify for the Federal Work Study program. Any student can apply.

The site is currently accepting and processing applications for the 1998-99 school year. The priority deadline is March 1.

K-State literary magazine to change structure

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

Changes in structure and style are in the future for Touchstone, K-State's literary magazine.

Steve Heller, Touchstone adviser and director of creative writing for the English department, said Touchstone is trying to affiliate with the Associated Writers Journals Project Contest.

Heller said there is a group of literary magazines published by U.S. universities, and K-State is trying to become a part of the group who enters the AWP contest.

"We have to restructure the magazine to fit the AWP criteria and style so Touchstone will qualify to enter the contest," said Kiersten Allen, editor in chief of Touchstone.

Touchstone structure changes will expand the editorial policy. The magazine will be required to include graduate works as well as undergraduate. A change in layout is not required, but each year the staff members add their own charisma.

"Right now, Touchstone is nationally distributed, but not widely enough," Heller said. "In order to meet AWP criteria, we will have to spend more money to get the magazine in bookstores."

Touchstone is student produced and was established approximately 30 years ago.

"The Touchstone was started to provide K-State students an outlet for their creative work and also to experience the editorial process," Heller said.

Undergraduates in the United States can submit their works for publication. Allen said works such as creative non-fiction, fiction, essays, poetry and art work will be selected for publishing.

The staff, made up of mostly graduate students and a few undergraduates, meets and selects work that is the best for each section.

Allen said most of the editors have been selected but the general staff is being determined.

So far the staff includes Allen as editor, Kevin Rabas as art editor, Aaron Reynolds as fiction editor, Mary Heng as creative non-fiction editor, Robert Johnson as poetry editor and Sheyene Foster as layout and design editor. They will be selecting works for publication soon.

"I want to get as many people as we can to get involved, because I don't think the Touchstone should be exclusive in any way," Allen said.

Some works from the fall creative writing classes have been submitted, but final submissions will be due in February. Touchstone also has a creative writing contest, and the winners receive $50.

"The students should know that it is a tremendous outlet for their creative work," Allen said. "I encourage everyone who is interested to submit their work."

Touchstone is now focusing on making changes for the AWP contest, and Heller said the annual magazine will be available in April.

Investigation of police brutality put on hold after retraction reported

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The black Haitian immigrant who said white police sodomized him with a stick reportedly has retracted his claim that his attackers told him, "It's Giuliani time."

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani succeeded David Dinkins, New York's first black mayor.

Abner Louima now says he doesn't remember the officers making the remark, the Village Voice reported Wednesday, quoting unidentified investigative sources.

That disavowal has led a federal grand jury to put on hold its investigation of the Aug. 9 incident, the weekly newspaper said.

The Voice reported that federal prosecutors don't doubt Louima's central allegation that police beat him and sodomized him with a stick — perhaps the handle of a toilet plunger — after his arrest outside a nightclub. Louima suffered a ruptured bladder and colon and was hospitalized for two months.

"The investigation is continuing and has never been interrupted," U.S. Attorney Zachary Carter said in a statement Wednesday.

One of Louima's lawyers, Sanford Rubenstein, said, "Abner Louima remains a victim of torture by New York City police officers."

The first mention of "Giuliani time" came on Aug. 13, when Louima lawyer Brian Figeroux quoted his client as saying his attackers told him, "We're going to teach you niggers to respect police officers. Dinkins is no longer in power. It's Giuliani time."

In a videotaped hospital interview Aug. 14, Louima told reporters he had heard his attackers say "nigger" and "Giuliani time."

Figeroux declined to comment on the Voice article.

A lawyer for one of the officers said the Voice report cast doubt on Louima's credibility.

"I think this is the tip of the iceberg and that there's more coming," said Marvyn Kornberg, who represents Officer Justin Volpe. "This story is not what the prosecutors think happened. This story shows that Louima lied."

The Rev. Al Sharpton, a black activist who ran for the Democratic mayoral nomination last year, disagreed.

The term now in question is a footnote to the Louima case, said Sharpton, who has acted as an adviser to Louima. "No one is being prosecuted for their words. They're being prosecuted for their actions."

Louima's cousin, Samuel Nicolas, who acts as spokesman for the family, turned down a request for an interview with Louima.

The claims that officers had used Giuliani's name helped make the case an issue in Giuliani's re-election campaign last year. The mayor, who won a second term in November, demanded a full investigation and repudiated any use of his name.

Volpe, 25, and fellow officer Charles Schwarz, 31, are charged with assault and sexual abuse. Two other officers are charged with assault and criminal possession of a weapon for allegedly beating Louima in a squad car.

REC REPORT

This is a Paid Advertisement

Tune in to our full page ad on the 1st day of each month for program information and monthly calendar of Recreational Services Events!

Who's Who at the Rec

Stacy Chapman, senior in elementary education, has taught aerobics over four years for Recreational Services. "I enjoy teaching intervals," she said. "It provides a great fat burning workout and is also a great way to unwind and relieve stress." Chapman also has experience teaching step and toning classes. Chapman is also the panhellinic representative for the Recreational Services Council and was recently elected to the position of chairperson. "I've worked for the Rec for four years and watched it go through many changes," she said. "This position will give me the opportunity to give back to one of K-State's biggest assets." Next fall Stacy plans to student teach in Kansas City.

Bill Jacob, senior in food science and industries, has worked for Recreational Services since 1995. He began by officiating football, basketball, volleyball, and softball before moving up to the position of intramural supervisor. Some of Bill's responsibilities include training and evaluating officials, crowd control, and general supervision over participants and activities. "I think I have the best job on campus," he said. "I get to see a lot of people, I can work around my schedule, and the people I work with are great." When Bill isn't working with intramural sports, he is playing them. He says he enjoys playing for his fraternity, tau Kappa Epsilon, and for the Peach Burritos, his co-rec team. "I like all the sports, but my favorite are racquetball and softball," he said.

Intramural MANIA

Intramural Basketball
Don't miss our largest intramural sport of the year! Start organizing your teams now for the upcoming season! Entries will be accepted Tuesday, Jan. 20 through Friday, Jan. 23. Priority on playing times is on a first come, first serve basis. Information sheets with league menus are available in the Recreational Services office.

Wellness Resource Center

Fitness consultants will offer many helpful services this semester at the wellness resource center in the Recreation Complex. These services include measurement and evaluation of flexibility, strength, cardiovascular endurance and percent body fat. Fitness consultants are available by appointment to assist you in developing a personalized exercise program. Let the wellness resource center be your door to safe, enjoyable and effective exercise.

Aerobics Instructor Course

In February, Recreational Services will begin the Aerobic Instructor Training Program. If you are interested in becoming an aerobic instructor, this course will teach you the basic information you need. Stop by the business office to sign up or to find out more information.

My Favorite WORKOUT

For sophomore Peyvand Honargohar, the Recreation Complex is a place he can go to escape the stresses of being a civil engineering major. "It's fun to goof off," he said. "I can get away from school for awile." When Peyvand sets aside his studies, he enjoys playing basketball, as well as lifting, to keep in shape. "I like to come out and play pickup games of basketball," he said. "It's great practice to get ready for intramural basketball." Peyvand thinks having the Rec Complex for the students is a good idea. He said it provides a great alternative to going out. Peyvand says he's not sure what his future will bring, but he does know he wants to graduate and get his masters or a job.

Pool Action

We are excited to have all pools operating again for spring semester after new filters were installed during Christmas break. Water exercise sessions begin today, January 15. Schedules are available at the Rec complex, Natatorium, or by calling Rec Check at 532-6000.

Basketball Officials Wanted

Recreational Services will be hiring and training Basketball Officials for the upcoming season. Training sessions will be held January 26-28 at 5 p.m. each night at the Recreation Complex. Attendance is required at all three sessions. You do not have to be experienced in basketball officiating. We will train and prepare you to be the best official you can be. Come on out and give it a shot!

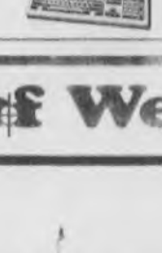
Fitness Facts

The word "aerobic" means "with oxygen." Aerobic activities are those which use oxygen, such as running, swimming or dancing. Anaerobic, on the other hand, means "without oxygen." Anaerobic exercises usually have the purpose of building muscular strength. Weightlifting is one of the most common anaerobic exercises.

Nutrition Notes

Start the year off right! Set resolutions that are specific, realistic and enjoyable. Eat a piece of fruit for an afternoon snack or take a ten-minute walk after dinner three times a week. Small, concrete changes like these can add up to big results over the year!

Wildcat Workouts!



Start your new year with Wildcat Workouts! There's a new schedule of exercise sessions beginning today and a great staff to motivate and encourage you. Bring a friend and make exercise a part of your routine. There are a variety of exercise sessions available to everyone! All fitness classes are offered at varying times throughout the week. Schedules are available at the Rec Complex or by calling Rec Check at 532-6000.

Workout Menu

- Step Challenge: Challenging step choreography (prior experience recommended)
- Aerobics: combines high/low impact aerobic workout with high intensity, energetic choreography
- Circuit: strength and endurance workout alternating sets of aerobics, step aerobics and strength training
- Combo: combinations of aerobics, step aerobics and toning
- Interval: alternating high and low intensity with aerobics or step workout
- Power Interval: a new step/tone class consisting of alternating sets of power moves on the bench with resistance/toning exercises. A great fat burning class for intermediate & advanced levels.

College of Architecture approves new degree

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

At a College of Architecture, Planning and Design faculty meeting on Tuesday, faculty members approved a new 30-hour master of arts degree in environmental planning and management.

Dean of Architecture Dennis Law said the degree was conceived to meet the needs of the Kansas National Guard, which requires officers to have a master's degree if they wish to advance in rank past that of major.

Law said the degree will be offered as a distance-learning program and could be utilized by students throughout the world, but was mainly created to tap into the more than $4 million the United States Army spends on higher education for officers in Kansas alone.

Although the degree has met approval with faculty, it must still find approval with K-State administration, the graduate school and the Kansas Board of Regents. A pilot program was offered just to the Kansas National Guard and state employees, so although the degree has yet to be formalized, there are already students enrolled in it.

At the meeting, faculty from other departments within the college, like landscape architecture and architecture, expressed concern that a new program in the planning department would be a fiscal or staff burden on the other departments.

Law said the new degree will not affect the other departments. He said there is the possibility the Army would fund the purchase of new technology to make the distance learning possible and effective.

"There is no expectation to increase the number of faculty to do this," Law said, referring to the planned implementation of the new degree for fall 1998.

In other business, Law discussed the implications of a regents proposal that is now before the Legislature to enact a $1 per credit hour technology fee to be matched by a $2-per-credit-hour allocation from the state.

Law said an equipment fee is desperately needed for the college. He said K-State and the University of Kansas are the only two architecture schools in the Big 12 without fees.

Law also updated the faculty on the planned renovation of Seaton Hall, which could begin in full swing as soon as next fall.

A tentative building program, produced by Wichita firm Schaefer Johnson Cox Frey and Associates, has been provided to the college, as well as to the engineering college, that outlines the planned space needs of the entities occupying Seaton.

In the next few months, faculty will help to finalize the program. A short list of architects will be narrowed to one firm and the design process will begin.

Law also informed faculty he will be hosting a conference of Big 12 architecture deans in Kansas City, Mo., that will focus on a debate concerning nomenclature standardization. This has become a point of contention in the architectural education realm recently, since some schools have done away with bachelor's degrees in favor of master's degrees.

Texas Tech University only offers a five-year master's program, compared to K-State's comprehensive approach with a five-year bachelor's degree and a two-to three-year master's degree. Some in higher education would like to standardize it to a five-year master's degree only.

"I expect there to be a tremendous debate," Law said.

"Well-established programs have resisted this. Some believe you can elevate the profession by calling the degree something else."

National radio show praises K-State's work in athletics, academics

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

One of the world's most-listened-to radio news personalities gave K-State and one particular student high marks last month.

Paul Harvey spent 56 seconds of his Dec. 23 broadcast praising K-State's ability to produce scholars and athletes "all out of proportion" to its enrollment.

"The Kansas State football team is going to the Fiesta Bowl this year," he said. "Kansas State has had six Rhodes Scholars. Add those six Rhodes Scholars to five Goldwaters and two Trumans and assorted Marshalls, and I know of no public school this decade which has produced more excellence."

WINKLER

Harvey went on to name Jonathan Winkler, senior in physics, math and English, and the latest of K-State's Rhodes Scholars, calling him a brilliant student.

Winkler was one of 32 Rhodes Scholars selected last month. It will allow him to study for two years at Oxford University.

He is also one of the five Goldwater Scholars Harvey mentioned, receiving that honor in 1995 for his research in the properties of helium atoms and their ionization, behavior that physics still has no model to explain.

Winkler graduated from Wichita Southeast High School in 1993, and between sessions at K-State, he interned at the Duke University/North Carolina Engineering Research Center for Emerging Cardiovascular Technologies, and later at the NASA Goddard Space Flight Center.

He is active as webmaster of the Physics Club and secretary of the College of Arts and Sciences honors council, and has worked for two years as a columnist for the Collegian.

"I believe, the first Rhodes Scholar in history to achieve that recognition though deaf," Harvey said of Winkler. "Jonathan is deaf, but like most K-State students who grew up on that state's farms, he learned early to try harder."

Harvey's 5-minute feature broadcasts, known since 1946 as "The Rest of the Story," reach 23-million listeners through the ABC Radio Network with more than 1,200 radio stations nationwide. A native of Oklahoma, he has referred to K-State in the past as "The Harvard of the Midwest."

Fiesta Bowl backdrop for team's 1st 11-win season

It all started on a warm September evening in DeKalb, Ill.

After the Wildcats returned the opening kickoff to Northern Illinois' 26-yard line, a new K-State quarterback named Michael Bishop led the offense down the field.

He guided the Cats 31 yards in five plays before running the ball 43 yards up the right sideline for the first of K-State's 72 scores this season.

The last score came in the 27th Tostitos Fiesta Bowl — K-State's first-ever Alliance Bowl — on a 41-yard pass from Bishop to wide receiver Darnell McDonald.

The touchdown put the Cats over Syracuse 35-18, the final score.

The win, which was probably the biggest in the 102 years of K-State football, capped the first 11-win season in school history.

And it sure didn't go unnoticed.

More than 40,000 fans swarmed to the Arizona desert to watch the Cats beat Syracuse. Although the game in Tempe, Ariz., was more than 1,000 miles from Manhattan, it was, with the tremendous noise and support, like another home game for the Cats.

"I think our people are beginning to get the feel of things that says, 'Hey, we need to go out and be a part of this.' They've always tried to be a part of it. Now they're trying to be a disruptive part. They're good people. I appreciate them for it," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

The day before the game, nearly 15,000 purple-clad fans packed into an arena for K-State's pep rally, showing the emotion expected from fans finally tasting success after suffering for a century.

The pep rally clearly pumped up the team, especially when the fans learned and performed a deafening version of the players' pregame chant, "Purple, get ready to roll, purple get ready to roll."

The chanting continued that night in the streets of Tempe and continued during the game.

It didn't stop until less than two minutes remained in the game when the fans, with the guidance of the K-State band, switched to the Cats' traditional victory song.

"Happy trails to you, until we meet again. Happy trails to you, we might as well be friends. Happy trails to you, until we meet again."

Although the game ended the greatest season in K-State football history, it might have been merely a stepping stone for next season.

In 1998, the Cats will return 18 of 22 starters and several players wait in the wings of Snyder's system to compete for the four openings. Also, perennial nemesis Nebraska will lose all five starting offensive linemen, its No. 1 quarterback and tailback, as well as its head coach.

It's reasons such as these that didn't allow Snyder to believe he'd reached the pinnacle of success at K-State, a team he took from 0-11 Big 8 Conference doormats to 11-1 Alliance Bowl champs in nine years.

"There's more to come," he said.

Wildcats answer questions, critics in Fiesta Bowl victory

When K-State's football season began Sept. 6, several questions surrounded the Wildcats.

• How would K-State recover from losing 15 of 22 starters from last year's Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl Classic team?

• How would K-State fare with a community-college transfer taking over at quarterback?

• How would the Cats do while starting an entirely new secondary and wide receiving corps?

•Could the Cats ever beat a team outside of the Mid-American or Western Athletic Conferences, or the lower ranks of the Big 12?

Well, on Dec. 31, the Cats put exclamation points on any remaining question marks with a 35-18 victory over Big East Champion Syracuse in the 27th Tostitos Fiesta Bowl in Tempe, Ariz.

K-State quarterback Michael Bishop accounted for 390 of K-State's 457 offensive yards, passing for 317 yards and rushing for another 73.

"There was still a little rust on Michael, but overall I thought he played very well and did a lot — again, a lot of the physical things that only Michael can do," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

The Cats averaged 7.3 yards per play, and although they didn't dominate the stat sheets, they did well enough to come within a point of doubling the Orangemen on the scoreboard.

"They did a great job on offense, as well as on defense, as well as on special teams," Syracuse quarterback Donovan McNabb said. "You have to tip your hat. They won the game, did a great job. They're smiling right now."

K-State struggled early, going scoreless in the first quarter and falling behind 3-0. Syracuse controlled the first 15 minutes of the game, running up 104 yards while holding the Cats to 45.

However, Bishop, along with wide receiver Darnell McDonald, took charge of the game in the second quarter.

The two hooked up for a 19-yard score through the air, putting the Cats up 7-3, a lead they never surrendered.

Before the half, Bishop also ran for a touchdown and hit tight end Justin Swift on a screen for another score.

On the night, McDonald caught a Fiesta Bowl-record three touchdown passes and also set records for the longest reception, 77 yards, and the most receiving yards, 206.

"Darnell was tremendous, I thought. I think he stepped up today. He's had some very fine ball games, but he's never put it all together like this," Snyder said. "Then again, he had more opportunities today. He had seven opportunities to catch the football. I'm not so sure that He couldn't have known.

Records were to be set and broken, and a new playmaker emerged from the Wildcat pack.

But Darnell McDonald couldn't have known that in K-State's first Alliance Bowl appearance, he'd have seven catches for 206 yards, a new Tostitos Fiesta Bowl record.

Nor could he have known that he'd grab the longest touchdown pass in Fiesta Bowl history — a 77-yarder from Cat quarterback Michael Bishop.

Or did he know?

McDonald admits he did his homework.

"I watched the films, knew exactly what coverage they were going to be in," he said. "A couple of times when he threw it, I wasn't open at the time."

But Bishop's passes had a touch that evening, and McDonald made sure he was in position to touch those passes.

"By the time the ball got there, I was wide open," McDonald said.

As far as making plays was concerned, the 77-yarder was a questionable one for a couple of reasons. McDonald's defender was in tight coverage, and McDonald said he did his best to get rid of him before catching the pass.

"I made a release move, going down the sideline," he said. "He had a grab of my jersey. I got kind of frustrated. I gave him a little push."

That was the first flag that wasn't thrown on the play. But McDonald said he was half expecting one.

"After I caught it, I thought they might have called it on me," he said. "I just kept running till the whistle. Luckily, it was a touchdown."

Sprinting so close to the sideline, McDonald wasn't sure he was in bounds the entire time, either. But he didn't stop to worry about it.

"I thought I was out," he said. "Referee called it a touchdown."

Syracuse free safety Donovin Darius said McDonald was in.

"I believe he was in bounds," Darius said. "He did a great job on that."

But as far as the push-off, Darius said the Orangeman defender was the pushed one.

"From my perspective, the wide receiver pushed off," Darius said. "They called a hold on it. If you would have seen it on the film, you would have seen he could not hold him at all. It was a deliberate attempt to push off."

But, Darius admitted, that's the way the ball bounces.

"That's sometimes how it happens, when you're on their sidelines," Darius said.

"They get their calls their way, we get ours our way."

Nevertheless, McDonald's three touchdown passes and general play that evening impressed Coach Bill Snyder.

"I'm not so sure that he didn't make something close to an excellent play every time he caught the football," Snyder said. "There were some very fine catches. He made some excellent efforts after he caught the football."

And after those excellent efforts, McDonald was rewarded with a Snyder smile when he came to the sidelines. Had he ever seen smiles like that before from the normally reserved Snyder?

"No, not at me," McDonald said. "Feels good when he smiles."

he didn't make something pretty close to an amazing play every time he caught the football."

Aside from the breakthrough in the passing game, the Cats caught a few breaks late in the game.

On McDonald's 77-yard score, the Cats might have actually caught a couple of breaks. McDonald said he thought he stepped out of bounds on the play, and he was also involved in a controversial tangle with a Syracuse defensive back.

The Orangemen insisted McDonald pushed off, but the defender was flagged for holding, which was declined.

Later, with K-State leading 28-18 and Syracuse driving, McNabb fumbled without being hit and K-State linebacker Travis Ochs recovered after the ball bounced off a referee.

A few plays later, K-State running back Eric Hickson was involved in another disputed play. He fumbled the ball, which was returned for a touchdown by a Syracuse defender. The officials, however, ruled Hickson's forward progress had stopped before he fumbled, giving the ball back to the Cats.

"They said that he was going backwards, where he actually was still trying to push forward," Darius said. "I believe it was a fumble. The referees called it their way. That's how it goes sometimes."

Still, despite not getting the calls down the stretch, Syracuse coach Paul Pasqualoni would not offer up any excuses.

"They played an outstanding game," he said. "I believe on this particular day, they really executed far better than our team did. They made the plays."

CAT FIGHT

▶ ARIZONA RUNS AWAY FROM K-STATE IN FIESTA BOWL CLASSIC.

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

At the Fiesta Bowl Basketball Classic — the battle between the Davidson, K-State and Arizona Wildcats — there could be only one ending. Cats were bound to win.

And on Dec. 28, it was K-State's Cats leaving McKale Center at the University of Arizona with a win over Davidson, 70-63.

The championship game on Dec. 30, against defending national champion Arizona was another matter. Lute Olson's Wildcats downed K-State, 125-87.

Davidson's fast-paced man-to-man defense kept the Cats on their toes for the entire 40 minutes, but K-State coach Tom Asbury said his team was still on winter break, physically.

"Our conditioning wasn't what I thought it was going into tonight," Asbury said. "We definitely showed signs of fatigue."

Initially, K-State was lighting up the scoreboard, first with a three-pointer by guard Josh Reid. But 11 minutes into the first half, Davidson came up on K-State's tail, tying the score at 16 on Davidson guard David Burns' pair of free throws.

"Davidson's got a very fine ball club, and they presented a difficult game for us," Asbury said. "Their defense bothered us at times."

The Davidson defense held K-State to 41-percent shooting in the first half and 38 percent from the three-point arc. However, K-State kept Davidson off the offensive boards and the team had only pulled three down by the half.

In the second half, K-State widened the lead twice only to have it cut by Davidson shooters Burns and forward Ben Ebong. Davidson took its first lead of the game, 51-50, with less than nine minutes to go, but K-State guard Aaron Swartzendruber nailed two free throws to put the Cats on top again.

"We got to the foul line when we had to," Asbury said. "I honestly believe that Aaron Swartzendruber was the best player on the floor tonight for either team."

The game was knotted at 56 three minutes later, but center Shawn Rhodes hit a jumper from 18 feet to put K-State ahead. Asbury was impressed with Rhodes' cool head under the Davidson pressure.

"He hit a really big shot for us then," Asbury said. "Shawn showed us senior-type leadership in his junior year."

Swartzendruber grabbed a season-high seven rebounds. Junior forward Manny Dies pulled down a team-high 11 rebounds while tying a team-high 14 points with Swartzendruber. After achieving his third double-double of the season, Dies said he feels defense is his strong point.

"That's what I'm here for," Dies said."The offense just comes along."

Duane Davis, who has been a three-point sensation as of late, only put two points on the board — two free throws with three seconds left in the game to put K-State ahead by seven. But he tied his career-highs in assists with eight and steals with four. Davis said he didn't mind this group of final stats at all.

"Two points and eight assists adds up to 18 points for me," Davis said. "I wasn't right there scoring on offense, but it was OK."

Going into the Arizona game 9-0 was a confidence-builder for K-State, but the national champs proved to be too much for the Cats.

"They'll destroy you, and that's exactly what they did," Asbury said after K-State's first loss of the season.

K-State was down but with a chance, at 58-44 at halftime. But Arizona opened the second half with an unanswered 27-0 run.

"I think defensively we really made it difficult for Kansas State to run their offense," Olson said.

"We did a better job of creating turnovers than we did a good job of converting."

Arizona's Michael Dickerson was named tournament MVP, scoring 28 points. Davis led K-State with 22 points against Arizona. Rhodes had 14 and Swartzendruber added 10.

Focus on special teams proves successful in Fiesta Bowl win

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

From day one, the Wildcats opened practice with special teams work. For Tostitos Fiesta Bowl preparations, nothing changed.

Except, perhaps, the importance of the focus. This game brought Syracuse's return teams to the table, and the Orangemen's kickoff and punt return teams are No. 1 and No. 2 in the country, respectively.

However, with the exception of Orangeman Kyle Johnson shaking loose for a 55-yard return in the second quarter, Syracuse's special teams did not factor into the 35-18 K-State's victory.

Although the players said this game's preparation was the same as any other, Coach Bill Snyder did not ignore the hype about the Orangemen's special abilities when returning balls.

"They are very good on special teams," Snyder said. "Their return teams are among the very tops in the nation."

The coaches reminded the players daily about the Orangemen's return talents, Cat tight end Justin Swift said.

"They are making us very aware of the possibility of guys returning the ball on us," Swift said before the game. "We have watched a lot of tape on both their kickoff and punt return capabilities."

But Wildcat tight end Jarrett Grosdidier said it became personal.

"The coaches I've talked to are taking it personally, because our return teams are good, too," Grosdidier said before the Fiesta Bowl. "It's going to be interesting to see how they compare, and who's going to come out on top as the best."

Going into the game, the Cats sat at No. 4 in the nation in kickoff returns and No. 13 in punt returns.

Wildcat punt returners David Allen and Lamar Chapman both won Big 12 Special Teams Player of the Week during the season for special teams feats. Allen set a school record with 125 yards in punt returns against Texas A&M.

Allen made strides against the Orangemen, returning four punts for a total of 48 yards. His longest return was 33 yards. Cat kickoff returner Gerald Neasman took four kickoffs back 89 yards, with his longest being for 32 yards.

Lou Groza Award winner Martin Gramatica was given the first opportunity to put Cat points on the board, but his 52-yard attempt sailed wide left. A second chance came at the top of the second half, but the 44-yard attempt missed to the right.

For some kickers, these distances might present a challenge. But with Gramatica having hit three from 50-plus during the season, combined with the favorable weather conditions that evening, Snyder didn't give a second thought to sending him on the field.

"I always have great confidence that Martin can do it," Snyder said. "I will continue to have that confidence, but we're going to have to get it straightened out."

Although Snyder admitted he was displeased with missing the six points, he said he felt badly for Gramatica.

"Here's a guy that wins the award and all these great things are being said about him. He's as humble as he can possibly be," Snyder said. "I know it's not due to the fact that he's carrying around an extra hat size. He just didn't hit the ball well."

K-State quarterback Michael Bishop and Syracuse quarterback Donovan McNabb have similar styles. Their performances in the Fiesta Bowl, however, were very different.

Bishop still king

Michael Bishop had his hands full after the Wildcats defeated Syracuse 35-18 in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl on New Year's Eve. Bishop carried the game ball and the Most Valuable Offensive Player trophy while celebrating with teammates and fans.

STORY BY SAM FELSENFELD

K-State quarterback Michael Bishop found himself in the middle of quarterback battles all season long, and he didn't seem to mind the pressure.

During two-a-day practices, he went toe-to-toe with Jonathan Beasley and Adam Helm for the starting job. Beasley and Helm had a combined three years more experience in K-State coach Bill Snyder's system, yet Bishop still won the job.

Then, after establishing himself as a quarterback who could run, he won head-to-head battles with several of the nation's better mobile quarterbacks, including Ohio's Kareem Wilson, Missouri's Corby Jones and Zebbie Lethridge of Texas Tech.

His final exam came in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl against Syracuse's Donovan McNabb, a scrambling quarterback with a cannon for an arm, who has already been billed as one of the leading Heisman Trophy candidates for next season — that is, if he doesn't skip his senior year to enter the NFL draft, as he is considering doing.

Judging by the numbers, though, Bishop was the marquee quarterback playing in the game.

McNabb completed 16 of 39 passes for 271 yards, with no touchdowns and an interception. Bishop, on the other hand, went 14 of 23 for 317 yards and had a Fiesta Bowl record-tying four touchdown passes, against one interception.

"He did a great job. I didn't," a dejected McNabb said, slumped in his chair with his arms crossed at the postgame press conference.

Entering the game, Bishop was labeled the better runner, and McNabb was recognized as the more polished passer. Bishop clearly got the job done through the air, but McNabb one-upped him on the ground.

Bishop carried 15 times for 73 yards, an average of 4.9 yards a carry, while McNabb carried 16 times for 81 yards, an average of 5.1. That figure would have been 7.5 if not for two sacks.

Nonetheless, Bishop did the one thing a quarterback is supposed to do — lead his team to a victory.

"We knew he was a playmaker. We knew he wouldn't mind putting the weight of his team on his shoulders. He came out and really did a good job," Syracuse free safety Donovin Darius said. "In terms of directing the offense, he totally did a great job. My hat goes off to Michael Bishop."

Syracuse coach Paul Pasqualoni also took his hat off to Bishop. He said Bishop's performance didn't come as a surprise.

"We had a pretty good idea that Michael Bishop was good. Certainly (we) watched the film," Pasqualoni said. "I think Michael has had days where he's been exceptionally hot. I thought tonight he was very, very accurate."

The win improved Bishop's record in college to 35-1. Included in the total are two community-college national championships. The only loss came this season to Nebraska, which finished 13-0 and a co-national champion.

With his performance against the Orangemen, talk of "Bishop for Heisman in '98" developed — something he downplayed, but obviously enjoyed.

"I'm not worried about that right now," he said, with an ear-to-ear grin. "I'm going to celebrate the victory and go into the spring and work hard and improve on things I need to improve on."

Bishop's play earned him offensive player-of-the-game honors, and although he seemed to outshine his counterpart from Syracuse, McNabb had some success as well.

McNabb guided the Orangemen to 447 yards of total offense and 24 first downs, including one on a 41-yard pass play that allowed Syracuse to overcome a third-and-38 situation.

But Bishop led the Cats to 35 points to put the finishing touches on K-State's first 11-1 finish in the 102-year history of the school's football program. Not too bad, considering the Cats finished 0-11 in 1988 and 1-10 in 1989.

While Bishop was noticeably happy with his performance — he was playing with his player-of-the-game trophy during the post-game press conference — Snyder was pleased as well.

"I thought he threw the ball well. We knew we'd have to throw the ball going into this ballgame. This is not a football team you line up and knock around all day. You have to throw the ball to have a chance," Snyder said.

"That was a concern, because I think Mike was completing about 43 percent of his passes. That's not enough to beat a team like this. That wasn't the case tonight. I was awful pleased with his performance in the throwing game."

Syracuse blames referees for loss to bigger, better team

VIEWPOINT

SAM FELSENFELD

Sam is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Sam at sef8701@ksu.edu.

Here's my take on the game. Sure, you've read thousands of takes on the game, but here are three reasons to read this one.

1. I'm a K-State student, therefore, 2. I'll admit it — I'm a fan, and 3. I prefer a cup of freshly squeezed Orange to (Little) Apple juice any day of the week.

• Seems the 'Cuse is making excuses like an eighth-grader trying to get out of trouble for skipping school. It's busting out Kleenex and shedding tears about Darnell McDonald maybe stepping out of bounds on the 77-yard touchdown reception and — waaaaa — Eric Hickson really fumbled and — boo hoo hoo — the refs kicked the ball, keeping Donovan McNabb from recovering his own fumble.

I hate to play that same game — OK, OK, I love to play that same game — but try these 'cuses on for size, 'Cuse. If Martin's Automatica and if Mike Bishop doesn't throw that ill-advised, across-the-field I-N-T, you're looking at a 48-18 finish in favor of the purple.

• Speaking of Donnie Mac's so-called controversial fumble, guess he forgot he didn't have to drop the ball (without even being hit) in the first place.

• Just wondering, but is "'Cuse" short for "ex-cuse?"

• Here's the punchline, e-mail me with the joke: The Orangemen responded to Coach Paul Pasqualoni's halftime pep talk with 18 yards of total offense on 14 plays in the third quarter.

• The Cats, by giving up 46 fewer passing yards and four fewer touchdowns in the air than SU, won the battle of the d-backs. The Cats also won the battle of the D-Macs. We already know about the Orange QB, but D(arnell)-Mc(Donald) caught seven balls for a Fiesta Bowl record 206 yards, including a Fiesta Bowl record three touchdowns and 77-yard catch 'n' score. Also, D(amion)-Mc(Intosh) helped lead the Lynch Mob by anchoring the defensive line and recording half a sack along the way.

• You'd think it was the '80s and the Fiesta Bowl was still sponsored by Sunkist, the way the Cats squeezed the Orange down to the pulp.

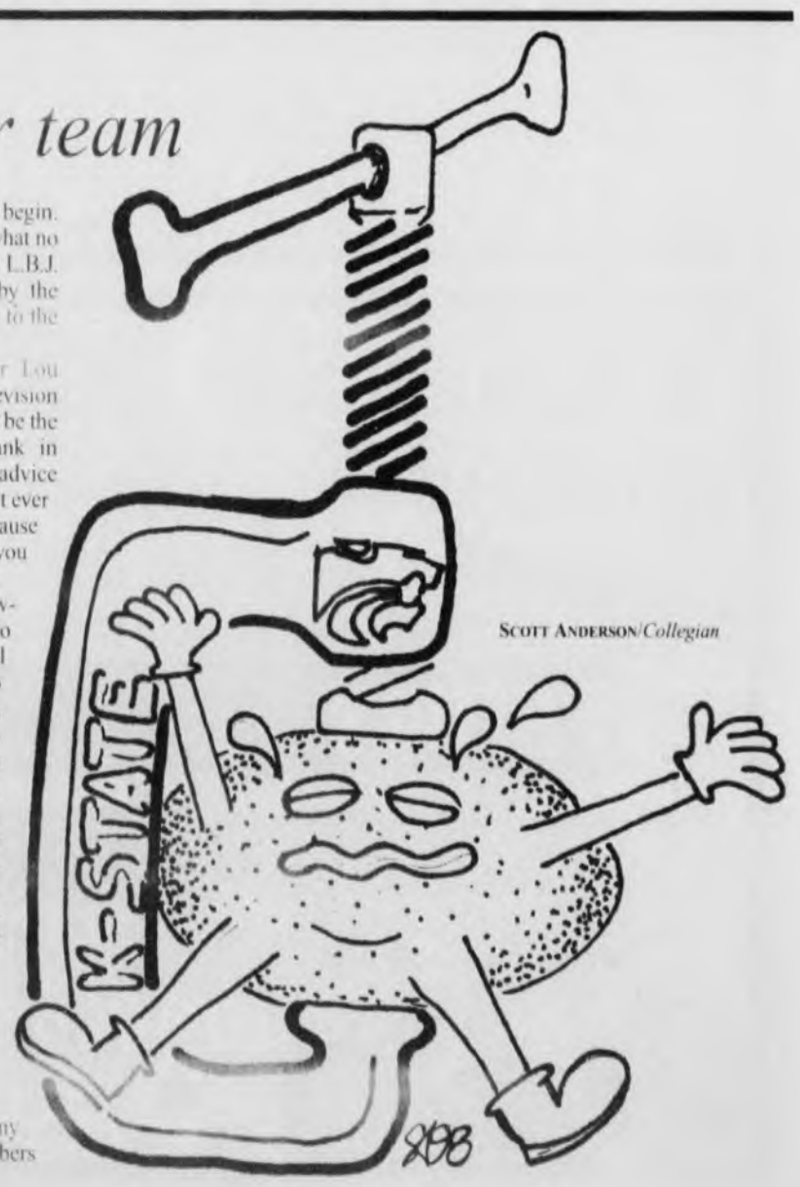
• Hey media people — yeah you, who voted the purple down to eighth, didn't you: 1. say Colorado was the one to beat, and 2. say don't mess with Texas, and 3. say the Irish were among America's finest and 4. say the Wolverines couldn't lead the pack?

Hate to break it to y'all (OK, OK, I love to break it to y'all), but in case you haven't played much billiards lately, the eight ball is black and the four ball is purple.

• Apparently, Bishop met McNabb at a Tempe disco a few nights before the game, but Donnie Mac didn't know who M.B. was. Well, now that the game (not to mention 317 M.B. yards through the air and five touchdowns accounted for by purple No. 7) has passed D-Mc by, allow me to do the introductions. No. 5, this here's Mr. Bishop. Mr. Bishop, he here goes by Dawn.

• Here's how you know you're in for a looong day/night/game: When you're on punt return (as the Orange were), and the opposing kicker shanks the punt (as K-State's James Garcia did) and it still goes for 50 yards without a return. This columnist is guessing that if Garcia nails it, it travels at least oh, say 51.

• One final thought on Dawn McNabb: He says he's considering skipping his senior year to play on Sundays (and we're not talking 'bout some church league). During the Fiesta Bowl, he was supposed to sell himself to the NFL scouts. Well, two bits of advice for you, D.M.: 1. Hope you're not planning on going into sales post-football, because you're sure not too good at it, and 2. NFL's gonna stand for Not For Long if you keep playing like that.



• Let the Hypesman race begin. If M.B. can do on Nov. 14 what no K-State QB has done since L.B.J. was president — getting by the Big Red — he'll take a trip to the Downtown Athletic Club.

• Sir K-State supporter Lou Holtz goes on national television and says Fiesta night would be the perfect time to rob a bank in Manhattan. Thanks for the advice Lou. Now here's mine: Don't ever go to the Little Apple, because you're not wanted, and you might not make it out alive.

• Finally, the foreshadower-of-the-year award goes to K-State d-back/special teamer Keith Black, who told this columnist last July, when the Cats were expected to lose to — in addition to the Red Army — CU, A&M and maybe Mizzou, the Chickenhawks, OU or Texas Tech, "I think this might be the best team K-State has ever had. We're going to surprise a lot of people.

I'm not saying we're going to win the national championship, but we're going to be a team to be reckoned with."

Hey Keith, buddy, any advice on those lotto numbers for next week?

SCOTT ANDERSON/Collegian

As strong as Ochs

Standout linebacker turns tide with 2 turnover recoveries

Wildcat linebacker Travis Ochs is a player Coach Bill Snyder has referred to as one of the most consistent performers on the team. And after recovering a fumble and intercepting a deflected ball in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl win, Ochs was the most understated player as well.

"Everybody worked real well together," Ochs said. "It's what teams are all about. Something you work for all your career, just to see everybody come together like that."

For his efforts, Ochs was named the defensive player of the game. And although both plays were crucial for the Cats, he insisted Lady Luck was holding his hand.

Ochs' first break occurred in the second half, as Syracuse was driving into K-State territory. A 41-yard pass from Orangeman quarterback Donovan McNabb to wide receiver Jim Turner put Syracuse on the K-State 38-yard line. After Syracuse running back Kyle McIntosh was knocked back a yard, the Orangemen were still within field-goal range.

McNabb's next pass, intended for tight end Roland Williams, was batted up by Cat linebacker Jeff Kelly. Ochs turned around and made the grab.

Something from earlier in the game signaled to the Cat defense coaches a new way to defend the play.

"I think it was maybe the first play of the game," Ochs said. "We didn't have an adjustment for it. Went off the sidelines."

But after the coaches' adjustments, Ochs said the team was in position to make the play.

"I'm not even sure who was on the tight end, Jeff (Kelly) or somebody," Ochs said. "He got the ball up in the air. I just happened to luckily be there and make the catch."

Ochs' somersault after the fumble recovery was primarily to maintain possession of the ball, he said. But Olympic judges would've handed him points for creative dramatics as well as technical merit.

"There was a little bit of style involved in that," Ochs said. "The main thing was, I didn't want to lose the ball, so I put all my hands around it, both of them, I guess."

Chuckling, Ochs admitted that after making the pick, he wasn't sure what to do next.

"Every interception I'd had, I'd fallen down right after it," Ochs said. "I saw McNabb coming off me. I figured, if I'm going down, I better take him with me."

In other words, if Ochs is going to compete in Olympic gymnastics, he'd have to be a doubles act.

"He got a little bit lower than me, and I did a little flip," Ochs said. "Worked out pretty well."

Ochs recovered his second turnover during crunch time in the fourth quarter.

In the last seven minutes of the game, Syracuse was only down by 10 and again in K-State territory. McNabb's 29-yard pass gave the Orangemen a first down on the K-State 17-yard line. From the shotgun, McNabb attempted to run to the left. He got four yards before dropping the ball — literally, Ochs said.

"It was just a draw of some sort," Ochs said. "I tried to keep outside, so he couldn't get outside of me. McNabb just dropped the ball. I don't know how he dropped it. It was at the ref's feet."

McNabb had little to say about his mistake.

"Misjudgment on my part," he said. "Should have protected the ball well, did not. Fumbled it."

Football games are won by field position and turnovers. Those two turnovers took away crucial field position from the Orangemen, something any coach would probably be thrilled with.

And Snyder said the Cats get places because of the way the team plays defense.

"That's our signature. That's our trademark," Snyder said.

But Syracuse's ability to close the gap to six points before halftime had the coach nervous. The Cat defense allowed only 18 yards and no points in the third quarter, an important factor in the victory, Snyder said.

"Defensively, we held on and really ate up some of the clock, gave the offense time to get together and jell," Snyder said. "We played good. Not as well as I would have liked, but the third quarter was very significant."

And with the Cats coming out on top, Ochs said this year is starting off better than 1997.

"I'd like to keep this feeling for a while," he said. "It's a real special feeling. I'm just going to enjoy it for a while."

16 cases of disease diagnosed at K-State in fall

ANDREA COREY
Kansas State Collegian

Last semester 16 cases of whooping cough were diagnosed on the K-State campus, said Guy Smith, medical director at Lafene Health Center.

Smith said the cases of whooping cough, or pertussis, were diagnosed in accordance with the fairly strict guidelines set forth by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Smith said the number isn't particularly high, since there were about the same number of cases each year in the past three years.

"The disease is probably still as dangerous as it ever was," James Urban, associate professor of microbiology, said.

But most of that danger isn't for adults, Smith said. While adults can get whooping cough, children are usually the victims and die far more often than adults.

"Kids can die — that's part of the emphasis here," Smith said.

Smith said the condition is generally overlooked in adults.

"Doctors in general don't look for it in adults, and you only find what you're looking for," he said.

Smith said part of the problem is that diagnosing whooping cough can be difficult.

"You can almost never say someone has pertussis unless you listen to the patient — you can diagnose it if you listen," he said.

A culture can show a patient has whooping cough, but only if the culture is taken within the first eight to 10 days of the illness. After that point, Smith said, diagnosing the disease based on a culture is difficult because it doesn't always show up.

Smith said it is best for students who have a severe cough to go to the doctor within the first eight to 10 days so they can be diagnosed. Though treatment with antibiotics within the first 10 days is best, later treatment can also help.

"There is a suspicion that treatment at any point may be beneficial," Smith said.

Nationwide, there has been an increase in the number of cases in adolescents and adults, because the vaccine most people receive around age 7 has worn off sufficiently enough to make adults susceptible.

While the time factor is important, another reason why more adults are seen with whooping cough is that the vaccine itself is not as effective as other vaccines.

"Notoriously, it's a poor vaccine," Urban said.

Smith said there is a new vaccine that will likely be available within the next 3 to 5 years. He added that it is also likely that the new vaccine will be given to adults.

WHOOPING COUGH: THE FACTS

Whooping cough, or pertussis, is a contagious disease of the upper respiratory tract. It can be spread by contact with discharge from the nose and throat of people infected with the disease.

Guy Smith, medical director at Lafene Health Center, said the simplest way to avoid whooping cough is for students to wash their hands often throughout the day, since people who cough often cover their mouths with their hands.

Initial symptoms are like those of the common cold — sneezing, runny nose, low-grade fever and a mild cough.

In the second stage of the illness, which ensues after two weeks, the cough is rapid and more severe. In adults, the cough is often followed by gagging, vomiting, fainting or breathlessness. In children, the cough is often followed by a high-pitched noise, a whoop, the sound the disease is named after.

Residency changes get regents approval

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State administrators are positive about a new regulation approved by the Kansas Board of Regents, even though it will decrease the amount of tuition they receive each year.

Regents approved the new guideline in December. It would allow families who leave the state to pay in-state tuition rates as long as they return within 12 months.

This proposal requires approval from the Kansas Legislature.

"The new guideline shows that we are a more caring institution," K-State Registrar Don Foster said.

Regents officials said the change would benefit Kansas residents who leave the state for only a short time.

"This new guideline was proposed for those families who do return to Kansas within 12 months and who were not in another state long enough to obtain residency," said Joe Barron, general counsel for the regents.

Full-time undergraduate students pay $1,037 in tuition and fees, while non-residents pay $3,558.80, Foster said.

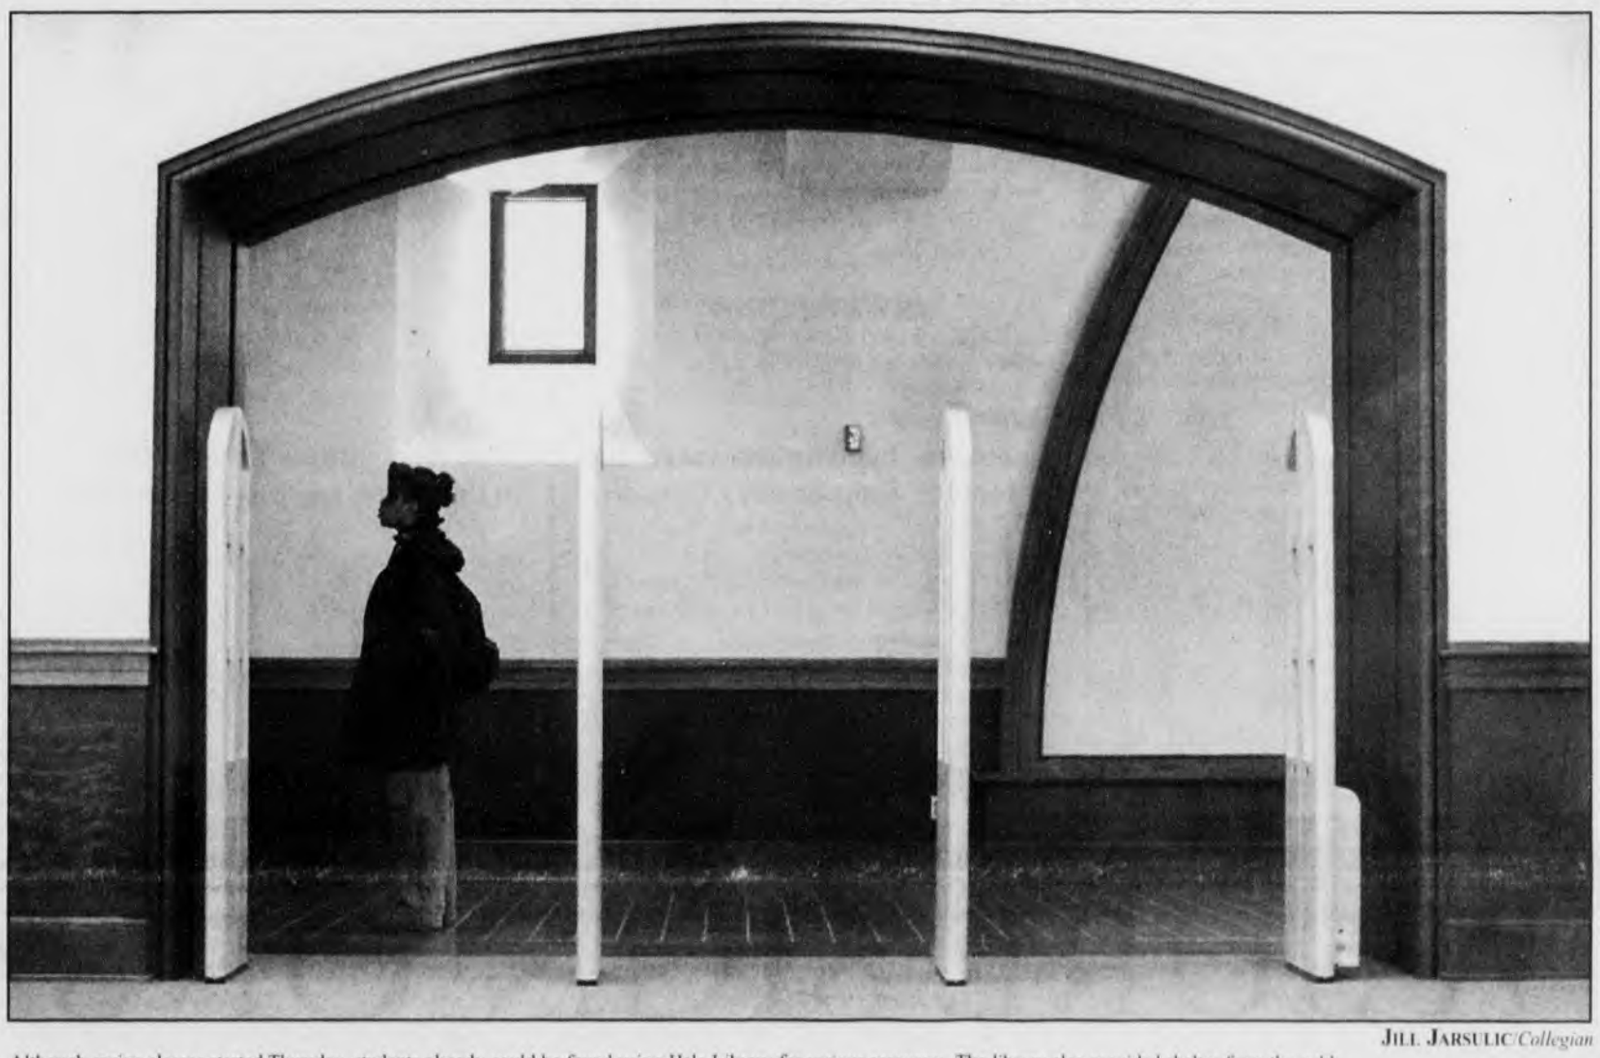
The $2,500 difference in tuition would cost K-State about $35,000 in tuition loss if the change is approved.

"It won't affect K-State that much because there aren't many students that fall into that category," Foster said.

The guideline was discussed and recommended to the regents by the Council of Presidents, a committee made up of the six presidents of regents universities.

"These changes were proposed to make the existing guidelines fair," Barron said.

The other changes approved by the regents will affect K-State even less tuition-wise because these changes were small clarifications of existing guidelines.



"They will clear up some situations that were difficult for students and may increase the amount of students who will come to K-State," Foster said.

Other proposed guidelines include:

• A student whose parents are divorced could maintain residency sta

ALL FOR A SLICE OF PIZZA

▶ CONSTRUCTION FOR SBARRO SHOULD BE COMPLETED FEB. 2.

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

Construction has begun on the K-State Student Union's pizza franchise in Union Station.

Despite delays and missing earlier deadlines, Union Director Bernard Pitts said Sbarro is expected to open Feb. 2.

Pitts said the delay in the pizza franchise's opening, which was originally scheduled for the end of October, occurred because of contract negotiations and a pizza oven that was built behind schedule.

For now, though, the project seems to be back on track, he said.

"The Sbarro trainer will come in the last week of January and the oven should be shipped out of New York on January 21," Pitts said.

Paul Stolle, Union food-services director, said the restaurant will serve pizza, stuffed pizza, spaghetti, baked ziti, Caesar salad, steamed vegetables, desserts and a variety of drinks. It will also offer daily specials.

The restaurant will be open Monday through Thursday from 11 a.m. until 7 p.m. and Friday from 11 a.m. until 3 p.m., but will be closed on Saturday and Sunday.

Stole said it will possibly be open outside of those hours for special events in Union Station.

The Union Stateroom will no longer serve pizza, because Sbarro will have exclusivity on that food item in the Union. Stolle said despite Sbarro's pizza monopoly, its prices will be lower than most Sbarro franchises.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

Construction is under way in the K-State Student Union for the Sbarro restaurant that is scheduled to open Feb. 2 in Union Station.

"My prices include sales tax though, so a slice of pizza could appear to be higher than the mall," Stolle said.

Sbarro will not fall under the Chartwell's company's Union food-service contract. Chartwell's now operates all food-service operations in the Union.

But Stolle will still have a piece of the pizza pie, serving as food-service director and, independently, as the franchisee of the new Sbarro outlet.

"The Union didn't want to be a Sbarro franchisee, so essentially I'm competing against myself," Stolle said.

In addition to its dine-in and take-out services, Sbarro will offer on-campus delivery next fall and will also have a catering brochure, Stolle said.

Union Governing Board Chairman Patrick Carney said he is glad Sbarro is finally here.

"I think they will be incredibly successful," Carney said.

"It will be a great place to hang out with entertainment, food, music and pool."

Manhattan resident preaces, practices diversity at Douglass Community Center

JON KURCHE

Don Slater admits to having plenty of time on his hands since he retired from teaching.

But he is still trying to better children's lives.

Slater now runs the Douglass Community Center. One of the center's programs is a non-profit math enrichment and homework assistance program for children.

"We're geared towards low income, but for the sake of diversity, we work with kids from all across town," he said.

But the Douglass Community Center didn't always make attempts at diversity. Built in 1903, the Douglass School was Manhattan's grade school for black children. Slater attended school there during the 1940s. When he was four years old in 1943, he was told to leave the public pool because of his skin color.

"I went down to the city park and was hanging on the fence and I was told to leave," Slater said. "They told me I was making the other kids feel bad."

Sunday marks the beginning of the 1998 Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week in Manhattan. One of this year's themes is "Our Civil Rights: Then and Now."

"We have to keep refreshing the kids' minds," said Slater, who serves on the Martin Luther King Jr. community task force. "I don't know anyone who's born prejudiced, they get it from somewhere. 1998 should be a year of forgiveness. You can't forget, but you can forgive."

Pat Hudgins, co-chairperson for K-State's Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week Committee, said she feels King's message is

Quote was hypothetical, taken out of context, Simpson says Thursday

LOS ANGELES — O.J. Simpson said Thursday he was merely speaking hypothetically — "as part of a scenario of things" — when he told Esquire magazine that if he had killed his former wife, he would have done it "because I loved her very much."

Simpson, in a rare live broadcast interview, also told ESPN the quote has been taken out of context.

"But of course they took this one thing out of the middle of there and made it (sound) as if it was an independent statement," Simpson said.

Simpson agreed to the interview on the sports cable channel's "Up Close" with no conditions placed on the subject matter.

In a session featuring vigorous exchanges between Simpson and host Chris Myers, Simpson denied he made what many construed as an oblique confession when he told Esquire: "Let's say I committed this crime. Even if I did do this, it would have to have been because I loved her very much, right?"

Simpson said he was "certainly not reexamining my position" when he spoke to Esquire, adding that he has made the statement many times before when discussing various theories in the case.

Study suggest organic chemicals contaminated Martian rocks

WASHINGTON D.C. — Organic chemicals found in a Martian rock might be contamination from Earth and not evidence of life on the Red Planet, new studies suggest. But NASA scientists say the reports "don't shake our belief one bit."

Laboratory studies at the University of Arizona, Tucson, and the Scripps Institute of Oceanography conclude that amino acids and carbon found in a rock from Mars probably got there after the rock landed on Earth and lay on Antarctic ice for thousands of years.

This disputes a theory led by two NASA scientists that found evidence that Martian microbes once lived inside the rock and left behind fossil-like blobs and organic chemicals.

"Neither paper changes our original hypothesis," said Everett K. Gibson Jr., a NASA researcher. "They don't shake our belief one bit."

Gibson and David S. McKay, both of the Johnson Space Center in Houston, announced in August 1996 that they had found evidence of life in a meteorite from Mars. The rock, called ALH84001, was found in an ice field in Antarctica and has been identified chemically as originating from Mars.

Tired Kaczynski undergoes test to determine competency for trial

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Hours before his apparent suicide attempt, a tired Theodore Kaczynski reluctantly agreed to keep his lawyers, despite their insistence on using a mental illness defense, according to court transcripts released Thursday.

"Your Honor, if this had happened a year and a half ago, I would probably have elected to represent myself," the Unabomber suspect said in the judge's chambers during a closed-door hearing Jan. 7.

"Now, after a year and a half with this, I'm too tired, and I really don't want to take on such a difficult task," Kaczynski said.

He then asked to be taken back to the Sacramento County jail. Marshals say he tried to hang himself in his cell that night with his underwear.

The next morning, the 55-year-old defendant brought the trial to a halt with his startling demand to represent himself.

On Thursday, Kaczynski was undergoing a court-ordered mental competency examination to determine whether he can stand trial. He faces a 10-count indictment accusing him of four Unabomber attacks, and if convicted could be sentenced to death.

Partially edited transcripts of closed-door hearings on Jan. 5 and Jan. 7 show U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. attempting to smooth over Kaczynski's disputes with his lawyers, Quin Denvir and Judy Clarke.

"I don't think it's likely that the matter can be resolved that easily," Kaczynski said. "My lawyers have suggested that I should make it clear to you what I want. And what I'm looking for is a change of counsel."

Texas settles lawsuit with tobacco industry, receives $14 billion

DALLAS — Texas agreed to drop its lawsuit against the tobacco industry Thursday for at least $14 billion, becoming the third state to strike a deal before going to trial, a source who requested anonymity told The Associated Press.

Jury selection, which had been scheduled to begin today in Texarkana, was delayed twice this week to give the lawyers more time to finish their deal. The court dismissed the panelists late Thursday.

The settlement is the biggest yet with the industry, nearly matching the combined $14.7 billion Florida and Mississippi already negotiated.

Texas sued eight tobacco companies and three trade groups in 1996 for reimbursement of about $8.6 billion in Medicaid funds spent on Texans' smoking-related illnesses dating to 1968. With damages, the lawsuit grew to $14 billion.

The state contended the companies broke state and federal laws that prohibit deceptive trade and fraud, manipulated nicotine levels to cause addiction and aimed advertising at children.

SGA election process to begin in less than 2 weeks

THE LOWDOWN

- Deadline for filing is Feb. 13.
- SGA election applications are available in the Office of Student Actvities and Services
- Presidential and vice presidential candidates can spend up to $815 on their campaigns. Senatorial or council candidates are limited to $50, and all other candidates are limited to $125.

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

It takes more than just signs and posters plastered across campus to become a member of the Student Governing Association.

In two weeks, applications for SGA candidates will be available in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

The deadline for filing the forms will be Feb. 13.

Students running for an SGA position must attend meetings to learn the rules of the election process. Student Senate Chair Jeff Dougan said candidates also learn what is expected of them as a member of SGA. He said students who are genuinely interested in SGA positions should research them first.

The meetings also inform candidates of the changes that have been made in the elections process this year.

SGA limits the amount of money students can spend on their campaigns. Student body president and vice president candidates can spend as much as $815. Union Governing Board, Board of Student Publications and Fine Arts Council candidates can spend as much as $125. Anyone running for Senate or a college council can spend as much as $50.

Dougan said one of the bigger changes concerns campaign violations.

In the past, candidates who committed a violation had to win a two-thirds confirmation vote by Student Senate after winning their respective races, Dougan said.

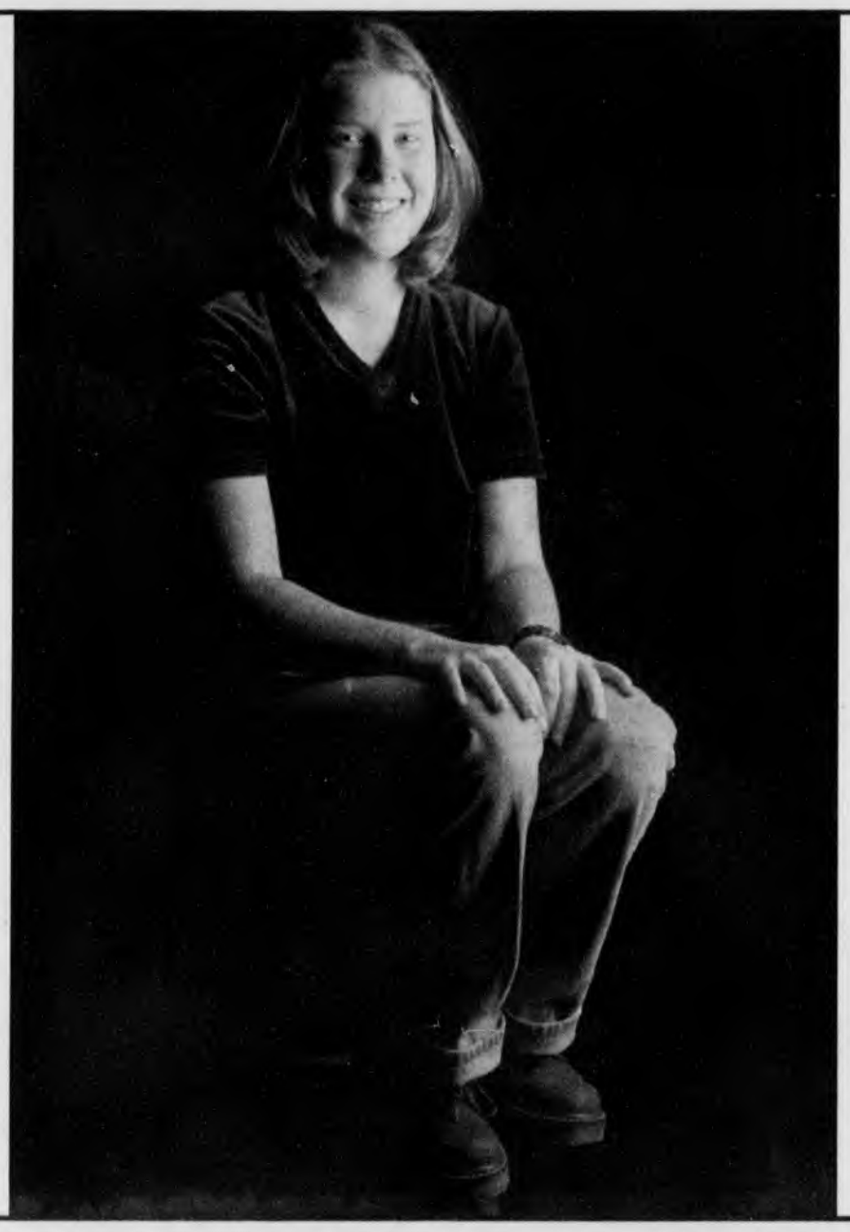
This year, violations will be split into serious and lesser offenses. For a lesser offense, candidates can be fined up to $10, but can still occupy a position in SGA if elected.

Candidates who commit serious offenses must still earn a two-thirds Senate vote.

"This a change we've wanted for a long time," Dougan said.

OSAS Coordinator Gayle Spencer said students should use their voting rights.

"If you don't exercise your right to vote, you are giving up an important voice for yourself," she said. "If people want to make a difference on campus, then they should run (for office) because that is the best way."



General elections will begin March 9 and continue through March 11. If a runoff election is needed for the student body presidential race, it will be conducted one week after general elections, Dougan said.

Voters will register at the polls with student IDs, a process that began with last fall's KSU Stadium expansion referendum. Students' ID cards will be checked by computer to prove voters' student status and to ensure that they only vote once during elections, Dougan said.

Voting stations will be set up in the K-State Student Union and in residence hall dining centers.

SGA has discretion over a $9 million budget composed mainly of student fees. Dougan said it is important for students to vote.

"It is very important that students elect responsible people to make the important decisions," he said.

A nice surprise

Sophomore in English named 1 of 20 McNair Scholars

story by Apryl Mathes

Sheyene Foster, sophomore in English, was caught off-guard by being named one of 20 McNair Scholars at K-State.

"I was surprised, sort of," she said. "Sometimes I'm not sure I'm in the right field to win something like this."

Foster is only the second English major to win the award since the establishment of the program in 1986.

The program was named for Robert McNair, an astronaut who died in the Challenger explosion. It benefits low-income or first-generation students, or students who are under-represented in graduate school.

"Criteria for selection include full-time enrollment with sophomore standing or above, U.S. residency status and a strong academic record with a least a 3.0 GPA," said Laura Boyer, assistant director of the McNair Scholar Program.

The program is federally funded by the Department of Education, with 99 programs operating nationwide.

The main purpose, Boyer said, is to offer a student direction and assistance to prepare the student for graduate school.

"It's more of a program than a scholarship," Boyer said. "It's a program to prepare students for post-graduate work."

Providing that assistance includes the opportunity for scholars to perform research in their field of study and to publish and present those results, she said.

"It's about practical experience, which is going to be very helpful when you're applying to graduate school," Boyer said. "We work with the scholar to help give experience presenting the information they've gained through experience."

There are also training sessions for the Graduate Record Examinations and other entrance exams, available grants and a stipend provided to allow research.

"It works out really well, because you don't have to worry about working in the summer while you're doing research," Foster said.

All the scholars are provided with a mentor, a K-State faculty member, who advises the students throughout their academic endeavors.

"They help to keep you on track," Foster said.

Boyer agreed the role of the mentor is imperative to the program's success.

"We do rely a great deal on mentors," Boyer said. "They work with the scholar during research, helping them design their program and focus of study. They are not only interested in their growth as a student but as a person prepared to enter graduate school."

Foster plans to obtain her master of fine arts and her doctorate.

Foster said she is keeping her options open as to which graduate school she will attend.

"I'm looking at the University of Washington in Seattle, Arizona State University and Emerson College in Boston," she said. "Pretty much the best place I can get into and still afford."

No,
I don't need money

Call home just to say "hi."

Wanna really surprise your parents? Why not flip your Wildcat Card over and follow the easy calling card instructions and call home just for the fun of it? And when they hear your sweet voice NOT asking for money, maybe they'll finally realize you're not the "irresponsible teenager" they once thought you were.

What a concept. Why worry about carrying cash or checks when there's an easier, safer way to make purchases. The Wildcat Card is the one card to carry for nearly all of your everyday needs. Use it to access your Wildcat checking account for books and supplies, for food and beverages, as a library card and in many campus vending machines. This card also allows access to your financial aid surplus. Transactions are debited directly from your account and detailed on one simple monthly statement.

That's not all. The Wildcat Card also works at many participating merchants off-campus and acts as a universal ATM card, giving you 24-hour access to your account in Manhattan and around the world. (And be sure to let your parents know that, with the Wildcat Card, they can deposit money directly into your account from their hometown bank, free of charge.)

It's that easy. So take the hassle-free way to get things done on- and off- campus—take advantage of the Wildcat Card. For more information call Commerce on campus at 532-3500 or the Campus Card Center at 532-6399.

Union should communicate with students on plans

The latest K-State Student Union announcement has a fully operational Sbarro franchise opening in Union Station on Feb. 2. This is welcome news, although planners definitely overshot the original completion date in October.

While Union planners meet with contractors and prepare to announce a framework for the phase-by-phase renovation of the Union, they should be realistic about the time table and strictly adhere to the plan they set.

Delays do happen, but after a period of almost constant construction and renovation on campus (Hale Library and Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art to name two projects), campus planners should understand the advantages of increased communication with students.

The Union enhancement project will benefit students in the long run, but, although the work can generally be done one part at a time, students will be inconvenienced. Planners should understand the importance of informing the campus when projects are set to start and be completed.

The overhaul of high-traffic areas such as the Union Stateroom into a food-court atmosphere, an upgrade to the bookstore and changes to the information counter area require serious consideration of student access and redirection of that access.

If construction falls behind, Bernard Pitts, director of the Union, should announce the delays as soon as possible.

The Union is the host of the campus and a business. When a business such as Sbarro or a section of the Union Stateroom is closed, it cannot make money.

Vague schedule information and confusing expectations of when a section or business operating within the Union will be open or closed contributes to frustration about the Union as a whole.

Traffic flows can be redirected when there is open communication between the Union director and students who use the facility.

Questions surround the cause of frog DEFORMITIES

VIEWPOINT

PAUL ROBBEN

Paul is a senior in chemistry. You can send e-mail to Paul at vladi@ksu.edu.

With the timely reintroduction of Frogger, the classic video game of the '80s, in 64-bit format, it's fitting to explore the plight of his real-world cousins. Not surprisingly, many of them face the same hurdles, such as busy roads, that must be crossed to reach ponds in which to lay eggs, and predation once they reach the ponds.

One issue a contemporary frog must worry about, which will never plague the electronic version, also illustrates the need for more members of society to make themselves aware of the true state of the world. Keeping up to date with the world often requires shutting down the PlayStation or Nintendo, but it's worth it. An informed populace is the foundation for a society that responds responsibly, yet not hysterically, to world problems.

Although naturalists have reported wild frogs and salamanders with five legs or other such gross deformities for more than 250 years, deformed frogs were found at 174 sites in 54 of Minnesota's 87 counties between August 1995 and March 1997.

Previous evidence indicated a noticeable increase in the number of deformed frogs being reported, but the supposed increase in the level of deformities was not "dramatic" until elementary students from South Central Minnesota reported finding a number of deformed frogs during the summer 1996 studies of Minnesota wetland environments.

Catapulted into living rooms across the nation via national news reports, the deformed anurans (including nine-legged frogs and frogs with three eyes) had found poster children, and researchers studying amphibians had found a pot of gold. Reports began to pour in from around the nation. Minnesota's neighbors checked their ponds first, with the entire Great Lakes region reporting deformed frogs, even as far away as Vermont and Quebec. Researchers in Northern California soon found unusually high levels of deformities in Pacific tree frogs and long-toed salamanders.

One researcher, David M. Hoppe of the University of Minnesota, claims to have only seen two frogs with visible limb deformities before 1996 and nearly 200 in 1996 alone. Many researchers began lending their names to references to the "miner's canary," and statements that imply global environmental catastrophe. Stanley Sessions, biologist at Hartwick College, summed it up with the words, "I have never seen a scientific or biological phenomenon grow so fast with so few publications."

At this point, however, the critical thinker begins to ask difficult questions such as: What is the normal number of deformed frogs in these amphibian populations? Is it possible that researchers such as Hoppe are simply seeing more deformed frogs because there's an increased interest in finding them?

What is causing the unusual level of deformations (if the level is unusual)? How can someone label deformed frogs as predictors of environmental catastrophe, when one doesn't know for certain what's causing the deformations?

These are difficult questions. If you do not represent the Environmental Protection Agency, are not a researcher who needs funding or are not entirely sure what an anuran is, a hasty retreat to the fantasy world of Frogger is much more appealing than trying to wade through the arguments of those with an immediate, vested interest in the situation.

Slowly but surely, though, decisions will be made, policies will be formulated and laws will be written, based on the opinions of those whose livelihood depends on the outcomes. When this is the case, one might as well hand off the joystick, because the public isn't going to win. When the public loses, we become the frog bounding through the rush of traffic, barely able to defend ourselves from those who will spend our resources and set public policy without regard to public opinion.

Preventing this requires finding answers. Fortunately, finding answers to such questions requires surprisingly small efforts. A 30-minute trip to a small town's public library yielded all the information I've used here, including answers to the questions posed above. For example, whether the level of deformations has increased is difficult to determine. Little historical data exists, only isolated reports and descriptions.

Assuming a researcher such as Hoppe is not attempting bold-faced deception, is it likely there has indeed been a recent upswing in the numbers of frogs that develop abnormally? In situations such as this, is it typically beneficial to provide the benefit of the doubt to the faction that can produce physical evidence? And even the new 64-bit Frogger will probably not include the nine-legged Frogger option (but you might try up-up-down-down-left-right-left-right-b-a).

The cause of the deformations remains undetermined, and several theories have been formulated. Leading theories explaining the deformities include: parasitic infestation of amphibian embryos, exposure of embryos to ultraviolet light, and the presence of yet-to-be characterized pollutants in the environment. All three factors could give rise to deformities in developing frogs, and increases in the intensity at which any of the three factors is present in the natural environment are very possible.

Knowing what you now know, I challenge you to follow the media coverage of this issue and collect a diverse representation of views. Of particular interest will be which theory garners the most media coverage, which theory is best supported by the scientific evidence collected — and whether they are the same.

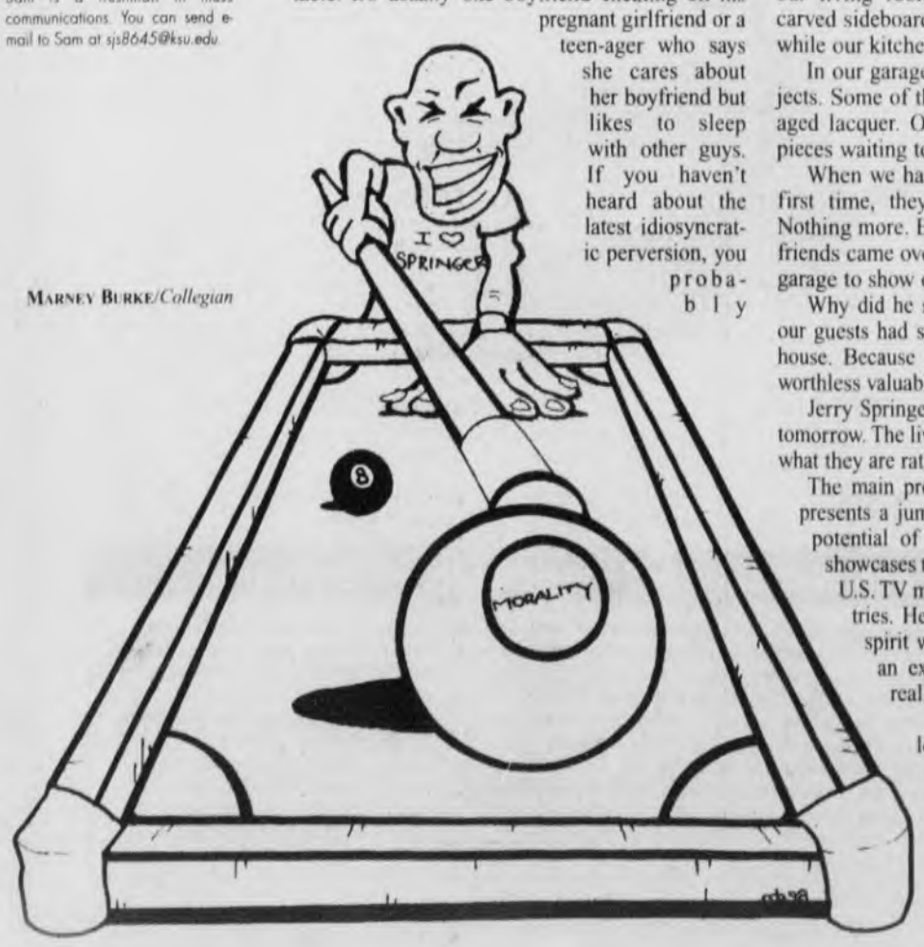
No virtue in television, entertainment

VIEWPOINT



SAM SACKETT

Sam is a freshman in mass communications. You can send e-mail to Sam at sjs8645@ksu.edu.

Moral decay pervades the realm of entertainment. Don't worry, this is not the typical right-wing, conservative viewpoint against Hollywood and the television and movie industry.

While I do agree with most conservative viewpoints, I am talking about a deeper quality or virtue.

Take television, specifically the ever-so-popular "Jerry Springer Show." This TV show displays individuals whose disheveled lives become a spectacle. It's usually one boyfriend cheating on his pregnant girlfriend or a teen-ager who says she cares about her boyfriend but likes to sleep with other guys. If you haven't heard about the latest idiosyncratic perversion, you probably haven't watched "Springer" this week.

MARNEY BURKE/Collegian

Growing up in the little Uniontown, Kan., I remember having company over for dinner. Before their arrival, my brother, sister and I would be instructed to "clean house." This meant tidying up the living room, picking up our toys and vacuuming the carpet. My parents wanted our best to show.

My father started the hobby of refinishing antique furniture in his garage. After some time, our living room began filling with beautifully carved sideboards and etched, stacking bookcases, while our kitchen acquired a round oak table.

In our garage, however, sat his unfinished projects. Some of the furniture was nearly black with aged lacquer. Other furniture was broken and in pieces waiting to be repaired.

When we had a family over for dinner for the first time, they saw the inside of our house. Nothing more. But when our relatives and familiar friends came over, Dad would take them out to the garage to show off his latest project.

Why did he show his messed-up junk? Because our guests had seen the quality of what was in our house. Because dad had experience in making the worthless valuable. He knew what its potential was.

Jerry Springer's show offers no hope for a better tomorrow. The lives that are displayed in pieces show what they are rather than what they could be.

The main problem in Springer's show is that it presents a jumbled life without showing hope or potential of being made beautiful. Rather, he showcases the worst of society in more than 150 U.S. TV markets and more than 30 other countries. He delivers the poverty of the human spirit wrapped in a package of mirth. It is an exhibit of how distorted people can really become.

Regardless of whether the problems Springer's guests claim are authentic is extraneous to my point. Why do audiences want to be entertained by cheap and twisted topics? I wonder if shows like this help bring America down, or if it's a reflection of where we truthfully are today?

Viewers are slowly desensitizing their minds and eventually their moral fiber by viewing serious problems as something to be publicly mocked. I am someone who enjoys finding humor in life's tough situations. I believe humor is a God-given gift to help us on our journeys through life. But this entertainment has become so twisted that it damages our virtues.

Have people forgotten this country rose to greatness in part because of self-preservation? In this self-preservation, we as Americans try to survive and better ourselves and society. While Springer's TV audience might not feel the effect of the garbage being infiltrated through their minds, eventually they will.

It is through this self-preservation that entertainment has been given the "freedom" it has to air the "Jerry Springer Show" and others like it. If we continue walking away from self-improvement, it will not be long until we are left with a useless society.

Springer fans will probably laugh and shrug off people like me, but the effects of this moral filth saturating this country through television and movies will be hard-felt. We have enough problems to deal with in each of our lives. Adding more problems can only weigh us down.

It was William J. Bennett who said, " ... the good requires constant reinforcement and the bad needs only permission." (The Washington Post, Feb. 29, 1996)

My reason for discussing the lack of moral excellence in entertainment is because I believe those (some of you, my friends) that live for this type of entertainment are important. You might think you are living the life now; but until Christ sets you free, all you've done is lived a death.

About A.D. 60 a prisoner in Rome wrote, "And whatever you do, whether in word or deed, do it all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, giving thanks to God the Father through him." (Colossians 3:10)

I believe we have something better to live for. I happen to be optimistic to believe most Americans are not as apathetic as they often appear to be. Somehow, my opinion might help them find a happier and more fulfilling life.

It is Jesus Christ who offers this life. It is we who decide if we want to take it.

Hopper has wrong definition of freedom

Editor,

Somewhere along the line, Scott Hopper must have developed a definition for freedom that sounds something like: the ability to do whatever you want, whenever you want and however you want, regardless of the circumstances.

Fortunately for the rest of us, his "freedom" does not, and should not, exist. The United States is as free as it could possibly be considering the important fact that Hopper seemed to overlook: This country is more diverse than any other country in the world. Because of that diversity, it is not possible for everyone to have the level of "freedom" Hopper desires.

Society as a whole must establish accepted norms and standards (a.k.a. laws) for most of the population to live the lives they choose. I personally would never want to see drugs legalized or the drinking age lowered.

Does this impede others' freedom? Absolutely. Am I personally happy with all of these restrictions? Absolutely not. (For example, I believe gun laws are an infringement on one of our most basic freedoms.)

But here is the difference between the United States and most other nations: If I don't like a law, I can actively join or form interest groups and talk to my representatives in Congress to try to change the laws. The freedom we have as individuals to change our country is not replicated anywhere in the world.

In conclusion, like Hopper, I, too, lived in Europe for several years (Germany, Italy, Bosnia), and by no means does the line "Europe is freedom" hold any truth. Most of Scandinavia is socialist, Germany and France are two of the largest welfare states in the world (i.e. almost socialist) and eastern Europe is mostly poverty stricken as it attempts to rebuild.

I must not even mention the former Yugoslavia, unless you consider the "freedom" to dodge land mines something to strive for. But, be all that as it may, I honestly loved my time in Europe, and I do miss driving 120 down the German autobahns. But I wouldn't trade the freedoms I have in this country for anything else in the world.

Sincerely,

Bill Zawrotny

Development committee reviews results of forum

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Uncertainty seems to describe the condition K-State's Campus Development Committee is facing after its December public forum that raised a handful of new issues.

The committee met Thursday to discuss the results of the forum and to set a course of work for the spring semester. Although the committee has developed a master planning document, "Campus Planning: People, Principles, and Process," many questions remain to be answered before the document will become official.

Such as: Should K-State commit itself solely to a philosophical master plan or should it develop a physical plan as well? How do campus planners embrace local residents' concerns before making decisions that could affect them? What is the best way for the campus at large to access their representatives on the committee to give input on projects? And, finally, can the committee itself begin to make official recommendations to the administration, as opposed to the informal — almost unestablished — link between the two now?

Richard Hayter, committee chair and associate dean of engineering for external affairs, said the forum raised the subject of hiring a professional planner to work with university planners and the committee. He asked if that was an issue the committee should discuss.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, said the university must first develop a more comprehensive map of what exists, such as buildings, sidewalks, parking lots and utilities. He said K-State has an estimate of $150,000 on the costs of mapping, but that costs would be higher for a professional planner's involvement.

"There would be a half-million-dollar request to do a mapping of the campus and to hire a professional consultant of some renown to develop a master plan for the campus," Taussig said. "That is already under way."

The development of a philosophical master plan involves setting design guidelines, such as an attention to green space, parking and context and implementing the plan for use with new development projects. It has been an ongoing project for the committee and it is hoped that an official document will be ready by the end of this semester.

A physical plan, which has become a new discussion for the committee, differs from a philosophical plan in that it suggests actual building sites, building masses and spatial relationships for the campus. It would be like having a scale model of what the campus could look like in 10, 20 or more years.

Facilities planning staff then voiced concern about consideration of developing a physical plan.

"Things seem to be so dynamic here," Taussig said, referring to the recent wave of campus development such as the planned alumni center, the Durland Hall expansion and the planned expansion of Ackert Hall.

Helen Cooper, assistant director of facilities planning, said a physical plan is difficult because no one knows what facilities will be needed and where they will be needed.

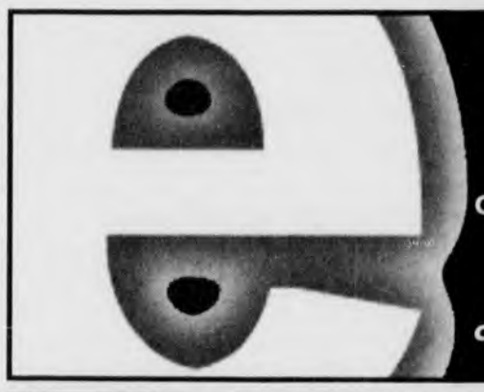
"It's easy to put those little boxes there, but we don't know what our direction will be or what our needs will be," Cooper said, referring to a physical plan's dependence on boxes to represent future buildings.

The committee also spent much of its meeting discussing outreach with campus community members and communication with the administration.

Hayter asked if faculty of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design should be invited to participate in the process. Dennis Law, dean of the college, serves on the committee but was not present at Thursday's meeting.

That college's faculty has had a sometimes bumpy relationship with K-State administration about how planning and development are conducted on campus. This remains an issue seeking resolution, but a dialogue has begun on the committee.

Anthony Crawford, university archivist and a Faculty Senate representative to the committee, said he thinks it's unfortunate the committee has an almost adversarial relationship with architecture faculty. He also said the committee needs to seek ways to inform the campus on a regular basis about development issues.



"This committee needs to be informed about what's going on so we can inform our constituents and influence the outcome," Crawford said.

Jane Rowlett, representing the provost's office, said she would like to see the committee make recommendations to Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance. The committee falls under Rawson's jurisdiction.

"I don't know that that's ever happened since I've served on this committee," Rowlett said. "If this committee has official recommendations, it's important for those recommendations to go to Tom and that they should go forward."

Hayter said be agreed.

The next committee meeting is set for 9 a.m. Feb. 3 in the Office of Facilities Planning in Dykstra Hall.

Cavalleria rusticana, or "rustic chivalry," features music by Pietro Mascagni and is based on a play by Giovanni Verga. Set in Sicily on Easter Sunday, it is the tale of a peasant girl who fears that the man she loves is having an affair with a married woman. Holiday joy turns to bitter sorrow when the woman's husband challenges the girl's boyfriend to a duel.
Continuing the theme of passion and adultery, Ruggiero Leoncavallo's I pagliacci, "the strolling players," is an opera-within-an-opera. The tale told by a commedia dell'arte troupe takes on a life of its own, bringing tragedy to the actors.
These are operas in the grand tradition -- sung in Italian and performed with full orchestra. With English-language supertitles you won't miss a word.

TCU's Nailon suspended for 1 game following assault plea

FORT WORTH, Texas — Texas Christian center Lee Nailon was suspended for one game after pleading no contest to a misdemeanor assault charge for hitting his girlfriend, Coach Billy Tubbs said Thursday.

Nailon, the NCAA's fourth-leading scorer at 25.3 points per game, will miss Saturday night's game at San Diego State.

Marti Bell told police that on Jan. 6 Nailon attempted to choke her, hit her in the face and threw her into a wall of his dormitory room, where she also had been living.

Bell said Nailon then called a TCU coach. Assistants Brian Fish and Steve McClain came to the dorm room to talk to them, urging her not to contact police, she told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. The 18-year-old Bell filed her complaint four days later.

On Wednesday, County Criminal Judge Mamie Bush Johnson sentenced Nailon to one year of adjudicated probation and ordered him to attend anger-control counseling and pay $165 in court costs. He could have been jailed for one year and fined $4,000 for the Class A misdemeanor. A prosecutor said the punishment was typical for a first-time offender.

Tubbs said the 6-foot-9 junior from South Bend, Ind., would also face further team punishment, although he declined to be specific.

Tubbs attacked critics who contend the punishment was too lenient.

"I think a lot of critics out there probably would have liked to ... put him on a training table and drive a stake through his heart," Tubbs said. "Those critics out there don't know what happened."

Nailon set the school's single-game scoring record last month with a 53-point night against Mississippi Valley State.

Bell said she is satisfied with Nailon's punishment and hopes to work it out with him.

"I still love Lee and I forgive him for everything he's done," Bell told the Star-Telegram. "He just has a problem controlling his anger and he needs help with that."

In a statement, defense attorney Tom Hill called the dispute "a misunderstanding between two young people, and what actually happened is in dispute."

Sgt. Judy Jones, supervisor of the Fort Worth police sexual assault and family violence unit, declined Thursday to reveal any conflicts between the statements made by Nailon and Bell.

"It's enough that he has pleaded no contest and taken responsibility," she said.

Broncos have crisp initial workout

DENVER — Having put some of the maddening Super Bowl distractions behind them, the Denver Broncos had their first pre-Super Bowl practice on Thursday, a 90-minute workout Coach Mike Shanahan called "great."

The Broncos emerged injury-free from Sunday's 24-21 victory over Pittsburgh in the AFC title game, and all players were full-go for the Thursday workout.

"We had a great practice with great concentration," Shanahan said. "The tempo was really good. We began putting our game plan in. Our players came in to work, they weren't there to just go through the motions. I was really pleased with today."

Shanahan urged his players to spend the early part of the week firming up travel and accommodation plans for family and friends.

"We got a lot of the distractions out of the way in the last couple of days," he said. "I think our players feel a lot more comfortable than they did two days ago. By that I mean, usually after the championship game there are so many questions from so many people about tickets, rooms, when families should arrive — that type of thing.

"At least, we were able to answer some of those questions so they could concentrate on the job at hand today. That's part of Super Bowl week and the Super Bowl hype, how to handle those distractions."

The euphoria of winning the AFC title seemed to have lifted.

"I think that's really over with," Shanahan said. "It was nice to celebrate for a couple of days. Right now, our focus is Green Bay."

The Broncos will practice again on Friday and Saturday, then depart Sunday afternoon for San Diego.

Madden will work as commentator for Fox for at least another 5 years

NEW YORK — John Madden signed a new five-year deal on Thursday to remain the lead NFL analyst for Fox, ending speculation he might leave for ABC's "Monday Night Football."

"I enjoyed being a part of Fox Sports' growth over the last four years, so why not five more?" Madden, an 11-time Emmy Award winner, said in a statement. "In 1993, Rupert Murdoch had the foresight to put together something very special, and this week, he stepped up again to keep it going."

The deal means Madden, 61, once again will team up with Pat Summerall. The duo have been broadcasting games together for 17 seasons.

Madden, who became a free agent following the NFC championship game, had expressed interest in moving to ABC.

Terms of the deal were not announced, but Madden's first deal with Fox was for $32 million over four years.

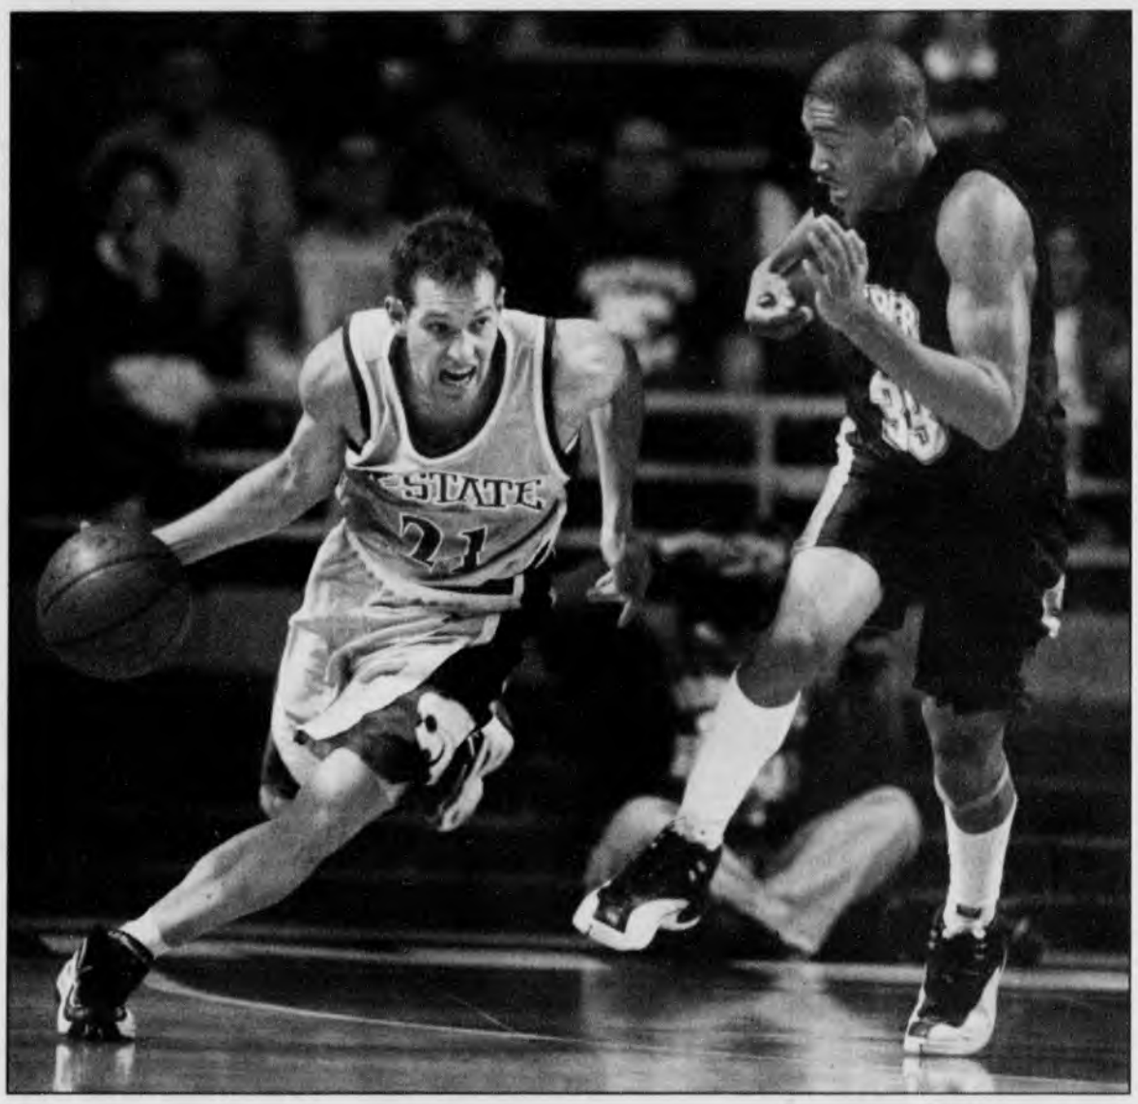
On Monday, Fox retained the rights to its NFC Sunday afternoon package, signing a $4.4 billion, eight-year contract with the NFL. The league will collect at least $17.6 billion from its new TV package with four networks.

CBS took the AFC Sunday afternoon package away from NBC with a $4 billion, eight-year deal, while ABC retained the Monday night package ($4.4 billion over eight years) and ESPN grabbed the entire Sunday night package ($4.8 billion over eight years).

Klesko and Higginson get big deals as 79 players file for arbitration

NEW YORK — On one of the days baseball owners hate most, Atlanta's Ryan Klesko and Detroit's Bobby Higginson got big-money four-year contracts as 79 players filed Thursday for salary arbitration.

Klesko, an outfielder eligible for free agency after the 1999 season, got a $20.5 million, four-year contract that pays him $3.5 million this year, $4.75 million in 2000, $5.75 million in 2001 and $6.5 million in 2002.



Higginson, an outfielder eligible for arbitration for the first time, received a $16 million, four-year deal that gives him a $100,000 signing bonus, $2.4 million in 1998, $3.8 million in 1999, $4.4 million in 2000 and $5.3 million in 2001.

Many of the top players who had been eligible for arbitration settled even before filing this offseason. Late Wednesday night, pitcher Pedro Astacio and Colorado agreed to a $23.3 million, four-year contract.

Among free agents, the Chicago Cubs picked up a closer, agreeing to a $4 million, one-year contract with Rod Beck that includes a $5.5 million team option for 1999.

SUN DEE MILLS

It's just another game.

Not to K-State or Kansas fans or ex-Kansas star Wilt Chamberlain, perhaps. But to the Wildcat basketball team, meeting the Jayhawks in Allen Fieldhouse on Saturday is just another road game.

That's not to say it's not important. Big 12 road wins have eluded the Cats up to this point. During winter break, the Cats dropped winnable games at Oklahoma and Baylor.

And although No. 3 Kansas presents more problems than any other team the Cats have seen thus far except Arizona, the Cats are only concerned about one thing — getting a road win.

"We need that win because we need all wins at this point," Coach Tom Asbury said. "We're trying to position ourselves for postseason play."

The Cats were picked to finish dead last in the Big 12 during preseason, so NCAA Tournament berths were a dream in November. With an 11-3 record, though, that dream has evolved into a probable reality.

Wins over Kansas and Texas Tech on Jan. 21 would be a tremendous confidence-booster as well as a step toward the coveted NCAA bid, sophomore Josh Reid said.

"Hopefully, we can get a couple on the road now," Reid said. "We'll definitely need that for the NCAA Tournament."

Asbury said in the previous Big 12 road games, Oklahoma guard Corey Brewer and Baylor center Brian Skinner were the influencing factors in the losses.

And the lineup of superstar opponents doesn't get any easier.

"They've (Kansas) got two of the top five players in America, and I can't say they've ever had that situation," Asbury said. "Brewer and Skinner were the difference in the Oklahoma and Baylor games, and they're just two of the top Big 12 players."

One of those players, senior forward Raef LaFrentz, will be sitting on the bench with a broken finger suffered Dec. 26 in Hawaii when the Hawks were preparing for the Rainbow Classic. His absence means nothing to the Hawks' success, said junior forward Manny Dies.

"I don't think it's different (without LaFrentz)," he said. "They have others. Lester Earl's a good player, and it's going to be a good game."

Junior forward Paul Pierce and true freshman Eric Chenowith have stepped in to fill LaFrentz's shoes. The two combined for 31 points in the Hawks' 83-65 victory over Texas A&M on Wednesday.

Down 45-37 at halftime, the Hawks took defensive control in the second half, opening with a 12-2 run after the break. But Asbury said he has it on authority that things are different this season.

"Roy (Williams, Kansas coach) says their defense hasn't been quite as good without (guard Jacque) Vaughn," he said. "But if they're not as good defensively, it's negligible."

Asbury said the pressure defense Arizona used will be a good teaching tool for the Kansas game. To assist the Cats with strength inside, he said the starting lineup of junior Manny Dies, junior Ty Sims and junior Shawn Rhodes will likely be used.

Harris leads Wildcats against Huskers

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

There were many question marks surrounding the K-State women's basketball team entering the 1997-98 season.

Although the Wildcats were coming off a 19-win season and a trip to the NCAA Tournament, K-State returned only four players from the 1996-97 squad.

Seven newcomers to the program, including five freshmen, would have to assert themselves if the Cats were going to remain competitive.

Two of those freshmen have stepped forward and taken critical roles with the team. Guard Kim Woodlee has started all 13 games for the Wildcats and forward Brandy Harris has started 10.

Harris, who was an all-state volleyball and basketball player at East Central High School in Tulsa, Okla., has led the Cats in scoring in the past two games. Her 16-point performance in a 53-47 win against Kansas on Jan. 7 was a career high.

For six days.

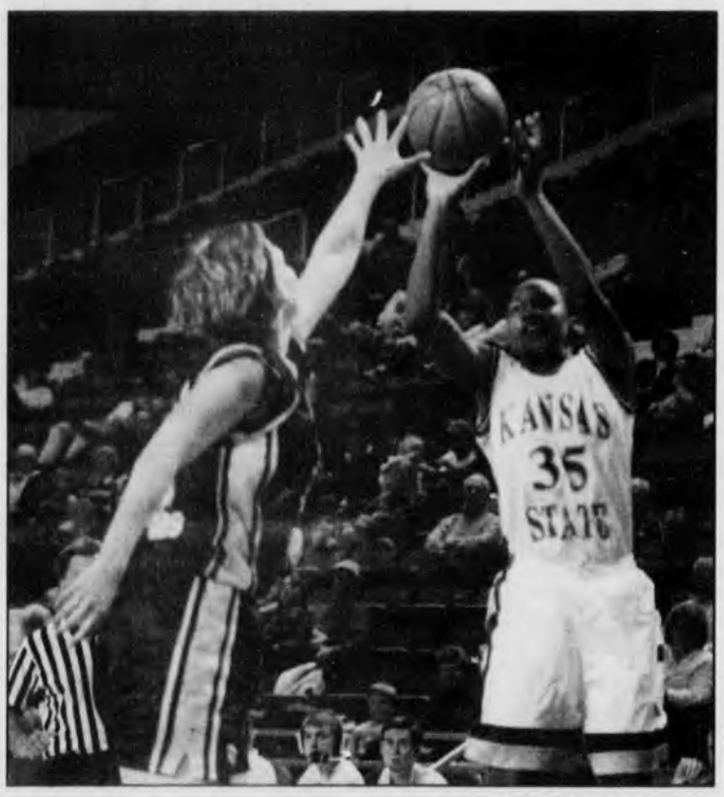
In K-State's next game, Tuesday night against Missouri in Columbia, Harris scored 14 of her new career-high 18 points in the second half. She also led the club with nine rebounds. She and forward Angie Finkes are tied for second on the team with 4.7 rebounds per game.

"I feel a lot more comfortable than I did at the beginning of the season," Harris said. "I was nervous. All I could think about was, 'I'm a freshman. I'm not supposed to be doing this or that.' Now I'm just going to go out and do what I know I can do and be a good teammate."

With her performance in the past two games, Harris is now fourth on the team, averaging 9.7 points per game.

K-State head coach Deb Patterson has been pleased with the progress Harris is making.

"I believe she's going to be a great player in this league," Patterson said. "She's got a great career ahead of her."



Harris said her hustle and aggressive play, especially on the boards, sets the tone for the rest of her game and her teammates.

"I just try to make it a point to go out and play with intensity and rebound," Harris said. "We don't win games if we don't rebound. I try to (set an example) and try to get other people into it if we're not into it."

Her play has made other coaches in the Big 12 notice her, realizing they will have to face her for another three years.

"She's going to be a great player," Missouri head coach Joann Rutherford said. "She's got some quick moves. She's just got to get under control better, but she's going to be a nice athlete."

Harris hopes to continue her solid play Saturday, when the 7-6 (1-2 Big 12) Cats take on No. 20 Nebraska (13-5, 2-2) at 7 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum. This is the second meeting of the season between the two teams.

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

Nebraska won the first encounter 80-58 on Jan. 4 in Lincoln, Neb. The Cats led by three at halftime, but shot a season-low 30.8 percent in the second half, getting outscored 48-23.

Senior guard Anna DeForge leads the Cornhuskers and is fourth in the Big 12 in scoring, averaging 17.3 points per game. The Huskers were 19-9 last season, but first-year head coach Paul Sanderford has guided the Huskers into the top 25.

Track team prepares for Wildcat Invitational

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State track team is no stranger to world-class athletes. Former Wildcat Kenny Harrison captured the gold medal in the triple jump of the 1996 Olympics, and former Wildcat athlete and K-State assistant coach Steve Fritz placed fourth in the 1996 Olympic decathlon.

Although K-State has had some great individual performers, Coach Cliff Rovelto said K-State has not had many teams better than this season's squad.

"I think the men's team is probably the best team we've ever had," Rovelto said. "When you talk about a true dual meet, in my mind both our teams are truly top-10 teams in the country."

The K-State track teams will have a chance to prove their worthiness of Rovelto's praise today and Saturday in the Wildcat Invitational in Ahearn Field House.

The women's team is anchored by returning All-Americans Renetta Seiler and Vanitta Kinard.

Seiler was an indoor all-American last season in the weight throw. She

Here we are in the middle of January, and the K-State men's basketball team has already won as many games as it did all of last season, sporting an 11-3 record.

I don't remember more of a buzz about K-State basketball since I've been here. Even when the Wildcats went to the NCAA Tournament in 1996, it didn't seem as if anybody cared and most correctly predicted their first-round exit.

But now it seems like the community is getting behind this basketball team. And it's all because of one game.

Missouri.

When the Tigers ventured into Manhattan on Jan. 3, they were fresh off a win against nationally ranked Maryland, the first team to beat Kansas. After a rough start, it appeared that the Tigers would step forward as the second-best team in the Big 12.

K-State had its first loss of the year, to defending champion Arizona, by nearly 40 points.

But the Cats brought Mizzou back down to earth. With a nearly perfect game in which almost everything went wrong for the Tigers and almost everything went right for the Cats, K-State handed Norm Stewart and company the worst loss in Tiger history.

K-State 111, Missouri 56.

The only drama was whether Tiger center Monte Hardge would ever sit down after fouling out midway through the second half.

All appeared peachy for K-State, but the high-flying Cats lost road games to Oklahoma and Baylor before rebounding to topple Iowa State on Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

An 11-3 record is good, especially for a team coming off a last-place conference finish.

But K-State should have this record. The only games I would have predicted the Cats losing at the beginning of the season up to this point were the Arizona, Missouri and Oklahoma games. This is no longer the poor team that gets whipped by everybody regularly.

They have talent and great effort, and now the Cats must play and act like they expect to win.

This is a good team.

This team is much better than the one that nearly beat Kansas last year. The Cats should be one of the best teams in the relatively weak Big 12. And after their non-conference schedule, they need to do quite well in conference play to reach the NCAA Tournament.

Playing well on the road would help. I don't really think there is much difference between playing on the road and playing at home, especially because many of the Bramlage crowds are less than enthusiastic and always quite small.

The way the game is played is no different, not like baseball or hockey. The Cats just need a positive mentality going into the game — and they need to take care of business.

The Missouri game was both the best and worst thing that could have happened to K-State. The Cats will not surprise anybody anymore, but they now know how well they can play. I think the Cats would have beaten any team in the country that day, which brings us to Saturday's game.

K-State just needs to bring its game to Lawrence and pay no attention to what name is across the white jerseys guarding them, which is easier said than done.

KU hasn't played well this season, despite having only two losses. The Jayhawks have won quite a few games by close margins and proven to be beatable by teams such as Hawaii.

The stage is set. KU will probably come into the game overconfident after a few large conference wins and distracted by "The Stilt."

Wilt Chamberlain is returning to Lawrence on Saturday for the first time since his playing days and all the attention will be elsewhere. KU has taken beating its intrastate rivals for granted.

It is the perfect time to sneak up and catch the Hawks. It would be great for confidence and exposure.

The Cats need to ignore the old advice for giving a speech — imagining the audience naked. They need to imagine the opponents wearing gold jerseys with the letters "Missouri" across them.

Another big win would be great for the program.

Plus, it'd be fun to see what our friends at that other school have to say if they can't rely on, "Wait until basketball season."

Dog owner's trial continues in Junction City

▶ SABINE DAVIDSON FACES MURDER CHARGES IN 11-YEAR-OLD'S DEATH.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JUNCTION CITY — Testimony continues today in the trial of a northeast Kansas woman charged with unintentional second-degree murder after her three Rottweiler dogs mauled an 11-year-old boy to death last spring.

Learie Thompson, who lives in the rural Geary County neighborhood where the attack occurred, testified Wednesday that he scrambled onto the roof of his pickup truck the morning of April 24 as the dogs ran into his garage and snapped at him.

Thompson's brush with the dogs happened about 30 minutes before the fatal attack on 11-year-old Christopher Wilson as he waited to board his school bus.

WILSON

"I hit the garage button to go to work, and as the garage door comes up I can see the dogs rushing in," Thompson testified Wednesday in the trial of one of the dogs' owners, Sabine Davidson. "I was very afraid."

Several other witnesses recalled similar incidents Wednesday during the trial's third day. Her husband, Jeffrey Davidson, also has been charged and is scheduled for trial in March.

Tony Van Buren, a Kansas Highway Patrol trooper who lives near the Davidsons, said he chased off the dogs with a baseball bat and a pistol June 14, 1996, after the animals surrounded two children.

Ronald Hodgdon, Sabine Davidson's attorney, questioned witnesses about whether they reported their problems to the Davidsons. Most said they had not, including the sheriff's officer who responded to Van Burens' call in June 1996.

Some state witnesses suggested the dogs were being trained to attack.

Nelson Rivera, a trainer in the Junction City Police Department's K-9 patrol section, recalled seeing Sabine Davidson at meetings of a Topeka-based club involved in Schuetzhund training, a protection-dog instruction method developed in Germany.

▶ Need a refresher? Check the eCollegian link to the original stories at collegian.ksu.edu/links/wilson.html

Rivera said Sabine Davidson attended two meetings in 1992 or 1993 before being ejected from the club for treating her dogs irresponsibly.

Attorney asks judge for permission to file 226-page appeal for McVeigh

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Timothy McVeigh's attorney asked the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Wednesday to allow him to file an appeal brief that is more than four times as long as the maximum number of pages allowed.

Attorney Rob Nigh told the appeals panel he needs extra space to argue the issues in the appeal of McVeigh's conviction and death sentence in the Oklahoma City bombing.

He also delivered a copy of the appeal and asked the court to read it before ruling.

Federal judicial rules set a maximum of 50 pages for an appeal, but the appeals court previously gave Nigh permission to file a 100-page appeal brief. Nigh wants that limit extended to 226 pages.

McVeigh was convicted of murder and conspiracy in June and sentenced to die in the April 1995 bombing that killed 168 people.

Nigh said it is impossible to condense 151 volumes of trial transcripts involving 13,240 pages and more than 237 witnesses into the space allowed.

"Counsel cannot in good conscience allow Mr. McVeigh to be sent to his death without attempting to present this court with the issues in the case which are believed to be meritorious," Nigh wrote.

▶621 STUDENTS HAVE SCHEDULES DROPPED ON 1ST DAY OF CLASSES.

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Although Jan. 15 was the first day of classes for most K-State students, some got an unpleasant surprise. In fact, 621 students were dropped from their classes this semester, R. Douglas Ackley, assistant controller, said.

That's 70 to 80 fewer than last spring semester, Ackley said.

"We anticipate dropping roughly that many from the 15,000 to 16,000 who pre-enroll," he said. "There are many who don't come back."

Something might have been lost in the mail or possibly lost in an office, he said. Mistakes might be made.

"We try to keep careful track of all the mail that comes in. Even if it's one student, we know it's important to that student," Ackley said.

There are students who paid their fees and still had their classes dropped. They had no idea the classes would be dropped. That's not logical, Diane Dollar, Department of Art adviser, said. Dollar spent the past few days putting schedules back together.

"There are kids who won't graduate in time because their classes were dropped, and they may not get in. Whoever thought this up is a few straws short of a bale. It's a mess," Dollar said.

Justin Bogart, junior in business finance, found out his classes had been dropped after attending them Thursday. After hearing repeatedly he was not on teachers' enrollment lists, he went to his adviser. There, he learned his classes had been dropped even though he paid fees. So far, he's obtained two permission slips and needs two more.

"I was in disbelief, but my adviser did a great job," Bogart said. "If they try to charge me $50 for late enrollment, somebody's going to hear about it."

Ackley said students who went through early enrollment for spring semester received a handout telling them they would receive a statement of account the first week of December. If they had not received the statement by Dec. 15, they were supposed to contact the cashier's office.

Statements were mailed the first week of December, Ackley said. The bills were sent to the students' local address. The instructions that came with the statements told students to tear off the top part of the statement and send it to the school. Envelopes were provided, he said.

"If the student owed us money, we told them to send the top half of the statement along with a check. If we owed them money, we still needed them to send in the statement," Ackley said.

Ackley said if the university did not have a record of fee payments or the top half of the statement, the student's classes were dropped. Dropping students who have not paid creates space for students the university knows are returning to school.

"All through last week, if classes were dropped and they contacted the enrollment office in Willard, we try to get them back into classes," he said. "Starting this week, they had to go through the re-enrollment process."

Most of the students will get back in their classes, Ackley said. He said students whose classes were dropped probably should not worry about their financial aid also being dropped.

"The financial aid is put on hold. It's in kind of a limbo, resting in the system. Once the student notifies us they are back, then it's dispersed," said Larry Moeder, director of Student Financial Assistance.

Center evaluates students, instructors

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

At one point or another, almost everyone on campus has used one of its products, the most common being a survey of 38 questions used to provide data to help instructors improve their teaching.

Faculty evaluation throught the use of this questionnaire is provided by the newly formed Individual Development and Educational Assessment Center.

Until September, this office was known as the Center for Faculty Evaluation and Development.

Along with the new name comes new responsibilities.

"Our mission is twofold," said Amy Gross, associate director for the IDEA Center. "We provide services across the country for faculty evaluation and development, and that's through our products. ... To provide support for the IDEA evaluation for students and the DECAD evaluation for department heads ... and to the university for program assessment efforts."

The IDEA Center's two products — the IDEA survey, which is filled out by students to evaluate their instructors, and DECAD, which stands for departmental evaluation of chair person activities for development — were both developed by the Center for Faculty Evaluation and Development.

The IDEA Center has also taken over the activities of the assessment component of the Office of Educational Advancement. This means the IDEA Center is now also responsible for the Kansas Board of Regents mandated assessment of K-State.

"It's a merger of the assessment activities of the Office of Educational Advancement," Gross said. "We moved the assessment activities to the center."

Bill Pallett, who formerly coordinated the assessment efforts for the university, is now director of the IDEA Center.

"I've always been interested in questions that relate to teaching and learning," Pallett, said.

"We get to find out what other campuses are doing in the area of program development ... the exchange of good ideas."

The IDEA Center distributes its evaluation products to more than 130 institutions nationwide.

"We hope that the products we have from the off-campus center generate enough revenue that we can improve the assessments on campus," Pallett said.

Gross said he believes it's through assessment efforts like these that K-State improves.

"It provides systematic information about programs and processes to know what's effective and ineffective so that students can better learn."

Union Program Council's Kaleidoscope Film series remains the only art film provider in Manhattan.

Since the Varsity Theatre closed more than a year ago, Carmike Cinemas no longer dedicates a theater to art and foreign films. This leaves Kaleidoscope the sole job of bringing non-commercial films to town.

Colin Rafferty, UPC Kaleidoscope committee chair, said this spring's line up of films is somewhat slanted toward older films. This week's presentation of "Brazil," a futuristic movie from 1985, is the semester's first offering.

Other films to be offered include next week's "Nosferatu," Fritz Lang's "Metropolis," the Australian "Cosi," and a mini-festival of Nick Parks' animation. Kaleidoscope will also feature some mainstream fare, like Spike Lee's breakthrough "Do the Right Thing."

With the Lee film, Rafferty said the film was considered because it's nearly 10 years old and wasn't a feature film when it debuted.

Rafferty said the Kaleidoscope series had a successful fall semester and a good response from audiences toward the films. As to the question of why Kaleidoscope doesn't bring in current art films like "The Wings of the Dove" or "The Boxer," Rafferty said those films are too expensive and don't become accessible until they reach the second-tier college market.

'Brazil' nightmarish imitation of sci-fi classic 'Blade Runner'

▶ FILM IS UNCLEAR, TYPICAL STORY OF GOOD-GUY VS. GIANT CORPORATION OF THE FUTURE.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

In director Terry Gilliam's nightmarish film "Brazil," a sign hanging on an office wall declares, with some irony, "suspicion breeds confidence."

Apparently, in 1985, Gilliam ("Twelve Monkeys") was suspicious enough to muster the confidence to direct this maniacal, unclear vision of the future this film so desperately wants to be. If only we could co-opt his confidence.

As most movies about the future tend to do, the plot concerns itself mostly with dumping a good-guy character who means well into a hellish future where a giant state corporation seems to control every aspect of life. From the dependence on the so-called Central Services to maintain the loony labyrinth of ducts that supply everyone's air conditioning to the endless paperwork and bureaucracy of Information Retrieval, our hero, Sam Lowry (a svelte, pre-"Miss Saigon" Jonathan Pryce), winds his way through this web of deceits.

Lowry winds his way through this heart-stopping slow movie, all in a vain attempt to fulfill his dreams with a woman, Jill Layton (Kim Greist), who is considered dangerous because of her terrorist leanings. (Of course, we're immediately sympathetic to her because who wouldn't want to just blow up this insane world.)

However, we never really know Layton as a character. Gilliam consistently introduces characters to the film who have little significance and are never explained.

For Lowry to deal with his pathetic life in his first office, the workers entertain themselves with old Hollywood movies when not watched by their director. Lowry escapes to a corny dream sequence, where he flies around in search of his dream woman and then does battle with a samurai (yes, a samurai).

"Brazil" is drenched with special effects, technical gadgetry and Langian art direction by John Beard. (Ripping off "Metropolis" remains a favorite pastime of Hollywood art directors.) Why does nearly every movie set in the future involve art deco architecture and costume?

The convoluted screenplay was written by Gilliam, Tom Stoppard and Charles McKeown. This alone might explain why this film tells you half of what you want to know, perhaps in an attempt to surround the movie in a shroud a mystery.

The film answers so few questions and makes so little sense, one is inclined to believe the screenwriters wished to confuse you as much as poor Lowry.

Perhaps that is giving too much credit to this overblown film, a pale imitation of Ridley Scott's masterful, influential "Blade Runner." And suggesting an homage to George Orwell's "1984" would be doing a great disservice to the author.

"Brazil" represents that age-old Hollywood delight, letting a director's vision run loose, with a multi-million dollar budget and a paucity of tired ideas.

Sitting through this movie might give you more confidence in the Internal Revenue Service, but it will also give you a reassurance that in 1998 one might still walk out of a movie on their own volition.

'Dog' no award-winner despite all-star cast, political satire

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

"Wag the Dog" is a political candidate's nightmare and a conspiracy theorist's wet dream, but few other people will find much worth getting worked up over.

Director Barry Levinson pulls together a cast that resembles an Oscar pre-party to tell a story of the electoral process gone mad. Robert De Niro plays Conrad Brean, the president's personal fix-it man with a questionable job description, who enlists the help of Hollywood's top producer, job description still undefined, played by Dustin Hoffman. Together the two have to distract America from the claims of an 11-year-old girl going public Paula Jones-style.

What better way than to go to war? After all, doesn't America come together at times of international bar brawls?

All they need are the key wartime ingredients — a song, enter Willie Nelson; a merchandising ploy, enter everyone's favorite cynic Denis Leary in designer leather; and an enemy, enter Albania.

Why Albania? Why not?

Of course, a real war could be messy, so with special effects to make George Lucas jealous, a terrorist group Albanians can't find, a bomb the CIA can't locate and a screaming girl with a kitten, America's sympathy is in full force, and the world is waiting to see what those Albanians will do next.

Is any of it true? It has to be. It's on television.

"Wag the Dog" is a series of twists and turns that could never be expected and will never be explained. But in the end, what could be the last truly unpredictable movie just doesn't have enough to make it work. Two hours of pure, unadulterated political satire is just too much to keep you enthralled. Laughing maybe, but nothing worthy of the honor expected when "Taxi Driver" meets "Diner."

Rated R for language. Children 13 to 17 should be screened for a predisposition to cynicism.

'Good Will Hunting' is a winning lottery ticket

CLAUDETTE RILEY

Movie Review

Sitting on a metaphorical winning lottery ticket, the appealing cast of "Good Will Hunting" showcases moments of real depth and a level of intimacy rarely risked in a traditional coming-of-age film.

The mesmerizing performance of the title character, Will Hunting (Matt Damon) captures the channeled enthusiasm of first-time screenwriters (Damon and Ben Affleck, as his loyal neighborhood friend Chuckie).

"Good Will Hunting"

4 stars

Locked into his latest menial job, a janitor swabbing floors at MIT, Hunting anonymously upstages prestigious graduate students by solving mathematical equations presented by professors to stump them.

The photographic genius of his mind sparks the interest of a frustrated professor (Stellan Skarsgård, from "Breaking the Waves") who quickly brokers a deal so Hunting can trade a jail sentence for time on a psychiatrist's couch.

Both Sean McGuire (Robin Williams as the scruffy community-college instructor-slash-therapist) and Skylar (an insightful, passionate Harvard student) provide a challenging level of acceptance and intimacy new to the orphaned Hunting.

Pushing them away, Hunting spends the majority of the movie dragging his knuckles through the mean streets of neighborhood bars and batting cages of South Boston. While believable, this belabors the overused device of distinguishing the good-hearted Hunting and his raw talents with the privileged, one-dimentional Ivy Leaguers he's one-upping.

Although the confrontational nature of these well-drawn characters serve primarily to call each other's bluffs, it's far less pretentious than it might sound. The struggles resound of real humanity and serve to reveal refreshingly complex beauty and pain in each character.

Gus Van Sant Jr.'s direction brings a soulful reflection of individuals in stark settings, although his signature desolation and almost overwhelming loneliness is present in long shots of cold streets and stone buildings. The lens never flinches in revealing the flaws of each character.

It's easy to ignore overworked plot constructions and cheesiness in a movie as earnest and hard-working as "Good Will Hunting."

"Good Will Hunting" has been nominated for four Golden Globes. It is rated R for language, violence and some adult content. It's playing at Westloop 6 Theatres.

automatically qualified for this season's NCAA Indoor Championships with a throw of 67 feet 4 inches on Dec. 6.

"Renetta is one of the top two collegiates in the country," Rovelto said.

Because she has already qualified for the national meet, Seiler said she is using the Wildcat Invitational as a tune-up.

"In the weight throw, there are so many things that can go wrong," Seiler said. "Since I have already qualified for nationals, I'm going to be working on my technique all the way through."

Kinard was an indoor all-American in triple jump last season and has provisionally qualified for this season's NCAA Indoor Championships with a jump of 41 feet 9-3/4 inches on Dec. 6.

"Vanitta is similar to Renetta in that she's one of the top two collegiate jumpers in the nation," Rovelto said. "Even with average or sub-par performances, they're going to win most of their competitions."

The men's team also boasts several national championship-caliber athletes.

"We're extremely strong and deep in the multi-events," Rovelto said. "Attila Zsivoczky could be competing for the national championship as a sophomore."

Zsivoczky, who won the 1996 World Junior Championships decathlon, will compete in the heptathlon this weekend for the Cats.

The Cats have two high jumpers who have already qualified for the NCAA Championships.

Charles Burney automatically qualified for the NCAA Championships with a jump of 7 feet 4-1/2 inches on Dec. 6.

With a jump of 7 feet 3 inches on Dec. 6, Nathan Leeper provisionally qualified for the NCAA Championships.

Leeper, who was the 1997 NJCAA indoor and outdoor high jump champion, said having such a talented teammate is a new experience.

"I've never had the opportunity to practice with a guy that's jumping as high as me — if not a little higher," Leeper said. "It's neat to have someone on your team that's in the same position as you are."

Rovelto said the men's team will also be strong in the sprints and the sprint relays.

"We could basically run two 4-by-400-meter relay teams that would be competitive," Rovelto said.

The Cats' top 1,600-meter relay team will be Keith Black, Randy Melbourne, Jeff Martin and Perry McBride.

Black, who is also a member of the K-State football team, is the fastest man on the team with a career best of 45.42 in the 400-meter dash. But Rovelto said Black's training has been set back because of football.

"Right now he's not in good shape, but he's one of the best in the country when he's fit," Rovelto said.

In the 1997 NCAA Indoor Championships, Black placed fifth in the 400-meter, earning all-America honors.

Because it's early in the season, Rovelto said many of the athletes will not be competing in their best events in the Wildcat Invitational.

"We're much more concerned with individual results than the number of points we score right now," Rovelto said.

Week stresses King's lessons necessary to keep in mind.

"I remember when Martin Luther King was assassinated," Hudgins said. "It's important to keep living the dream and the legacy that he started years ago. To me, serving on the committee helps me keep that dream alive and to keep that legacy."

The week includes many events to commemorate King. The Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity is coordinating a candlelight vigil and religious service at All Faiths Chapel on Sunday after a memorial walk from the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"I know Alpha Phi Alpha has been doing this for at least 12 years, and I'm almost sure it's more than that," said Reginland McGowan, faculty adviser for Alpha Phi Alpha.

"We try to create a spirit and atmosphere for observing Dr. King's dream. We come together to reflect that," McGowan said.

As part of the celebration, K-State and the Manhattan community are sponsoring a contest to encourage the expression of thoughts about civil rights. Entries were to be submitted by Jan. 7 and will all be displayed at Manhattan Town Center.

Candi Pitts is the task force member in charge of the contest.

"The theme of the week this year is 'Our Civil Rights: Then and Now,'" Pitts said. "For the older students, the college students, I really want them to reflect on that."

Hudgins said she feels the civil rights cause is an ongoing process.

"Much has changed, and much has been gained," Hudgins said. "But when you look at the big picture and look at how diversity has to be a push, then that tells me it takes all races to push the dream."

Pitts said she agreed.

"I think things on the surface have changed, but I think there are a lot of deep-seated things which haven't been addressed," Pitts said. "I think we need to bring people together to communicate."

This year's activities reflect a greater effort by the community and K-State to cooperate on the King celebration. The task force's goal is to gain more college student participation.

"We wanted it to be more of a cohesive-type effort," Pitts said. "The committee and the university have always done something to commemorate Dr. Martin Luther King Day, but we're trying to cooperate more."

Lena Anderson, member of the community task force, said she sees greater cooperation between the city and K-State.

"We sort of combined the programs," she said. "In the past we've always had (K-State) students meet with us, but this year we had more."

Anderson said she thinks the holiday helps people focus.

"I hope that people will continue to keep the dream alive. Sometimes we get away from the peaceful kinds of things that King stood for," Anderson said. "He stood for so many things for all people. We live in such a fast-paced world, this is just a time to reflect."

Slater said he feels King's message has been confused at times.

"I have a dream, too. My dream is education," Slater says. "I want the kids to get the message of Martin Luther King, not someone with their own agenda."

tus as long as one parent is a Kansas resident and the student is a dependent.

• Students enrolled at a regents university can maintain residency classification if their parents move out of state as long as the student is continuously enrolled in the fall and spring semesters.

• International students recruited or transferred by a company to Kansas who cannot obtain residency status in the 12-month period can continue to pay the in-state tuition as long as they are in the process of petitioning the government for citizenship. This is an extension of the existing guideline that allows a person who has been recruited or transferred by a company to Kansas to pay in-state tuition rates until obtaining state residency.

Barron said the additional guidelines, which don't require legislative approval, will be established in the next six months and take effect this fall.

Committee recommends bill that could cut athletic fee

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

Privilege Fee Committee members passed 9-0 legislation that would cut $54,077 in student fees from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' budget.

The bill must still be passed by Student Senate. If the legislation passes, students will save $45,077 in student privilege fees.

Under previous years' privilege-fee legislation, the athletic department, Sports Club Council and K-State Marching Band all received funding through the Intercollegiate Athletics Council privilege fee. Members voted to introduce legislation that would create a separate fee for the marching band and provide an $18,000 per year funding increase for the group.

The athletic department and sports clubs would still be funded by the athletic fee.

Citing more than $19,000 in surplus sports club funds, members voted to cut allocations to the clubs by $9,000 per year. Also approved was a $9,000 reallocation from athletic department funds to increase the band budget.

The fee legislation would also cut $45,077 from the athletic department fee.

Privilege Fee Committee Vice Chair Aaron Truax asked Athletic Department Business Manager Bob Cavello how Fiesta Bowl revenue would affect the department. Truax mentioned Cavello's "nice, new ring" (actually from the 1997 Cotton Bowl, not this past season's Fiesta Bowl) when questioning the department's bowl expenditures.

"Well actually, it's from last year, but thanks for noticing," Cavello said.

Truax questioned the source of funds for the bowl-game rings, which are worn by many connected to the football program.

"What's your point, Aaron?" Cavello asked.

"I was just curious where it came from, Mr. Cavello," Truax responded, "if that's OK."

Cavello said his department is already funded at one of the Big 12's lowest levels, though its pro-

Gore unveils civil rights plan

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — In a sermonlike speech from the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s former pulpit, Vice President Al Gore marked the King holiday Monday by laying out a plan to increase civil rights spending by $86 million.

The Clinton administration will propose spending $602 million to enforce civil rights laws in the 1999 budget, up from $516 million this year, Gore said.

"This is a priority. That is why it received such an enormous increase when almost everything else in the budget is being decreased," Gore said at Ebenezer Baptist Church.

Elsewhere around the nation, the slain civil rights leader was remembered with prayers, service projects, parades and, for the first time, a halt in trading on U.S. financial markets. King would have turned 69 last week.

Gunfire at a King Day parade at Baton Rouge, La., killed one person and wounded three young children. Police said the shooting was the result of a fight and race was not a factor.

Martin Luther King III was in Minneapolis to give a speech when he was told of the shooting.

"It drives home some of the points I tried to make today," he said.

"We have got to work to eliminate violence. It is totally out of hand."

Gore said the proposed civil rights spending boost will include a $22 million increase for the Department of Housing and Urban Development to fight housing discrimination.

Other changes would strengthen investigations of police brutality and enforcement of the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Details will be included in the budget submitted by President Clinton next month.

Plan could increase bike safety, create additional routes

JESSI BRUNSON
Kansas State Collegian

For those in Manhattan using alternate modes of transportation, bicycling to and around campus might become much easier.

A bicycle master plan offering a design for increased bicycle routes was adopted by the Manhattan City Commission on Dec. 16.

Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, said the bicycle master plan is a "set of recommendations to create a more friendly and safe environment for bicyclists." The plan focuses on designing routes around the K-State campus and then branching those routes out into the community, he said.

The first enhancement will most likely be made on North Manhattan Avenue when it is scheduled to be resurfaced, Fehr said. The plan proposes the conversion of one of the existing four lanes into a bicycle lane on both sides of the street.

Other modifications include adding lanes to other roads as they are resurfaced and posting of signs urging drivers to share the road with bicyclists, Fehr said.

These changes won't just happen on city streets. Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, has been working hard to see that bicycling improvements happen on campus by the turn of the century.

"The most important thing is providing safe access to and through campus on a bicycle," Taussig said.

Use of bicycle parking spaces on campus has increased by 10 percent annually. Supply, however, isn't keeping up with demand, he said.

"Last year we added 250 spaces, but it still didn't seem to be enough," Taussig said.

Additional bicycle racks are just some of the changes to be made as part of K-State's portion of the master bicycle plan. A sidewalk along Manhattan

REMEMBERING King's MESSAGE

STORY BY JON KURCHE • PHOTOS BY JEFF COOPER

RIGHT: Brandon Hobbs, junior in industrial engineering, lights a candle in remembrance of Martin Luther King Jr. on Monday night in All Faiths Chapel. Alpha Phi Alpha organized a memorial walk and the candle-lighting ceremony. BELOW: Escorted by campus police, walkers sing songs on the way from the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art to All Faiths Chapel. Walkers were on the way to the candle-lighting ceremony to honor Martin Luther King Jr.

Candlelight vigil celebrates civil rights leader's life

A chorus of voices singing "We Shall Overcome" began and ended the celebration of Martin Luther King Jr. Day on Monday night.

A crowd of people collected in front of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Footsteps crunched across the snow, the participants gathered and with a police escort in tow, marched across the parking lot. The words of the civil rights song filtered through the night air.

The participants were joining for a common reason.

"I've made it a point to make this memorial walk each year," said Erick Harper, assistant athletic director for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. "The message that Dr. King put out for all of us to follow and go forth with is something that I believe in. I think it's very important to participate."

Harper said King's message carried important meaning for him and his family.

"The non-violence, things of that nature in his message that gave a lot of my family — my mothers, grandmothers, grandfathers — the information that they passed along through his message to me, the dream of non-violence — working with people, not against people, accepting people, and not creating animosity when human beings are involved. Communicating through speech as opposed to violence," Harper said.

This message brought many together, to brave the chilly air, with temperatures at about 29 degrees. Participants walked around the southeast parking lot and filed up Vattier Street toward All Faiths Chapel. Some walked hand-in-hand, some walked arm-in-arm. Some walked alone.

Dorinda Lambert, assistant director and clinical coordinator for University Counseling Services, said she believed the celebration was important for K-State.

"I think it's really important that the campus have a chance to recognize it and do some things," Lambert said, "and there are many activities going on. Unfortunately it's also a long weekend, a lot of students aren't around and I thought we should have some kind of public show for campus. This is a good spot to do it."

Lambert said she thought King had a lesson for all people.

"I think his whole life was a testament to the equality of human beings and the importance of community to work together," Lambert said. "To be able to recognize and value and obtain the kind of righteousness we need to have in our society. I think that's his whole message."

The crowd entered All Faiths Chapel and was seated. Stacy Yeager, senior in management, said she thought celebrations similar to the one on Monday help build stronger ties between people of different backgrounds.

"It's good to see a lot of people out here, especially when it's cold," Yeager said. "I'm glad that this is a celebration every year because it's something that we need to keep in mind every year so that it continues to bridge the gap between all the different races. So that we won't have to go back in the past, for another tragedy to happen."

Sitting together in the front rows of the chapel, service attendees heard the message that civil rights continues to be an issue.

Sherry Wright, a member of the Martin

Clinton, Paula Jones case could be settled out of court despite possibility of May trial

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Supporters of President Clinton and Paula Jones alike are holding open the possibility of settling Jones' sexual harassment lawsuit, even as a trial in the case appeared inevitable.

At that trial, set for May 27, attorneys for Jones made clear they will try to establish a pattern of behavior toward other women by Clinton that would lend credence to her claim.

"There's five months before trial, and a lot can change," one of the lawyers, David Pyke, said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press," right after he insisted that her lawsuit "is on the train to trial" in a Little Rock, Ark., federal court.

Pyke and other members of Jones' camp made the rounds of TV interview shows one day after Clinton gave his deposition in Jones' lawsuit, which accused him of propositioning her for sex nearly seven years ago.

Jones' lawyers refused to comment directly on the testimony, citing a gag order by U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright. The president's personal attorney, Robert Bennett, did not respond to messages seeking comment on Clinton's deposition, taken in a six-hour period Saturday in Bennett's office with Jones present.

Clinton political strategist James Carville, appearing with Pyke on NBC, said initially that he anticipates a trial. He accused Jones' supporters of floating a $2 million settlement offer — then hinted that Clinton might be amenable to it if Jones would agree to "never utter another public word or make another public appearance."

"And that would be a good thing," Carville said. "That would get you your $2 million just to go away."

Kaczynski taken off suicide watch, put under 24-hour surveillance Saturday

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Theodore Kaczynski, who tried to kill himself two weeks ago, has been taken off suicide watch and transferred out of a cell where he was under 24-hour surveillance.

Authorities said Monday the decision was made after psychiatrists deemed the Unabomber suspect was "no longer a danger to himself," a sheriff's spokesman said.

Kaczynski was moved late Saturday from a Sacramento County jail cell equipped with round-the-clock video surveillance to the cell where he had spent most of the past 18 months before trying to commit suicide with his underwear earlier this month.

"He seems to be fine, as far was we know," said sheriff's spokesman Jim Cooper.

As a precaution, though, guards will check on the defendant every 15 minutes, Cooper said.

The transfer followed several days of court-ordered interviews with Dr. Sally Johnson, a federal prison psychiatrist who examined Kaczynski's mental competence.

Her report, which remains under seal, was given to the judge and lawyers in the case on Saturday.

Cooper said Kaczynski's transfer was "a totally independent judgment by our psychiatric staff," and not connected to any findings in Johnson's report.

U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. scheduled a hearing today to determine whether a formal competency hearing should take place. Other issues also might be covered, including Kaczynski's request to jettison his lawyers' mental-defect defense and represent himself, sources said.

A competency hearing could occur as early as Thursday morning and, depending on the results, the trial could begin later that day.

Kaczynski, 55, a Harvard-educated mathematician who taught at Berkeley in the late 1960s, pleaded innocent to four bombings that killed two people and maimed two others. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty.

He also has pleaded innocent to separate charges in the 1994 bombing death of a New Jersey public-relations executive.

Muslims observe Ramadan with month long fast, prayer

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

The sun sets behind the Islamic Center of Manhattan. Devout Muslims pray five times daily: at dawn, at noon, in the afternoon, at sunset and at night.

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

During the past few weeks, Muslims have been observing the Sawm, a monthlong fast that is the fourth pillar of the Islamic faith.

The fast takes place during the ninth month of the lunar year, Ramadan, and is prescribed in the Koran, the holy writings of Islam, to be a special time of worship through the abstention of food, drink and sexual relations during the daylight hours of the month.

At its heart, the fast during the month of Ramadan is a time for devout Muslims to seek the favor and guidance of Allah.

"We will take special care not to lie, fraud or use profanity," said Syed Ehsan, an engineer at Fort Riley.

According to a publication of the Presidency of Islamic Research, though Muslims are always to abstain from evil intentions and desires, Ramadan gives them a chance to focus on the state of their minds and souls by removing distractions and teaching sincerity and self-discipline.

A trip to the Islamic Center of Manhattan during Ramadan reveals the way devout Muslims practice the strict regulations of Sawm.

At sunset, local Muslims gather with greetings of "Salam Wa Alykum" which means "peace be upon you" as they prepare to celebrate Istar, or the "breaking of the fast." After welcoming one another, men and women then separate for the rest of the evening.

"This separation helps keep our minds on Allah," jokes one man as he passes a glass of milk.

Each day's fast ends with a light meal of dates and milk or orange juice just before the sunset prayer.

Allah commands that the Koran be read in the most beautiful way possible, and the prayers from the Koran used at sunset are elegantly sung in Arabic by an Imam, an elder in the faith, who knows the prayers by heart.

The Muslims here represent many different nationalities from all over the globe, and the meal after evening prayer reflects the diverse tastes of those cultures.

Chicken and beef dishes, barley soup, curried rice, soda and tossed salad are among the foods prepared by families for the celebration.

The conversation during the meal is light and informal and if asked, Muslims reclining after the meal might talk about their families, their jobs or their faith.

Muslims believe their religion is the only true religion given by Allah to humanity. According to the Islamic publication "The True Religion" the word Islam means submission to Allah, the only God worthy of worship. People who submit their will to God are termed Muslims. The word can also mean "peace."

Muslims believe the word of Allah was given to the prophet Muhammad in the Koran by divine revelation, but they do not believe Muhammad himself was divine.

According to the Koran, there are five pillars of the Islamic faith.

The first is "Shahadah." This is the witness or creed spoken in prayer as a confession of the basic principle of Islam: "There is no God but Allah and Muhammad is His prophet."

The second is "Salah" or prayer. Devout Muslims pray five times daily — at dawn, at noon, in the afternoon, at sunset and at night. These prayer times can be observed individually or with a group.

The third pillar of Islam is "Zakah," the giving of alms to the poor.

"We believe that Allah is very loving, and wants us to share what we have," said K-State student Majed Khan.

Pillar four is the fast during the month of Ramadan, "Sawm."

The fifth and last pillar of Islam is probably the most widely known outside of the Islamic faith. The "Hajj" is the pilgrimage to Muhammad's home city of Mecca. All Muslims must make the pilgrimage at least once in their lifetimes. More than 2 million Muslims make the trip annually.

These pillars are the basic requirements of the faith that procure the favor of Allah and achieve salvation for the believer.

Despite popular notions that all Muslims are Arabs, only 20 percent of the 1.3 billion Muslims are culturally Arabian.

There are practicing Muslims in nearly every nation of the world, including China, the former Soviet Union and the United States.

According to the World Assembly for Muslim Youth, Islam has truths that apply to all people in all cultures, and is "a contender for supplying the basic framework of the one religion of the future."

Under the shadow of this global network of believers in the religion of Islam is the community here in Manhattan that, despite distance from loved ones and busy schedules, is trying to maintain adherence to the basic principles on which its members base their lives.

"It was amazing to be there and be part of Ramadan," said Jera McGraw, K-State student and observer at the Islamic Center last Friday.

Local Muslims pray at the Islamic Center of Manhattan on Saturday night. The Muslims have been observing the Sawm, a month long fast.

COMMERCE BANK
727 POYNTZ AVENUE
MANHATTAN, KANSAS 66502

Dear K-State Student:

Thank you for welcoming Commerce Bank to our new location in the K-State Student Union.

Our goal on campus is to make your banking as convenient as possible. We hope that by providing our full range of services at an on-campus location, we can make banking easier for you as you negotiate a hectic schedule of classes, teaching and researching.

We are very excited that so many students are choosing to take advantage of our services, and are thrilled to be a partner in providing the Wildcat Card's banking services function. We are proud to help K-State lead the way in providing advanced technology and convenience to its students, faculty and staff.

Our bankers thank you for welcoming us, and invite you to stop by at any time. Your fellow students Terra, Amy and Jennifer as well as our full-time bankers Sandy Clark, Mina Glenn and Michelle Chapman are ready and eager to help you.

Best wishes for a successful semester,

Ted Haggart

Holiday signifies remembrance, rededication

Although it's important to keep alive the dream Martin Luther King Jr. spoke of in his memorable Aug. 28, 1963, speech, Americans need to wake from slumbering apathy.

Student and community leaders have planned a week of events in observance of the civil rights leader's birthday. In remembering the significance of King's life and the tragedy of his assassination, we take a step forward. We also make a commitment not to forget the injustices of the past.

It's asinine that Americans are still debating the level or relevance of Martin Luther King Jr.'s contributions. His appearance on the national scene irrefutably changed history.

When Martin Luther King Jr. spoke, he was speaking for the benefit and on behalf of all Americans and as a continuation and further definition of the inalienable rights outlined by the founders.

He fought not only for the equality of minorities, but for women's issues and the rights of all Americans. He stirred individuals into non-violent activism and furthered the cause of true freedom.

The movement of the '60s has gone on to spur discussion about the rights of oppressed and segregated groups in the '90s. His emphasis on the content of people's character, rather than the color of their skin, is a belief all Americans can derive meaning from. Tolerance for the differences of others will make us a stronger nation.

Just as King's powerful words sparked a nationwide debate, the dialogues planned this week will bring individuals together to discuss rights and equality.

In a town the size of Manhattan, the time of segregation is not that far behind us, and nearly four decades after King's speech, there are still stories of racism and segregation told in first-person.

The injustices King fought against are not abolished. His dream has not yet been realized to the fullest.

This is the dream of America and what we could be.

This dream will never happen if we don't look past stereotypes and see the humanity in one another.

Giving your best effort ...

Making most of time in college guarantees future

Welcome back students. I know I'm a couple days late and a dollar short, but since this is my first column, why not start with the pleasantries?

Just a bit of background on me before I begin my incessant rambling. My college career began in May 1986. Twelve years later it officially comes to an end. It hasn't been 12 continuous years. I did have the good fortune to work for companies that journalism seniors are scrambling to get to. But without a degree, upper-management positions evaded me. So I'm back. Yippee.

My desk editor, Claudette Riley, told me I don't have to write columns specifically about minority issues.

For that I applaud her.

I am a minority, and I do have opinions about minority issues. Someday you might read a few of them.

For now, though, my interests are with everything and everyone.

Because it's too early in the semester to be so serious, I'm going to regurgitate the thoughts wreaking the most havoc in my mind since the start of winter break.

First a message to the class of May 1998. If you're a senior, in whatever field, and you're getting anxious about the job search, take heart. You'll get that job. Maybe not right away. But as long as you don't blow it in the next few months, the job market is yours. My gosh, I'm sounding more and more like my mother.

For the freshmen, sophomores and juniors, my best advice to you would be to do what I say, and not what I did. If you don't, you'll spend more time in Manhattan than you really need to. Here's a great example. Every night the bar next door drops countless numbers of bottles into the dumpster. Sounds to me like people are having a good time. Just remember to have as much fun in class. Well, maybe not that much fun. Just enough that you don't have to come back to campus and finish your degree while lesser qualified graduates get the better jobs. Trust me, I speak from experience.

Now that I've inaugurated my first column with the classic mother-hen approach I do so well, here's more frivolous food for thought as we begin this new semester. Best of luck.

School started on Thursday of last week. Why couldn't we just start on Tuesday after the holiday? It's cruel and inhumane punishment to tease me with a long weekend so soon in the semester.

VIEWPOINT

PAM MANNING

Pam is a senior in public relations. You can send e-mail to Pam at pdm6732@ksu.edu.

Something else cruel and inhumane is the loss of the Nichols computer lab. It was entirely too convenient for a lot of us to go there, and now that it's gone we have to trek halfway across campus to get to another lab. It's not the walk that gets me, it's the — OK, maybe it is the walk. Better rethink my new year's resolution.

Why are some of our fellow students so rude? The other day I was in the cashier's office and, in less than five minutes, two students were in line next to me verbally insulting the person attempting to help them.

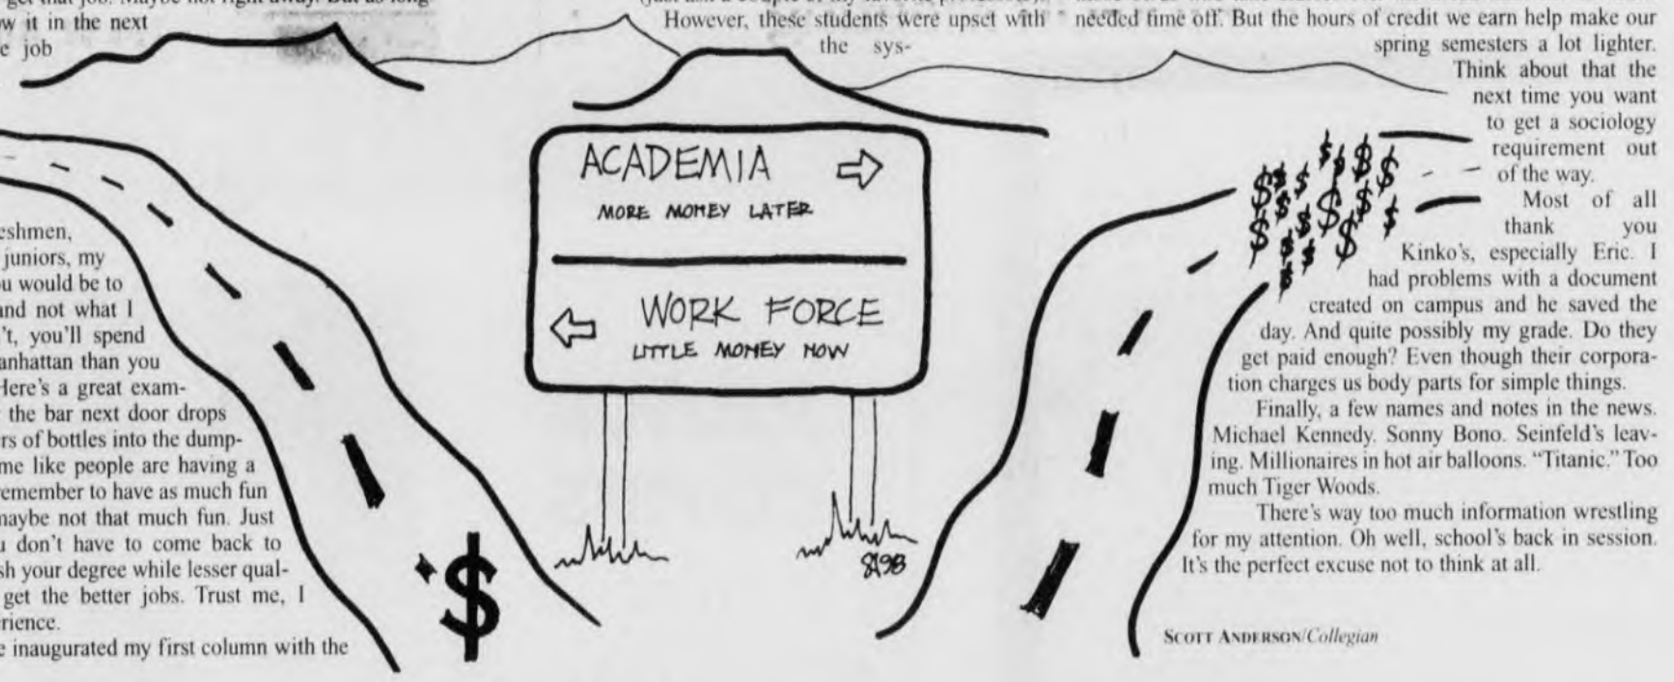
Rest assured that if I feel I've been wronged, I'll let you know (just ask a couple of my favorite professors).

However, these students were upset with the system, as most of us have been on occasion. Did they really need to be so nasty with the person behind the counter? You'll need them before they need you.

Everyone I've met here hasn't been as rude. The majority of people I walk past have a friendly smile. Some even break out into song and dance. Just kidding. Some strike up a conversation. To me it's just nice exchanging courtesies.

How about those professors? A year after I had taken an exam, one of my longtime favorite professors (I thought) told me how "defiant" he thought I was because I disagreed with his answer for a test question. I wasn't argumentative. I just wouldn't budge from my opinion. He didn't like that.

I think defiant is a strong word for him to use. But I do believe I have the right to question anything I get wrong, especially if I've studied.



You, too, have the right to ask questions and politely challenge things you deem worthy. If they still don't like that, remember those teacher evaluations at the end of the semester. I've put many of them to good use. Thankfully they can't read my handwriting.

While I'm giving thanks, let's also say thank you to the instructors who teach intersession courses. They who teach and those of us who take classes over the break miss out on much needed time off. But the hours of credit we earn help make our spring semesters a lot lighter. Think about that the next time you want to get a sociology requirement out of the way.

Most of all thank you Kinko's, especially Eric. I had problems with a document created on campus and he saved the day. And quite possibly my grade. Do they get paid enough? Even though their corporation charges us body parts for simple things.

Finally, a few names and notes in the news. Michael Kennedy. Sonny Bono. Seinfeld's leaving. Millionaires in hot air balloons. "Titanic." Too much Tiger Woods.

There's way too much information wrestling for my attention. Oh well, school's back in session. It's the perfect excuse not to think at all.

SCOTT ANDERSON/Collegian

Providing cost-effective textbook ideas

Last semester, for the first time since the Bush administration, I enrolled in calculus. The book I'd paid good money for previously on this campus wasn't being used anymore, so it was time to pay out the ear and make another investment in my academic future. I mean, after all, the books on the shelf were brand new, so this purchase was going to last me a while, right?

Wrong.

Now, I'm no Stephen Hawking, but I don't think calculus has changed enough over 12 years to warrant one textbook change, much less three. Feel free to correct me if I'm wrong. If "first derivatives" have been taken out and replaced with "happy fun cow balls" upon executive orders from the International Mathematics Alliance, I can see the necessity to do a serious search-and-replace in the textbook.

Of course, there's the possibility older versions of the textbook were worn out, falling apart and in need of replacement. Well, if you use your roommate for a bookmark or habitually place the book behind your Chevy Nova's front tire as a parking brake, perhaps it needs replacement, but not with a brand new edition.

MARNY BURKE/Collegian

Let's face it, there's only one reason book publishers come out with new editions of many textbooks — because they can. No instructor likes to get caught on the trailing edge of the learning curve and will reflexively pick the newest, shiniest, glossiest textbook applicable to their class. At least, it seems that way.

I've had the privilege of knowing several instructors who can weigh new versions of these books on their merits, and blessed are they who realize, "Well, this one's newer, but they've changed five sentences from the 1976 edition," and keep the older books supported until their spines snap. Those professors are getting to be a rare breed.

Literature students are lucky in this regard, as unless their instructor demands a particular translation (it's been known to happen), their works are in libraries, anthologies, and are generally less expensive by the ton than a textbook with specific problems and lab exercises. (Or, better still, your instructor is gunning the "fair use" clause of the copyright law into overdrive and making a packet of photocopied material that, despite its size and weight, is still a bargain at twice the price. If your instructors do this for you, thank them nicely.)

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

Ken is a senior in computer science. You can send e-mail to Ken at sigma7@ksu.edu.

If you're the company making these books, though, you're in a fantastic position. The standard rules of economics do not apply. To hell with supply and demand.

Demand is a constant, you can charge pints of blood for the book and college students will still be standing in line in the bookstore with paper cuts up and down each arm to get the texts they are required to have.

Still, if you have a class that requires you to plunk down a car payment for a book that will probably be obsolete before you get your financial aid check, there are ways to circumvent the resulting poverty and six-month ramen noodle diet.

• If this class is sufficiently entry-level and you know enough people taking the class (one of the biology or math classes, for example), pool your resources and buy one book. You don't have to be a psychology major to see the inevitable downsides (custody battles, missing books, temptation to rip out one chapter and leave the rest of the book for the others), but the upside is equally obvious (more money, which can be exchanged for goods and services).

• Borrow other people's books — constantly. Again, upsides are clear, but if you spend the 50-minute period leaning over someone's shoulder or arm, you stand a good chance of either annoying that person to death or hopelessly enamoring them of you, which can sometimes be just as bad.

• Theoretically, you could buy the textbook, get access to an unguarded photocopier, and replicate the critical sections of the book for personal use while returning the textbook for a full refund the next day. This folds, spindles, and mutilates the copyright law, and is morally gray. Some people could see justification in the overpricing of the textbook to begin with, but that's no legal defense. It is an action I cannot endorse or support. Still, it's possible for you morally gray characters — theoretically.

These treat the symptom, though, not the disease, and I don't think book publishers are going to turn a blind eye to making an obscene profit from redundant texts.

I just wish colleges and departments were more aware that newest isn't always best, particularly during those semesters when books cost as much as tuition.

America most free country in world

Editor,

The basic message of Scott Hopper's article, "America: the land of the free?" is that America is not really free at all, but that we are actually bound by unrealistic, conservative and socialist laws. He also states that "Europe is freedom."

Apparently Hopper has reached his conclusion because of several perceived and real European freedoms mentioned in his article, which are the following:

1. Teen-agers can buy and consume alcohol in Europe.
2. Drug use is permitted.
3. Nude sunbathing is allowed.
4. Nudity on television and in news media is abundant.
5. Prostitution is legal.
6. No speed limit.
7. No city curfews.

Some of the reasons he lists are true, some are not. It seems that Hopper has lived in Europe, probably as the dependent of military or U.S. government personnel, probably as a child. Why as a child? Because the above list sounds like the wish list of a self-centered, immature adolescent.

I lived in Europe for two years, in Micronesia for nearly three years and traveled extensively in both areas. I lived there as an adult, and I can tell you that while America has lots of problems and is nowhere near perfect, it is by far the freest country in the world.

Some European countries might allow drug use, prostitution and teenage drinking, but they are all economically repressive. At every turn you are taxed, regulated, restricted and told what you can and cannot do.

I have always been interested in foreign politics and economies, so while I was abroad I looked for the differences between U.S. and foreign systems. Hopper is a student of a university. In Europe, if he didn't make good enough grades in high school, he would not be admitted to a university and would probably be a factory worker.

And if you think the tax rates in the United States are excessive, don't even think about living in Europe. Don't get me wrong, Europe is a great place to visit, but if you are truly concerned with your freedom, stay in the United States.

Hopper states that the Constitution gives us the right to vote and the freedom of speech, but "failed to mention that these are not total freedoms." What freedom is absolute? The comparison between these constitutional rights and the freedoms Hopper gave in his article are ridiculous, as is his entire argument.

The fact is that America has become increasingly liberal socially and economically, especially in the past 50 years, and the government has become more socialistic. Socialism is to the left of the political spectrum, which is to say the liberal side of the spectrum. The conservative values Hopper scorns made America great. For those with a serious agenda, the United States is still considered the Land of Opportunity, but for how long is difficult to say.

The immaturity and ignorance of the way U.S. and European social and economic systems actually function as portrayed by Hopper's column is appalling, especially for a university student. Apparently the right to free speech is absolute.

Student body president achieves campaign goals, Riemann says

ANDREW DAVID WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld are going into the homestretch of their term as president and vice president of the K-State student body, respectively.

Riemann said he believes he has lived up to his campaign promises, despite last semester's failure of the plus grading system, one of the duo's leading campaign issues.

RIEMANN

NEUFELD

"What students wanted was someone to bring the plus system up for discussion," he said. "With none of the grading options garnering a majority of the vote (in the November plebiscite), that really tells me that students are still unclear of what they want. The plus system is a classic case of mixed emotions."

Riemann and Neufeld said they are proud of their work in making the Course Information Program a reality. Starting next fall, students will evaluate certain courses, with their opinions released to other students who are making enrollment decisions.

Riemann appointed a committee to work on the issue last fall, and said 10 to 12 percent of the student population took part in a pilot program last semester.

Another highlight of Riemann's term was the passing of the Code of Ethics by Student Senate, he said. If senators are convicted of a felony, they will lose their Senate seats.

"The Code of Ethics is one of the three important issues addressed in our term, and we are proud that it has taken effect," Neufeld said.

Riemann said he believes his administration's legacy will be one of honesty and pro-activeness.

"I'm proud of the fact that we have yet to veto a Senate bill," he said.

Neufeld said she is proud of the number of students their policy has affected, such as health care and funding to help upgrade technology.

As part of their open-door policy, Riemann and Neufeld continue to sponsor Wildcat Lunches, where they invite campus organizations to informally discuss topical issues. Last semester, they had these meetings with Black Student Union, Athletic Director Max Urick and representatives from the residence halls.

With just two working months left in their term, Riemann and Neufeld said they will spend time in Topeka working with the Kansas Legislature and Kansas Board of Regents members.

Riemann is vice chair of the Student Advisory Council — a committee of regents universities' student body presidents — that advises the regents of issues concerning students at their universities. In Topeka, Riemann said he wants to address need-based financial aid issues.

Neufeld said she will take a less formal role in Topeka, talking to legislators about various K-State-related issues.

Nearly half of Kansas county offices remain open Monday

ASSOCIATED PRESS

While a majority of county governments in Kansas closed shop in honor of slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., 49 remained open.

Government offices in 56 Kansas counties closed Monday as the nation marked the 13th King holiday, according to a survey by The Topeka Capital-Journal.

Thirty-one of the 49 nonparticipating counties are in the western half of the state. Eight other counties are in southeast Kansas.

Gilbert Hammond, communications director of the Kansas chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was disappointed with the number of county governments not participating in the official King holiday.

"It's ironic that as we go into a new millennium, we still have communities that just don't understand about what Martin Luther King Day is all about," Hammond said. "What we have to do is to do a better job of educating people about his concern for all Americans. It's not a black-white thing, it's a people thing."

In Hammond's travels for the NAACP, the Geary County native found that many Americans rank Kansas as a leading state in promoting equal rights for all citizens, often citing the landmark Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education court decision in 1954 that led to the desegregation of the nation's public schools.

Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week

"What makes it so bad for our state right now is that people in many parts of the country actually think Kansas is still a cradle of the civil rights movement," Hammond said.

Several county commissioners told The Capital-Journal the King holiday never has had overwhelming support in many Kansas communities, especially in deeply rural areas, where the numbers of racial and ethnic minorities tend to be smallest.

Other commissioners, including Cowley County Commissioner Gerald Lawrence, said many counties were reluctant to add the King holiday to the list of annual paid vacation days.

"Another factor is that the King holiday is the most recent of the national holidays, having been started only in 1986," said Lawrence, of Winfield. "So far, not everybody in county government has made room for a new holiday on the calendar."

Counties such as Republic, Wallace, Wilson and Greenwood celebrate the King holiday with an existing county holiday.

Although more than half of the state's courthouses in counties west of U.S. Highway 81 were open for business Monday, some counties in the state's more populous eastern sections aren't participating in the national King holiday.

In Johnson County, with the state's second-largest population, county employees reported to work, as did employees of Butler County, a fast-growing suburban area near Wichita.

Computing and Network Services to remove Macintosh computers from labs

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Computing and Network Services will remove Macintosh computers from public use in university computing labs.

The computer lab in Nichols 126 will be closed, and the room will be returned to the Department of Computing and Information Sciences for use as a classroom.

The Sun Workstations from the lab will be moved to Dickens, Seaton and Durland halls. All other computers and equipment in the Nichols lab will be transferred to open spaces in other public labs on campus with the exception of six Macintosh computers that CNS will remove completely from public use.

The six Macintosh computers in the Nichols lab are the only Macintosh systems available for public use on campus.

Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services, said, "We would rather not limit the environments, but because of current budget restraints it makes the most sense."

She said the university's Macintosh systems are old, and it would be prohibitive to update them at this time.

According to the message on the Unix system, users can access by typing "describe n126," CNS believes it is not cost-effective to maintain the six computers that use the Macintosh platform.

The message continues to say CNS regrets taking the action, and future investments made in the university computing labs will be used for the remaining two platforms that function similarly, rather than being spread across three different systems.

"What we do support, we want to support well," Unger said.

Though students will no longer have access to Macintosh computers in the university's public computing labs, Macintosh systems in private and semi-private departmental labs will not be affected by this change.

Lakers 92, Magic 89

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Shaquille O'Neal burned his former team with 35 points, 15 rebounds and seven blocked shots as the Los Angeles Lakers beat the Orlando Magic 92-89 Monday.

The win was the third-straight and 15th in 19 games for the Lakers, who became the second NBA team to get 30 victories this season, joining the Seattle SuperSonics.

O'Neal, who played four seasons for the Magic before signing with the Lakers as a free agent in July 1996, has scored 30 or more points in five of the past six games.

Darrell Armstrong had a career-high 24 points, eight rebounds and nine assists for Orlando, which has lost four-straight games and 14 of its past 18.

Knicks 98, Celtics 82

NEW YORK — Allan Houston and Chris Mills scored 23 points apiece as the New York Knicks defeated the Boston Celtics for the 21st-straight time.

The win was the Knicks' second-straight, ending a stretch that began on Dec. 16 in which they had alternated wins and losses. New York, which blew out the Celtics by 32 here in November, has beaten Boston 11-straight times at home.

76ers 98, Kings 85

PHILADELPHIA — Allen Iverson had 24 points and 10 assists as the Philadelphia 76ers won their fourth in a row.

Jim Jackson scored 17 points for Philadelphia, while Derrick Coleman had 14 points and 14 rebounds. Theo Ratliff grabbed 13 rebounds and tied a career-high with eight blocks for the 76ers.

Mitch Richmond had 22 points, Corliss Williamson 19 and Olden Polynice 19 points and 11 rebounds for the Kings.

Timberwolves 117, Clippers 109

MINNEAPOLIS — Stephon Marbury had 20 points and 12 assists as the Minnesota Timberwolves extended their franchise-record winning streak to six games.

Kevin Garnett added 20 points and Tom Gugliotta had 19 points and nine assists as the Wolves won for the seventh time in eight home games.

Hornets 109, Raptors 88

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Matt Geiger, pressed into the lineup by an injury to Vlade Divac, matched his career high with 28 points to help the Charlotte Hornets beat the Toronto Raptors.

Glen Rice scored 38 points as the Hornets snapped a three-game losing skid hours after learning they will be without Divac, their starting center, for at least six weeks. Divac injured his left knee in a loss to Detroit last week and will undergo surgery today to repair cartilage damage.

Nets 95, Spurs 84

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Keith Van Horn's numbers weren't quite as flashy as Tim Duncan's, but the New Jersey rookie still held his own against the only player drafted ahead of him as the Nets defeated San Antonio.

Van Horn had 21 points and 10 rebounds, but shot just seven-for-30 from the field as he looked to score as often as possible and forced too many attempts.

Broncos' practice interrupted by chopper

SAN DIEGO — Espionage replaced execution Monday when the Denver Broncos' practice was momentarily disrupted by a TV news helicopter that hovered above the field.

Coach Mike Shanahan was not amused by the noisy intrusion during his team's first workout in San Diego in advance of Sunday's game against Green Bay.

About five minutes after practice began, the chopper appeared, circling the field four times and hovering above it for some five minutes. In all, the helicopter, from KFMB-TV in San Diego, was in the vicinity of the practice field, which belongs to the San Diego Chargers, for about 25 minutes.

"Maybe they thought they would help us with the crowd noise," Shanahan said, "because it was quite loud. But on the serious side, it was inappropriate. There are things we're doing from a game plan standpoint that we would like to keep within our organization, just as the Green Bay Packers have a game plan that they would like to keep private."

The Broncos also had to chase away another TV crew, which was shooting video from atop a nearby building.

"We talked to them and said we'd like to be able to run our practices without them being taped or shown on TV. They agreed not to show it, and they won't be there again. They agreed that nothing would be shown and the tapes would be destroyed. They were very cooperative and apologized for what they did," he said.

More than two dozen security guards were stationed in the hills surrounding the practice field; some were hired by the Broncos to augment the NFL's security staff, Shanahan said.

"I thought we were in Vietnam or something," Broncos linebacker John Mobley said. "It looked like there must have been people hiding in the trees."

The Cats had an appetite for Chickenhawk soup Saturday.
But 21 K-State turnovers and 14 offensive boards by KU enabled the Hawks to say

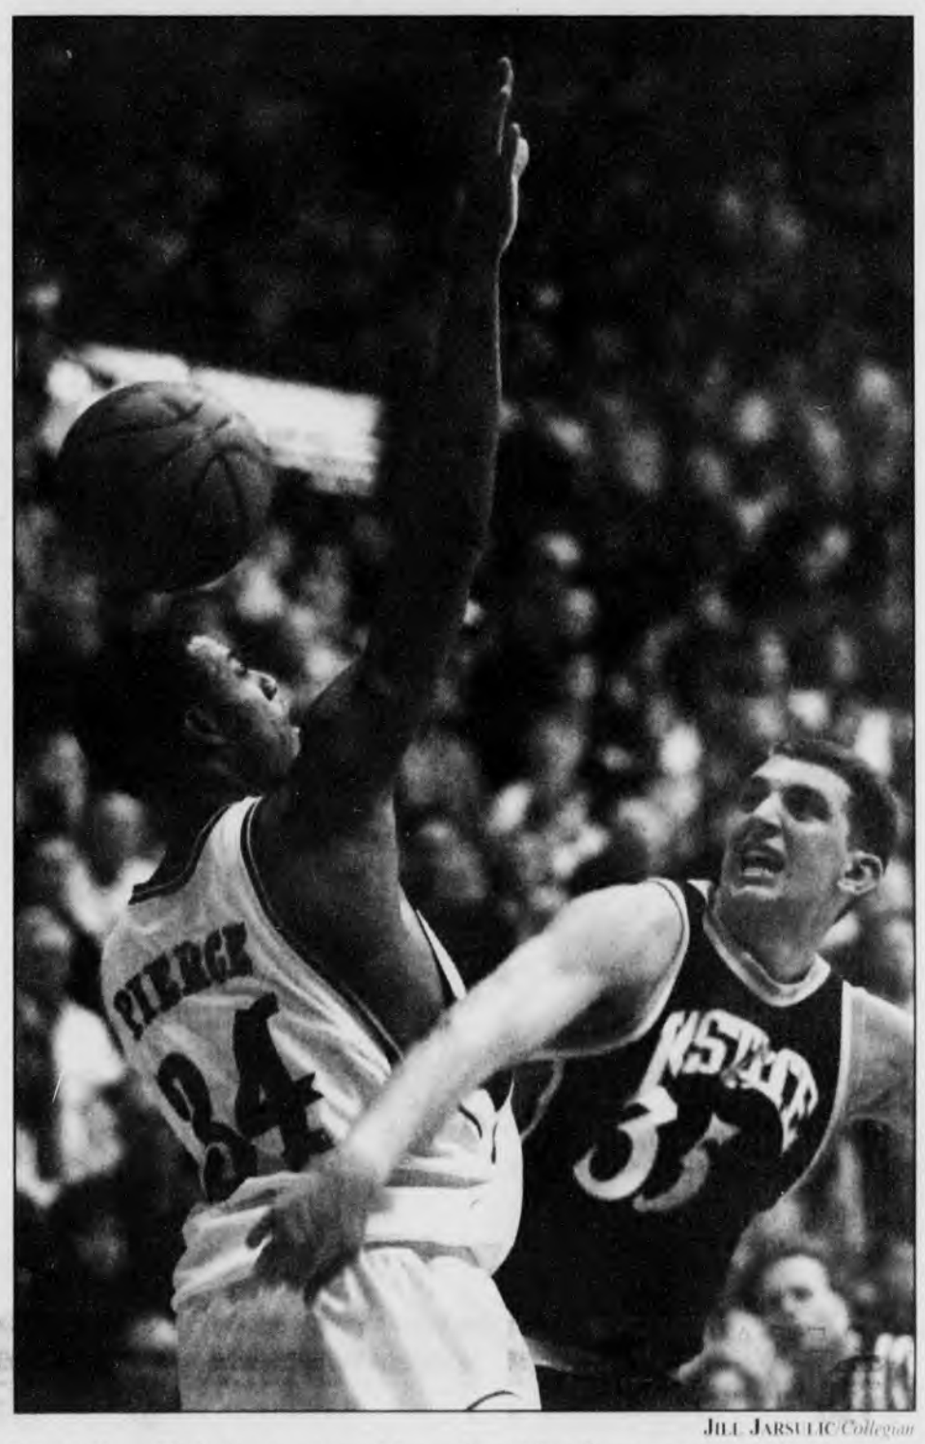
LAWRENCE — A sign above the north end of the Kansas student section warned visiting teams to "beware of the 'Phog'" in Allen Fieldhouse. And eerily enough, many circumstances surrounding Saturday's Sunflower Showdown were hauntingly familiar to events of the past.

The 55-game home winning streak the Jayhawks were anxious to tie was last broken in 1988 by K-State. On the same date in 1994, the Cats went into Allen Fieldhouse and defeated the No. 1-ranked Hawks.



With three minutes to go in Saturday's game, the Hawks were up 62-58, one point away from the 62-59 final score last season of the intrastate matchup in Manhattan.

But the Cats couldn't hang on to the tight deficit long enough, losing to the No. 3 Hawks 69-62.

Once again, junior forward Manny Dies was the player of the game from either team, scoring 26 points and pulling down 11 rebounds for his fourth double-double of the season. Junior center Shawn Rhodes had 11 points and senior guard Aaron Swartzendruber's eight rebounds were a season high.

As a team, the Cats out-rebounded the Hawks 21-14 in the 21 turnovers cause demise in K-State's defeat to Jayhawks

LAWRENCE — Turnovers killed K-State.

With 13:58 left in the game at Kansas on Saturday, K-State found itself atop a formidable giant on its home court in front of a sold-out Allen Fieldhouse.

But after that, things seemed to fall apart for the Cats.

K-State turned ice cold and went scoreless for the next three minutes, committing four turnovers in that span, allowing KU to regain the lead by five points.

Such seemed to be the case for K-State throughout the entire game. Whenever the Cats needed a basket to draw even with the No. 3 team in the country, they shot themselves in the foot with a turnover.

"That's it. We shot ourselves in the foot," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "We didn't adjust to their pressure defense, and we made a number of passes that were ill-advised. We turned the ball over too many times."

But the Cats still had their opportunities and, for the most

Sports watchers given another option by TCI

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan's sports fans coming back from winter break were given a nice surprise from TCI, Manhattan's cable system.

On Jan. 1, ESPN2 was added to the channel lineup of TCI. The addition brought the number of all-sports stations to three. ESPN, and Fox Sports Rocky Mountain were already on the cable system.

ESPN2 carries a variety of sports programming, including the National Hockey League, NCAA football and basketball, along with other sports. It also has nightly news programs featuring basketball, hockey and auto racing.

To make room for ESPN2, a channel had to be deleted from the previous lineup. Court TV was removed, and ESPN2 was put in its place, at channel 26 on the dial.

Richard Cofer, general manager of TCI, said the move was brought on by TCI's customers.

"Our customers drive our decisions," Cofer said. "(ESPN2) was one of the top-requested services, and Court TV was one of the lowest-rated."

Cofer said that having three all-sports stations is not a problem.

"Sports is one of the highest-rated kinds of programming viewers desire," he said, "and we try to add the kinds of stations our viewers want to see."

Scott Reed, junior in political science, is not a sports fan, but said the addition of ESPN2 is not a problem to him.

"I would have rather had Comedy Central or M2," Reed said, "but my roommates watch ESPN2."

Cofer said the response he has heard about the change has been positive. He said he has heard few complaints about the removal of Court TV and has received many calls of appreciation after the addition of ESPN2.

Because many of TCI's customers are college students, Cofer said they are an important factor in programming decisions.

"That's why we put the survey in the Collegian in November," Cofer said. "We wanted to know what the students wanted."

There are no plans for any K-State basketball games to be carried on ESPN or ESPN2 this season.

Records fall as K-State places 2nd in Wildcat Invitational

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's and men's track teams turned in several record-breaking performances, but were outscored by Nebraska in the final team standings at Friday and Saturday's Wildcat Invitational.

Sophomore thrower Renetta Seiler out-distanced her previous K-State and Ahearn Field House records of 67 feet, 4 inches set last Dec. 6 at the KSU Allcomer's meet with a weight throw of 67 feet, 9 inches.

"I was happy with what I threw," Seiler said. "I was a little slow with my competition throws, but I ended up throwing strongly in the end."

The second-place thrower, Katie Panek of Wichita State, heaved the weight 56 feet — more than 11 feet shorter than Seiler's first-place throw. Seiler's margin of victory, which is often quite large, helped her develop her competition philosophy.

"A lot of the competition for me is competition against myself," Seiler said.

Senior jumper Vanitta Kinard's situation is similar to Seiler's in that she is rarely challenged in the triple jump.

Kinard's triple jump of 43 feet, 3-3/4 inches, which was more than four feet farther than the No. 2 jump in the Wildcat Invitational, set a new Ahearn record.

However, she had to overcome plenty of adversity in order to break the record. Minutes before the triple jump competition, she ran the 55-meter hurdles, in which she placed second. While she was warming up for the race, all the triple jumpers completed their jumps. When Kinard arrived at the triple jump venue, she found that she had to complete her four jumps without any break.

"I couldn't catch my breath," Kinard said. "I think my jumps would have been better if I would have enough time to rest."

It only got worse for Kinard. On her final jump, which she believes would have been well more than 44 feet, her hair grazed the sand and the jump was measured from that mark.

In the long jump competition, Kinard's hair hit the sand twice, and she did not pass University of Missouri-Kansas City's Sheri Pewitt, who was in first place, until her final jump. Kinard's winning jump was 19 feet, 7-3/4 inches.

The women's team took two first place finishes in the distance races. Freshman Amanda Crouse finished first in the 1,000-meter run with a time of 2:56.71. Junior Kelly Andra ran away from the competition in the 3,000 with a time of 10:13.3.

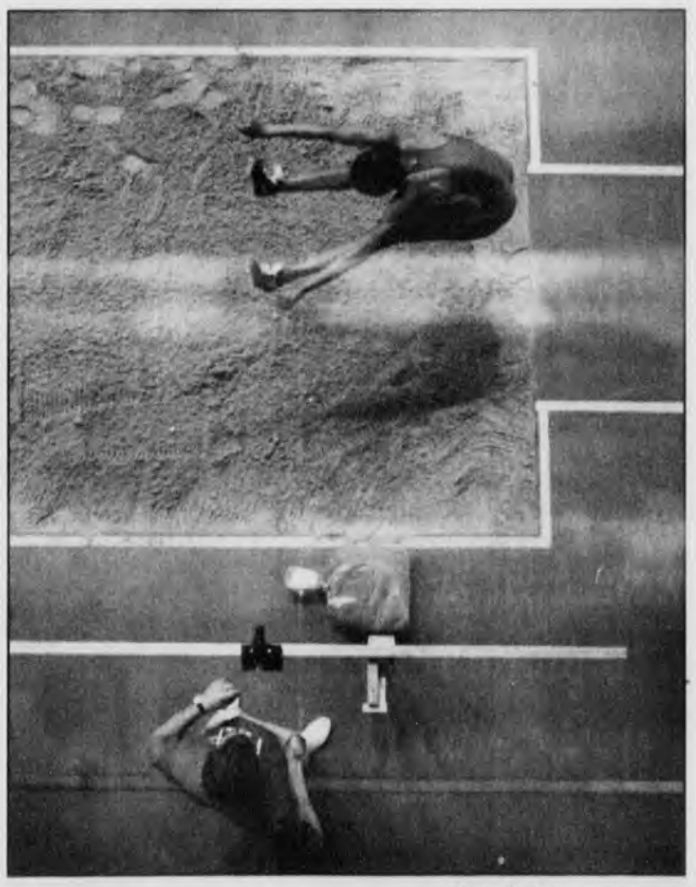
After just two days of heavy training and two days of light training, senior sprinter Keith Black was part of two record-breaking performances. Black's first meet record came when he won the 400 with a time of 47.9 seconds.

"It was a good race for me because I finished," Black said. "Technically I think I did everything right, but I'm just out of shape."

Black was also a part of the 4x400 relay that set a meet record with a time of 3:16.92.

K-State swept the top three places in high jump and added its third high jump NCAA Indoor National Championship qualifier when sophomore Attila Zsivoczky provisionally qualified by clearing 7 feet, 1 inch.

Zsivoczky, sophomore Nathan Leeper and junior Charles Burney each cleared 7 feet, 1 inch in the competition, but Zsivoczky took first place because he had fewer misses than Leeper and Burney. Leeper took second place while Burney finished in third place.



Leeper and Burney, who this season have already cleared 7 feet, 3 inches and 7 feet, 4-1/2 inches respectively, said they were disappointed in their performances.

"That was the worst jumping I've done in two years," Leeper said. "My approach felt good, but when I got into the air I didn't rotate over the bar right."

Burney said he had a problem with his approach.

"I've just got to work. I haven't done any approach work in about a month and a half," Burney said. "It's not as bad as it could be because we both hurt together."

K-State also did well in the 800, with freshman Matt Davis winning the race in 1:56.46 and senior Matt Schmoekel placing second with a time of 1:58.34.

Traditions traditionally turn things around at sporting events

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

Sun Dee is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu.

I thought it was gone.

After 2-1/2 years on purple turf, I thought all memories of KU songs and that haunting "Rock Chalk" chant had been permanently erased from my long-term memory.

What a slap in the face it was to attend my first game in Allen Fieldhouse.

When I attended KU, I was working out of town and didn't have the time or money to go to basketball games. In fact, I'd never set foot inside Allen until last fall when I went to the Chicago Bulls/Seattle Supersonics exhibition game.

But that was nothing like this.

Those Jayhawk fans were on their feet from the get-go. After the national anthem, the whole crowd swayed together and sang the alma mater, "Crimson and the Blue." Then, the fans enthusiastically clapped to the fight song and all joined in to shout the "Rock Chalk" chant at the top of their lungs.

Most of these traditions (except for the borrowed Florida Gators "chomp" toward the end of the game) undoubtedly have been in place for a long time.

When you have history and a tradition of excellence in a sport such as the Hawks have in basketball, these things naturally evolve.

In my experience, the only thing I can compare it to is a Nebraska football game. Or a Jimmy Buffett concert. It was almost religious. One way or the other, you had to have some feeling about the outcome, whether it had been a nail-biter or a blowout.

These crowds have figured out the part they can play in a close game. Although I wouldn't say the crowd was a factor in the Cats' loss Saturday, it certainly tried to be.

At times, the tenacity of the Cats hushed that crowd by refusing to let go of the close point spread.

But the K-Staters who were there attempted to make themselves heard despite the hostility they probably faced. In an atmosphere like that, Wildcat loyalty is to be strongly commended.

Maybe it was the intrastate rivalry or the intimate setting of Allen Fieldhouse. Maybe it was Wilt Chamberlain's presence. And maybe a Kansas-Missouri game is even more intense.

But there is a lesson to be learned.

Unrelenting crowd support, no matter how great or small, can affect a game. Until you see it in person, it's hard to believe. Some cynics would say it helped K-State's football team get to an Alliance Bowl game. As the football team rises the national ladder of success and the basketball teams submerge themselves in the challenge of Big 12 play, Cat fans should take this lesson to heart.

So at the next game you attend, from a sparsely populated women's basketball game to a sold-to-the-bleachers football game, remember that you can make a difference. Sure, the coaches might be distracted by the amount of noise, but they'll thank you if their players were pumped enough to overcome whatever was burdening them to steal a close one.

Cats keep KU game close, but fail to upset Jayhawks first half, a key to sticking close to the Hawks that Kansas coach Roy Williams noticed.

"Their whole team beat us to death on the backboards," Williams said.

But the Cats eased up on the boards in the second half while turning the ball over 21 times throughout the game. Starting point guard Duane Davis only turned it over once, but Swartzendruber and guard Chris Griffin combined for 13 turnovers.

The Hawks' shooting was cold for the first five minutes of the game as the Cats jumped out to a 9-2 lead. But KU pulled within two points at the 8:58 and the teams began a series of lead changes to close out the half. After eight lead changes, the Hawks went into the locker room up 32-31, the same halftime score of last year's game at Allen — only reversed.

"Their half-court defense was very similar to Arizona's," Griffin said. "As soon as we picked up the dribble, they swarmed us."

But the Hawks fought to stop Dies' success under the basket. Four lead changes and eight minutes later, the Hawks took the lead they would finish the game with.

"It's real frustrating," Swartzendruber said. "We play these games and get this close. It hurts, but we've got to figure out what we've got to do to hold them the last five minutes of the ball game."

But K-State coach Tom Asbury and his players agreed on one thing — close counts only in horseshoes and hand grenades.

"We could've won this game," Asbury repeated.

Williams was well aware of this fact.

"They get really emotionally high to play us," Williams said. "They get tired of us getting the attention. They are a much better team than last year's."

Turnovers kill Cats' chances

part, answered every run the Jayhawks threw at them. Guard Ayome May hit a three-pointer with 7:18 left in the second half that pulled K-State within four points, 56-52.

On the next trip down the floor, forward Manny Dies, who finished with a game-high 26 points and 11 rebounds, made a layup and had an opportunity for a three-point play. He missed the free-throw, but put the Cats within two with 6:26 left.

But K-State never got closer than that down the stretch as KU turned up the pressure and forced the Cats into mistakes that turned costly.

"We just didn't play smart," guard Chris Griffin said. "This game was a game of spurts. We came back with a spurt of our own, but we couldn't answer theirs."

Even in the first half, K-State had its chances to run away with the game, but turnovers were its downfall. Twice the Cats had an opportunity to increase their lead over the Hawks to six points, but turned the ball over in consecutive trips down the floor. KU forward Lester Earl took advantage of the opportunity and grabbed the loose ball and threw down a ferocious dunk, igniting the crowd and pulling within two points of K-State, 17-15, with 8:58 left in the first half.

"They killed us off steals in the transition game," Asbury said. "We just didn't adjust to their style of game. When they're grabbing you by the jugular, you have to adjust. If they keep their hands on you, you have to adjust."

All in all, K-State turned the ball over 21 times, a stat Asbury cringed at.

"You can't beat people turning the ball over 21 times," he said. "And that's the key."

Wildcats lose for 5th time in 6 games

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team's woes continued Saturday night as the Wildcats lost for the fifth time in six games.

For the second time in two weeks, No. 20 Nebraska beat the Cats. The 78-47 defeat in front of 2,836 fans at Bramlage Coliseum sent K-State's record to .500 at 7-7, and dropped the Cats to 1-3 in Big 12 play. The Cornhuskers improved to 14-5 with a 3-2 Big 12 mark.

Unlike the Jan. 4 game in Lincoln, which K-State led at halftime, the Cats never held the lead Saturday night.

"I was really pleased with our play tonight," Nebraska head coach Paul Sanderford said. "Everybody said we couldn't win on the road, so it was really sweet tonight to finally win in the Big 12 on the road. After (losses to) Colorado and Kansas, I was starting to wonder myself."

Nebraska took control of the game early, leading by as many as 12 points in the first 10 minutes of the game. To complicate matters for the Cats, two players — center Angie Finkes and guard Brit Jacobson — picked up their third fouls in the game's first 10 minutes. Jacobson played in foul trouble, while Finkes spent much of the night on the bench before fouling out.

Despite having two starters in foul trouble and only nine available players, the Cats managed to pull close to the Huskers late in the first half. Two Jacobson field goals sandwiched a basket by Nebraska center Charlie Rogers, and brought the Cats to within six points at 26-20 with fewer than four minutes remaining in the half.

"I thought at the 3:33 mark, we were right back in the game," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said, "but we turned the ball over three of our last seven possessions."

"I think that three minutes and 30 seconds was as significant as any time period in the game. That's where we had an opportunity to gain control of the game, but we let it slip away."

Nebraska recovered to go on an 11-4 run to end the half and take a 37-24 halftime lead. Sisters Jami and Nicole Kubik, both guards, combined for 18 of the Huskers' points at the half. Only four players — forwards Jenny Coalson and Nicky Ramage, Finkes and Jacobson — scored for the Cats in the first half.

The Cats continued to struggle with foul trouble in the second half, and the Huskers capitalized. Finkes picked up her fourth foul just 1:05 into the second half, and Jacobson played the final 16 minutes with four fouls. Three Wildcats fouled out of the game, leaving the already-shorthanded team with only six available players by the final buzzer.

Rogers capitalized on Finkes' absence by scoring 12 of her 18 points in the second half, making all four of her field goal attempts. All-Big 12 forward Anna DeForge, who is fourth in the conference with 17.3 points per game, ended up with 15 points and a team-leading eight rebounds for the Huskers.

Sanderford was happy with Rogers' play.

"Charlie Rogers came to war tonight," Sanderford said. "I thought she was the difference in the basketball game."

Nebraska's full-court pressure forced K-State into a season-high 29 turnovers.

Point guard Kim Woodlee had a dislocated right pinky finger, which didn't help in handling the ball. The Cats said they knew the pressure was coming, but couldn't do anything about it.

"We worked all week on press-breakers, and we just plain and simple didn't do it," Jacobson said.

Despite the turnovers and the 31-point loss, K-State's worst of the season, Patterson was philosophical about the game.

"I think that's as bad as it can get," she said. "I hope we've lived through as bad as it can get, and that's encouraging to me. I feel as though we're better than we played, but the reality is, you're as good as you play."

The Cats will try to use the game to learn from their mistakes.

"We've just got to take experiences and build off of them and grow from them," Patterson said. "Every game is a new game and a new opportunity. This one is over."

Program distributes grades

▸KATS COMPUTER SERVICE GIVES STUDENTS ACCESS TO GRADES.

APRYL MATHES
Kansas State Collegian

A new computer service known as K-State Access Technology System has been designed by information systems so students can be spared a chilly walk out to the mailbox to get their grades.

The project is in Phase I, said John Streeter, director of information systems. So far, students can take a look at their current and past grades, check out their semester schedule, graduate admission status, financial holds, account status and general student information, Streeter said.

Eventually, students will have the opportunity to enroll and drop-add in the glow of their own personal computers, he said.

"It's coming along," Streeter said. "We hope to implement the program in April to allow students to enroll for fall 1998 on the Web."

In the meantime, the idea of checking out records via the World Wide Web is catching on for K-State students. So far, about 7,000 people have accessed the data in KATS. That figure is growing at a rate of 50 per day, Streeter said.

"KATS itself is really to encourage access to your own records," Streeter said. "Eventually, you'll be able to look at your program of study and compare it to the classes you've already taken to see if you're on track."

Other features set to be implemented would allow students to order their Royal Purple yearbook, athletic tickets and parking permits, he said.

Bret Kimbough, senior in physical science, said he appreciated the access KATS provided to his grades.

"I was recently academically dismissed from the university, and KATS was how I found out," he said.

KATS might be useful for graduate students to allow the opportunity to check on their graduate admission status, and at some point, order transcripts for potential employers.

"Honestly, I could see KATS becoming an integral part of my future," said Chad Roth, graduate student in agronomy. "The services they have planned for the next phase are going to alleviate a lot of anxiety. You see, as a grad student, I need to maintain a certain GPA, and KATS provides me with the access I'm after."

Streeter said he foresees some point in the future where grades might not have to be sent through the mail.

That would certainly make Sheldon Streeter, senior in construction science, pleased, he said.

"When I got my grade card, the carbon copy was so bad that I couldn't tell what any of my grades were," he said. "I was forced to use KATS to figure out what the hell was going on. However, it actually turned out to be a pleasant experience on the Web."

Many schools are attempting to implement programs such as KATS on their own campuses, John Streeter said.

"It's a hot thing right now," he said. "Some schools are doing the rudimentary parts, but not necessarily exactly where we're at."

It's really just about providing self-access, Streeter said.

"We've been planning to make this happen for a while," he said. "It's going to be great for the students, and that's really what it's all about."

Lagtime in service causes concern

LORY STONE
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Access Technology System has a new promise for K-State students. But concern about the system's lag is growing.

Associate Registrar Gunile DeVault said this lagtime is only a minor side-effect to the revolutionary new system. In defense of the system, DeVault emphasized it is still in a developmental stage and has not yet been stabilized.

He blamed the lagtime on the popularity of the system, as well as the work still being done on it. KATS is up and running from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., he said, and after 5 p.m., students might be booted off so necessary computing processes can be done to improve the system.

"The computing people on this campus don't go home at 5," DeVault said, because they are continually working to stabilize the system.

John Streeter, director of information systems, said he agreed. Streeter said before this system, there was nothing like it. He said the lag was a consequence of the system not yet being fully developed.

"It still needs time to mature," Streeter said. "It will be a good thing in the long run."

Although it will take some time to get all the functions going, the benefits of a system such as KATS are high, he said.

In addition to accessing KATS from personal computers, K-State students can also check their grades at stations in the K-State Student Union, Hale Library and Anderson Hall.

Student leader helps plan annual Hispanic conference

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

A K-State student leader is one of seven college students involved in planning the largest annual Hispanic conference in the United States.

Leo Prieto, junior in Spanish, premedicine and Latin American studies, was selected to help plan the 1998 U.S. Hispanic Leadership Conference.

As the Kansas delegate, Prieto's duties began by attending a meeting for the U.S. Hispanic Leadership Conference Program Planning Committee in Chicago from Dec. 12 to 14. There are 25 people on the committee.

"It's an honor and an amazing experience to be involved," Prieto said. "We were selected to bring new ideas to the conference, because we're the ones participating in it."

More than 7,000 participants attended the conference last year, and the overwhelming majority were college students, Prieto said.

"Young people are interested in making a difference and so we brainstormed how to get information out to people and have more hands-on workshops," Prieto said. "There are more events geared toward us, the youth."

PRIETO

Prieto has attended the annual conference in Chicago for the past three years.

For the second year, he will teach a workshop on community or campus organizing.

"More or less, they wanted feedback on last year and I threw out names of possible speakers," Prieto said. "We basically came up with next year's program and workshop."

In addition to a Career Fair composed of companies and corporations recruiting Hispanic leaders, there are workshops on policy-making, education and leadership.

The 16th annual conference is scheduled for Oct. 1-4 and celebrated pride, diversity, empowerment, community and unity.

As president of K-State's Hispanic American Leadership Organization, Prieto organized a month of events to celebrate and explore Hispanic heritage.

Prieto was also honored by the U.S. Hispanic Leadership Institute at last year's conference for his work as an intern during the summer in his hometown of Garden City.

During his internship, he registered 500 new voters and led a youth empowerment program for young people in his community.

▸ PARKING SERVICES STUDYING WAYS TO IMPROVE ON EXPERIMENT.

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

Parking Services is studying K-State's shuttle system to try to improve campus transportation.

The service, which runs every half hour between Edwards Hall, the K-State Student Union and the KSU Foundation Center, is being used to test the feasibility of a larger, campuswide shuttle system.

"Right now, it's almost an experiment," said Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services. "We're looking at several things — should we build a parking garage or should we build a shuttle system?"

Parking Services is looking at a limited number of options to address the issue of limited campus parking.

"I suppose you've got three choices," Abbott said.

"You can do nothing. ... One answer, certainly, is a parking garage. One answer is a shuttle."

To evaluate the situation, Parking Services plans to look, in part, toward students.

"I don't want to pay any more than necessary," Abbott said. "So that's why we want everyone to be involved, and that's why we specified we want open forums."

Abbott said there might be as many as three or four such forums.

"We want a consensus from faculty, students and staff," Abbott said, "because it will impact everybody, no matter what we do."

Another part of the evaluation will come from the city of Manhattan, which is also looking at a shuttle service. K-State is paying for a small portion of that study, and as a result, will be included.

"The city is looking at a shuttle," Abbott said.

"We asked to be included from a smaller point of view."

Conducted by TranSystems Corp. of Kansas City, Mo., the study will try to encompass many modes of transportation, including bicycling, walking, autos along with parking garages.

"The study is a comprehensive transportation plan, and it will look at a whole bunch of issues from a transportation and land-use standpoint," said Eric Cattell, senior planner in community development. "It's kind of a long-awaited project."

Abbott expects the study to help decide the fate of K-State's transportation program.

"The study should tell us all that we need to know about the economics of this," he said.

Abbott hopes the cooperation will extend beyond the period of study.

"If the city does a shuttle system and we do a parking garage, we still want nodes where they cross," he said.

Nothing has been decided yet, however. The study is still in the planning stages.

"We're still in the process of finalizing the scope of services with the consultant," Cattell said. "Hopefully, it will start in March some time."

For now, the shuttle, funded through the parking budget, will continue on its current route.

"For the most part, we're a customer-service organization, so we set up a shuttle service," Abbott said. "We have a great variety of people using it, and that's great. I'm happy to do it."

For some of the 90-plus students who use the shuttle daily, the choice is clear.

"It's very convenient for me," said Deadra Hornung, senior in family studies and human services.

"I personally just find the shuttle easy to use."

Alumni legislators to be honored

BRANDON R. GROSSARDT
Kansas State Collegian

Governmental Relations Committee is planning several events in the coming months to honor K-State alumni now serving in the Kansas Legislature.

During those events and throughout the session, committee members will discuss student concerns with representatives in the Statehouse.

Events begin in Topeka on Feb. 12, when all Kansas Board of Regents universities participate in State Education Day, educating legislators and other officials about higher education-related issues.

Patrick Carney, Governmental Relations Committee chair, said committee members will present several issues.

The regents' supplemental grant proposal, if passed by the Legislature, will increase state funding by $500,000 annually to K-State and would allow for 1,000 more students to receive financial assistance, he said.

A similar program already proposed by Gov. Bill Graves would allocate $8,619,277 for technology improvements to be distributed among regents universities. If passed, K-State will receive $2,358,865 in one-time funds for the advancement of technology on campus.

Carney said Governmental Relations Committee members and other regents schools' representatives favor these initiatives.

"This is an event where all regents schools speak as one," Carney said.

State Education Day gives student governments a chance to express their concerns about new or overlooked issues important to students, he said.

Another Governmental Relations Committee event is K-State Day. Scheduled for Feb. 16 (K-State's birthday), the event will be another opportunity for Student Governing Association members to voice concerns of K-State students.

"We just want to remind people that K-State is here and that we do have needs," committee member Elizabeth Gregory said.

The committee will end the session with a special day to recognize K-State alumni serving their state. "Cats in the Capitol," sponsored by SGA and the KSU Alumni Association, will be a day-long celebration in the Statehouse on March 4.

Carney said the event will be a chance to recognize the efforts of all legislators, not just alumni.

"We can make our presence known," he said.

Carney added that students are encouraged to communicate their concerns to Governmental Relations Committee members during the session.

"Now is the time," he said. "Students must voice their concerns so we can take them on to the legislators."

The committee participated in one legislative event during the 1997 session, but is increasing its Statehouse presence this year. Such an increase gives everyone ample opportunity to get involved, Carney said.

Americans ambushed in Guatemala

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GUATEMALA CITY — Gunmen ambushed a bus carrying 16 American college students and teachers on an isolated Guatemalan highway. Marched at gunpoint to a nearby sugar cane field, all were robbed and five were raped during the 90-minute assault.

The group from St. Mary's College in Maryland has returned home following the attack in Santa Lucia Cotzulmalguapa, a hilly region known for banditry about 40 miles from the Guatemalan border.

The three staff members and 13 students, all women, were returning Friday afternoon to Guatemala City after concluding an educational tour of historic and cultural sites.

Two pickup trucks stopped their bus, and seven men with semiautomatic weapons forced everyone into the nearby field, said police and college spokesman Torre Meringolo.

He said the armed bandits first robbed the Americans. "Then they sexually assaulted five of the women, all students."

The gunmen held the group for 1-1/2 hours, the college said in a statement.

The surrounding area, where guerrilla activities were once common, has a reputation for lawlessness and banditry. Guatemala has been shaken the past year or so by a wave of kidnappings, roadblock assaults and a surge in crime since the 36-year civil war ended.

The increase in violence first drew national attention when 22-year-old college student Beverly Sandoval Richardson was kidnapped in May 1996. Following six months of public appeals by her family and a fruitless search by police, her body was discovered in a shallow grave. Twenty people were arrested in connection with her death.

The students who were raped were treated at Herrera Llerandi Hospital in Guatemala City and returned Saturday to the United States. The remaining students returned to Washington's Dulles airport Sunday night and were met by the college's president and dean of students.

"Our first concern is for the well-being of the students, faculty and their families," college president Jane Margaret O'Brien said earlier in a statement.

"We are heartbroken by this senseless violent attack on our students and colleagues."

The college has been working with the State Department, which is treating it with the utmost urgency, Meringolo said.

The State Department official said that the U.S. government is working with Guatemalan authorities.

Ice storm causes more problems for New England

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUGUSTA, Maine — Even as more and more residents get their electricity back, the thousands still left behind are getting creative in trying to attract a little help from utility crews.

In western Maine, a sign on one lawn thanked Central Maine Power Co. for its efforts but politely reminded crews that the home had no power, asking for service "when you have a chance," Bridgton police Chief Robert Bell said Sunday.

In Augusta, another hard-hit area, a sign outside an apartment building offered free coffee and doughnuts in exchange for power.

Power companies said about 31,000 customers in Maine and about 53,500 customers in northern New York were still waiting today for service to be restored. A Jan. 9 ice storm that coated lines and branches with inch-thick ice knocked out power to 500,000 at one point.

In the 10 days since, snow has fallen on parts of the Northeast and temperatures have become much colder. Thousands of Canadians were still struggling after that country's worst ice storm ever.

Frayed nerves and frustration have also appeared.

A woman burst into tears after getting a parking ticket while she was staying with a friend in Lewiston, Maine, because of the storm. Police told her to come to the station to void her ticket.

Lewiston police officer Timothy Darnell said others in shelters have been taken to hospitals for medication as the stress of being forced from their homes builds up.

Bell said the protracted power outages caused some increases of domestic disturbances and burglaries of vacated homes.

But "I've seen 99-point-nine percent positive reactions," he said.

New York Gov. George Pataki said he has secured federal help to replace food that became spoiled when the region lost electricity. Food inspectors reported that restaurants and supermarkets lost between $250 to $100,000 per store. Some residents had their own food go bad as well.

"I lost a whole refrigerator and deep freezer's worth," said Rosie Matott, whose power has been restored.

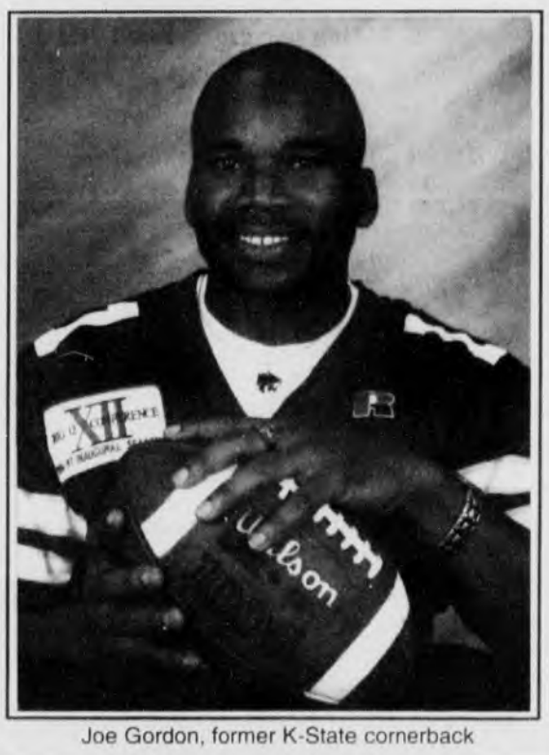
Cavalleria rusticana, or "rustic chivalry," features music by Pietro Mascagni and is based on a play by Giovanni Verga. Set in Sicily on Easter Sunday, it is the tale of a peasant girl who fears that the man she loves is having an affair with a married woman. Holiday joy turns to bitter sorrow when the woman's husband challenges the girl's boyfriend to a duel.



Continuing the theme of passion and adultery, Ruggiero Leoncavallo's I pagliacci, "the strolling players," is an opera-within-an-opera. The tale told by a commedia dell'arte troupe takes on a life of its own, bringing tragedy to the actors.

These are operas in the grand tradition -- sung in Italian and performed with full orchestra. With English-language supertitles you won't miss a word.

Students from the Frank Bergman Elementary School after-school choir perform Monday morning as part of Martin Luther King week activities in Manhattan Town Center.

Town Center Celebrates

▸LOCAL NAACP CHAPTER WORKS WITH K-STATE, COMMUNITY AND CHURCHES TO PROJECT IDEAS OF HOLIDAY

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

The audience at Manhattan Town Center chimed in as the Frank Bergman Elementary School after-school choir sang "Let There be Peace on Earth" during Monday's community Martin Luther King Jr. Day celebration.

Jim Spencer was at the mall representing Manhattan's chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Spencer said his goal for the NAACP was to make things better for young people today.

He said the civil rights movement is history for children growing up today, but he lived through it.

"I saw crosses burning, sit-ins, demonstrations, dogs sicced on me," Spencer said.

Spencer said the local NAACP chapter worked with K-State, the community and local churches to project the image and ideas of Martin Luther King Jr.

"We all should remember Martin Luther King's dream," said Dorothy Mitchell, who was at the mall representing the Flint Hills Job Corps Center. She said the ideas of Martin Luther King Jr. brought people together.

Works of art, essays and poems from grade school, high school and K-State students are on display at the mall until Friday.

Sherry Wright, a member of the task force set up for the community celebration of Martin Luther King Day, stressed the importance of displaying the work of Manhattan's young people for public viewing.

"Children are more honest and more expressive than adults," Wright said.

She said the significance of the art and writings was it meant the participants had studied the history of the civil rights movement.

This was the goal of the Manhattan Board of Education six years ago when it made Martin Luther King Day a school holiday, Wright said. The board didn't want the students to simply have a day off, but to go out into the community and express King's vision of racial harmony.

First-grade students from Amanda Arnold Elementary School had a friendship wreath on display made of hundreds of paper hands of different colors.

Students of Manhattan Catholic Schools wrote essays on civil rights.

Woodrow Wilson student Jessica Rogers contributed a boldly colored drawing for the holiday. Across the middle were the words "Thank You Martin!"

Graduate student artists bring diversity to Manhattan exhibit

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

Eight ceramists, three painters, two sculptors, one metalsmith and one graphic artist have works in "Uncommon Views on Common Ground," an exhibit opening today at the Manhattan Center for the Arts. The works, created by K-State graduate students in fine arts, are on display in both of the center's galleries.

"It's a very diverse show, in that we have work from many different disciplines," said Karen Lauseng, interim executive director of the center.

Lauseng said the exhibit's mission is to let students interact and learn from one another and to enrich both students and the public.

"It provides them with the opportunity to show their work and to discuss the direction their works are going, and they gain ideas from one another," she said.

A reception at the center from 7 to 9 tonight will allow patrons to mingle with the artists and talk about their works. Refreshments will be served.

"You'll have the opportunity to meet the artists and discuss the work and understand the work," Lauseng said.

Graduate student Andrew Naeger, who has one piece in the exhibit, said he liked that the works are being displayed at the arts center.

"I think it provides the opportunity to exhibit work not normally seen by the public," Naeger said.

Naeger, the only graphic design student in the exhibit, said he didn't feel overwhelmed by the other artists.

"It's inspiring, really, to have such a wide variety," Naeger said.

Lauseng said the center exhibits graduate students' artwork at least every other year.

"We like to do it often enough that all graduate students have the opportunity to show their work here," she said. "We work closely with the art department at K-State."

Overall, Lauseng said she was enthusiastic about the consistent quality of the pieces being exhibited.

"We have a great show, and we're happy about it," she said.

"Uncommon Views on Common Ground" runs until March 7 at the Manhattan Center for the Arts. The exhibit is free and open to the public.

McCain season kicks off with variety, change

CORBIN CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

From historical accounts adapted for the stage to timeless musicals to children's productions, McCain Auditorium offers a diverse lineup for its spring 1998 season.

David Frain, who has had the position of assistant director for two of his 10 years with McCain, said at the beginning of each new season he tries to make the diversity of McCain's shows accommodate the diversity within the Manhattan community.

"There's a little something for everyone," Frain said. "This season there is a wide range of art forms, entertainment and education."

Included in this season's lineup are the Prague Chamber Orchestra, Arnold Lobel's classic children's tale "Frog and Toad are Friends," the Arte Chorale and "Grease," a musical trip back to 1950s Americana that made its premiere in 1972.

New to McCain this season is the Italian National Opera.

The first show of the McCain Performance Series is the "Blue Heron Theatre: We Are Your Sisters." The production tells the story of the more than 2 million free and enslaved women living in Africa during Victorian times.

Frain said McCain's new season is full of variety. This season McCain is also going through a change, Frain said, with the temporary elimination of computerized ticket sales.

For now, McCain Box Office cashiers must sell what are known as "hard tickets," or tickets sold without the use of computers. McCain sold hard tickets for its first 20 years of operation, Frain said.

McCain began the computerized ticket system a few years ago, after Bramlage Coliseum became the first complex on campus to use it. Bramlage allowed various establishments on campus, including McCain, to use the system.

In May 1997, Bramlage bought a new system and chose not to include McCain with the system. Frain and other McCain representatives are looking for a new computerized ticket system.

"It's a unique world concerning the packages available," Frain said of the ticket systems. He said McCain was considering using TicketMaster. Frain said this, however, was just an option at this point.

Scheduling difficulties

Because of a disagreement between performers and orchestra management, it is unclear whether the RTE Irish National Radio Orchestra and Dancers, scheduled for March 14, will keep their performance date. Representatives from McCain Auditorium and the orchestra management are working to resolve this disagreement and will do what they can to keep the date, said David Frain, assistant director of McCain. Ticket holders will be notified as soon as the issue has been resolved.

Living a life to the fullest

▶ ALPHA OF CLOVIA HOUSEMOTHER BRINGS WORLD AWARENESS TO HOUSE RESIDENTS.

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

Starting a school in Venezuela and meeting Prince Charles are just two of the experiences Doris Compton has had in her 70 years.

Traveling with her husband, who was a Presbyterian missionary, has given this Osborne, Kan., woman the opportunity to travel and teach around the world.

Compton has now settled in Manhattan as housemother at Alpha of Clovia.

Residents of Clovia said Compton's influence has changed the way they see the world.

"She brings a lot of diversity to our house," said Michelle Sinn, senior in agricultural education and Clovia resident.

"She has really helped us become more aware of the world."

Compton, who received her doctorate from the University of Arkansas, began her global education in Cairo, Egypt. She taught at American University.

"When I got off the plane I couldn't read or speak Arabic. I had to learn to trust people and ask them for help, even though I was the educator," Compton said.

From Egypt she traveled to Venezuela where she and her husband lived in a former mining camp for seven years.

"We had no radio, no TV, no roads. The only way in or out was by airplane," Compton said.

The area also lacked something else — a school.

"They told me 'You're an educator — build a school,' so that was my job," Compton said.

Compton began her task by visiting the International Baccalaureate in New York to develop curricula for the school in Venezuela that universities around the world would accept.

"After my first visit to New York, I hand-carried all the books we needed back to Venezuela so we could start school on time," Compton said. "That was a lot of books to carry through customs."

Compton said she also had to overcome cultural differences among the students.

"It was challenging. We had kids from 32 countries and had to teach simultaneously in English, French and Spanish," she said.

After leaving, she taught at the University of Puerto Rico briefly, then in 1986 she was part of the first group of Americans to visit the Soviet Union after Chernobyl. Later, she returned to America to teach English at K-State for three years. Soon she went back to Cairo where she was the chair of the English department at the Ramses College for Girls.

Compton said Cairo was her favorite place she has lived.

"You have this incredible sense of history there. You can walk out and be a part of the pyramids. You have a sense that history is real," she said.

She said living in Egypt also gave her a different view of humanity.

"I learned that there is no one person that is better than anyone else. We are all children of the same father, and we can't judge based on economics, race or social standing," she said.

CLIF PALMBERG/ Collegian

Doris Compton is the housemother at Alpha of Clovia. Compton has lived in places such as Egypt, Venezuela and Puerto Rico.

These life experiences have prepared Compton for the role of housemother, the residents of Clovia said.

"She really cares about us a lot, and there isn't anything she won't do," said Amy Hoover, senior in secondary education and president of Clovia.

"She has been able to tell us a lot of neat stories and has added a lot to the house," Hoover said.

Compton said liking and understanding people is the most important quality necessary for the job.

"I know what it is to be away from home and family. I'm also an academic first and know when the girls really need to study," she said.

Compton said that, along with her job, she has also enjoyed being close to family members living in the Manhattan area and has no intention of going anywhere for a while.

"I guess I should retire, but I'm not necessarily that interested in retiring."

Evening college classes assist students in juggling other responsibilities

LORY STONE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's evening college has been steadily growing since its creation in fall 1996.

"Evening courses are available and convenient, especially for students who work or have family obligations," said Melinda Sinn, public information coordinator for the Division of Continuing Education.

The courses are offered in semester-long and eight-week sessions so students have the option of working full time while continuing their college education, Sinn said.

In addition to nontraditional students, which make up the majority of the evening college's population, the number of traditional students enrolled is increasing.

"If regular courses are full, many students are turning to evening courses to meet their basic requirements," Sinn said. "There is no difference in regular and evening courses. They are taught by the same faculty."

Tracy Spann, freshman in special education and art therapy, said she discovered an advantage to taking evening college. Spann said she found that the Spanish course she wanted to take meets only twice a week in the evening as opposed to four times a week for the day-time class.

"It is definitely more convenient this way," she said.

Evening college only recently became available for K-State students.

"Evening college began on an experimental basis," said David Stewart, associate dean of Continuing Education.

One of the primary purposes of the program is to make entry-level courses more accessible to nontraditional students by meeting at night instead of during the morning or afternoon.

The first semester of evening college was popular, he said, estimating that it included 12-15 courses with a total enrollment of 350-375 students. The spring 1996 semester had similar numbers.

Because of increased requests and encouragement from the student body, the fall 1997 semester expanded to about 45 courses.

The enrollment for this semester tripled, with more than 1,400 students enrolling and 35-40 courses offered.

King's life, teachings celebrated during week

Luther King Jr. Task Force, said she believes ideal race relations have not yet been realized.

"A fella asked me this morning on the radio what percentage of it I had thought we'd realized, and I answered that it's a negative percentage. We've gone backwards," Wright said.

"The numbers are old hat. We all know the numbers — that one out of every three black males between 11 and 25 is in some way involved in the criminal justice system ... 17 percent of the drugs used in the U.S. are used by blacks, but they comprise 55 percent of those arrested and 74 percent of those sentenced for drug use.

"Something's wrong with that. African-American man, with the same training, earns 56 percent of what a white American man earns in the same position. We aren't even close."

She said it happens here at K-State, too.

"African-American students are harassed on this campus and in the public schools and on our neighborhood streets. Horrible incidents of racist graffiti at our African-American high school principal's home," Wright said. "As long as I am a part of the white power structure of this country, I bear some responsibility.

"And so part of why I am here tonight is to beg the forgiveness of my African-American brothers and sisters and to tell them it will stop."

The service was delivered by Samuel Mann, executive director of St. Mark's church and the executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference of Greater Kansas City.

After a series of songs by the United Black Voices Gospel Choir, the candle-lighting ceremony took place. All the attendants lit candles and held hands with their neighbors, and the chapel was silent as they all bowed their heads.

The Rev. Don Fallon, K-State coordinator of religious activities, delivered the closing words.

And then they sang.

City commission adopts bicycle plan

Avenue between Claflin Road and Kimball Drive has been proposed for the year 2000. Also, campus drives will gain more bicycle route designations.

To finance the proposed city street changes, Fehr said improvements with the highest priority will be completed concurrently with general road upkeep, such as resurfacing.

"This is the most systematic and economical way to do it," he said.

For funds to finance K-State's additions, Taussig said the City/University Tax Fund and federal transportation money are viable alternatives. Parking Services could also pick up a portion of the tab, he said.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said parking permits raise money for Parking Services. If necessary, a similar option could begin with bicycles to finance the bicycle-related improvements.

Fehr said changes won't happen immediately. Instead, the bicycle master plan is a long-term project that must be implemented simultaneously with street maintenance. However, the addition of a bicycle lane to Manhattan Avenue will be among the city's top priorities, he said.

The final draft of the bicycle master plan is being prepared by Land Plan Engineering of Kansas City and should be available to the public sometime this spring.

Fee might reduce fees for students by $45,077 grams are of a higher caliber than many conference schools.

Any decrease hurts the department even more, and that hurts the university as a whole, he said.

"I don't understand how important it is to you all to be able to compete at the highest level athletically. The athletic department is the number one PR tool for this university," Cavello said.

Cavello said the department wasn't looking for an increase in fees, but had hoped to at least keep its fee level the same for the next two fiscal years.

"We want to get up there with the big boys in terms of the amount of money we spend on our teams and helping them compete on a national level," he said. "But we want to do it with the help of the students, not in spite of the students."

Netanyahu, Clinton to discuss terms of troop pullback

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will tell President Clinton that Israel cannot withdraw from more than 9 percent of the West Bank in the next troop pullback, a senior Cabinet minister said Tuesday.

Netanyahu left for Washington, D.C. Tuesday with Israeli media saying Clinton will seek a double-digit withdrawal of 12 to 15 percent at their meeting Tuesday.

Addressing 5,000 angry supporters Sunday night in Gaza City, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat said Palestinians would get a state no matter what Israel did and warned of the possibility of riots and violence similar to the intefadeh, or uprising, that began in 1987.

NETANYAHU

"We had seven years of intefadeh, and (we can) start a new one. I'm saying a new one so that everybody knows we are ready. We are prepared. Our people are the people of martyrs," he said, making a gesture indicating a stamp of approval for such action.

Arafat will meet Clinton on Thursday.

In a carefully arranged show of support, most Cabinet members were present at Ben Gurion International Airport for Netanyahu's early morning departure. Ministers slapped Netanyahu's back or shook his hand before he walked up the stairs into the plane.

Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon, a hard-liner who has been one of Netanyahu's closest advisers on the peace process, said the prime minister would offer a pullback of no more than 9 percent.

"It is possible to divide it (the withdrawal), but under no circumstances will it be a double-digit figure," Sharon told reporters on the tarmac.

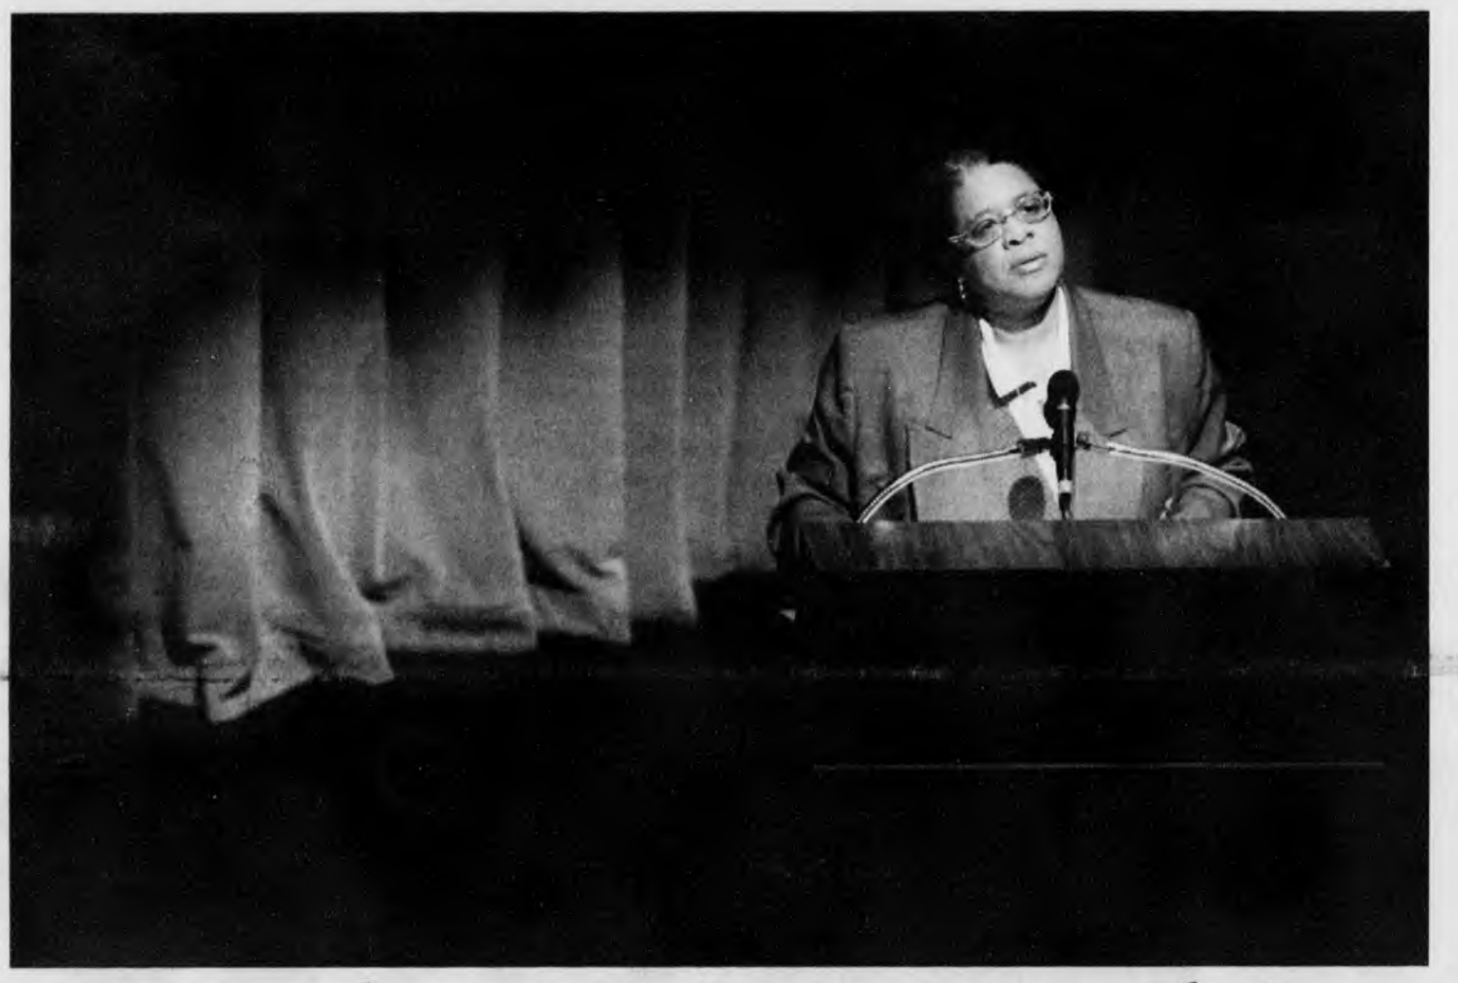
Clinton expects Netanyahu to present a detailed plan for a significant troop pullback, one of three Israel had promised to carry out by mid-1998 as part of a U.S.-brokered peace agreement.

However, Netanyahu has indicated he will carry out one pullback, instead of three, and that this withdrawal is linked to whether the Palestinians carry out a 12-page list of demands adopted last week by Israel's Cabinet. Most demands deal with security issues.

The Palestinians have accused Israel of using the list as a pretext to avoid carrying out the withdrawal, and noted that Israel has failed to fulfill many of its own obligations from the U.S.-backed peace accords.

The Israeli daily Haaretz said Tuesday that Clinton was considering a proposal prepared by aides under which the upcoming pullback would be broken into three smaller ones, to be carried out in the next few months, as the Palestinians begin meeting some of their security obligations.

Israel's main complaint has been that the Palestinians are not doing enough to rein in Islamic militants who have carried out more than a dozen suicide bombings in Israel since 1994.



In a related development, two suspected Islamic militants, believed to be behind a pair of suicide bombings in Jerusalem in July and September, appear Tuesday before a Palestinian court in the West Bank town of Jericho.

The two were arrested over the weekend in the West Bank town of Nablus. Last week, Palestinian security forces raided a large bomb factory of the Islamic militant group Hamas in Nablus and arrested four people.

Mary Montle Bacon encouraged awareness, honesty and evaluation of the American dream in the keynote speech for Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week on Tuesday morning.

Her speech, "Realizing the dream: We need to be the change we want," spoke less about Martin Luther King Jr.'s achievements, and instead asked the question, "What is the relevance of his dream today?"

Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead officially opened the speech by urging everyone to recognize every day as a day to live out King's vision of a better world.

"A problem inappropriately defined suggests solutions that are inadequate," Bacon said at the beginning of her speech. She added that to define the problem, people must have a vision.

That vision is an honest assessment of racism in America today, she said.

"It's easier to fight racism in South Africa than in our communities," she said. "And it's easier to fight it in our communities."

Bacon said Americans should begin asking themselves tough questions about how people devalue those around them.

"America is the greatest experiment on the face of the earth," she said. "Only by facing the failures of the experiment do we have the right to celebrate its triumphs."

Among the failures, she cited a survival-of-the-fittest mentality, and an elitist educational system.

She also noted tother, less obvious ways that racism affects society.

"There is no malice required for Governor supports salary increases for K-State faculty

MATT KREPS
Kansas State Collegian

Recent budget proposals by Gov. Bill Graves and various state legislators might take steps to correct K-State's longtime lag behind peer institutions in faculty salaries.

A 1995 report from the Faculty Affairs Subcommittee on Faculty Salaries and Fringe Benefits — the most recent report on file at Hale Library — shows the average K-State professor makes more than $7,000 less than peers at other schools.

President Jon Wefald said the problem is geographic.

"Kansas has been a conservative state, and they just don't choose to fund faculty salaries like they do on the East and West coasts," he said.

Historical breakdown
See Page 8 for a time line on the history of professor salaries in the past 130 years.

The report chronicles comments from departments all across campus that suggest the low salaries are embarrassing to the faculty. According to the report, some departments expect to lose promising young faculty to higher-paying positions.

Brad Fenwick, chair of the Faculty Affairs Committee of Faculty Senate, said the problem isn't just at K-State, but the report makes K-State more visible in the fight to raise salaries. The annual report highlights the gap in salaries and benefits between K-State and its peer institutions and shows the problems K-State faces because of low salaries.

"The consequences (of low salaries) are hard to document, but they are real," Fenwick said.

One noticeable consequence is difficulty keeping faculty at K-State.

"We have a very hard time holding on to our very best and brightest faculty," Fenwick said.

He said other institutions can lure faculty away with better salary and benefit packages.

"Mostly, (other schools) make them an offer they can't refuse," he said.

Frank White, co-chair of the subcommittee that writes the annual report, said offers from other higher-paying institutions definitely cause faculty turnover.

He said it was not that the faculty weren't wanted at K-State, but K-State didn't have the ability to match the better offer.

Another consequence is what Fenwick described as the "farm-club" institution.

Young faculty come to K-State to get their start and establish a reputation, then leave for better offers, Fenwick said. He said senior faculty who decide to stay have made a personal decision to remain in Manhattan instead of looking for better offers.

"When faculty can get hired away and make one and one-half, sometime two times their salary here, it's hard to keep them here and they're the ones you want to keep," Fenwick said.

According to the report, similar problems exist in recruiting faculty because of low pay. Many established professors can go elsewhere and make more money as senior faculty instead of coming to K-State.

The 1995 report also addresses "salary compression," which creates internal problems for departments. New faculty salaries are close to those of senior faculty, creating tension between new and old faculty.

Fenwick said the pay differences can embarrass some faculty members who see their peers making more, while K-State pays at a level comparable to schools with fewer resources.

Regents approve $140 increase in residence-hall fees

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Students living in residence halls will see an increase in their housing and dining fees next fall.

The Kansas Board of Regents approved in December a housing and dining increase for regents universities. It will raise K-State's housing fee $140 to $3,780, a 3.8-percent increase.

"The increase for the universities was necessary to offset expected increases in operating expenses," said Barb Conant, director of communications for the regents.

Assistant Housing and Dining Services Director Bob Burgess said K-State's increase will be divided into two parts; 1.5 percent of the increase happens annually and goes into a Facility 2000 Fund established to enhance the residence halls' infrastructure. The rest will go to general operation funds to offset increases in food expenditures and utility costs.

Burgess said his department works closely with students from the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls before rate increases are proposed.

"Student feedback is very important to us when we review housing rates," he said.

KSUARH President Trent Schaaf said increases happen every year and students are used to them by now.

"I think they see the benefits of the increases," he said. "The buildings are getting old and the money that goes to Facility 2000 keeps them in working condition and helps with remodeling."

Rate increases are common every year, Burgess said, and it has been eight or nine years since there hasn't been an increase.

The increase shouldn't affect student population in the residence halls, he said.

"I think the increase will cause students to reevaluate their situation and their personal budgets, but we are confident that we will retain the same amount of students next year," Burgess said.

Scientists announce genetically altered cattle might produce medicine in milk for humans

BOSTON — On a ranch in Texas, a herd of cows is about to give birth to what might be the future of the pharmaceutical industry.

Scientists said Tuesday they have developed a technique for cloning genetically customized calves that will be able to produce medicines for humans in their milk.

"The applications for this in pharmaceutical production are enormous," said Dr. Steven Stice of Advanced Cell Technology Inc., one of the collaborators in the project.

Although the first clones are males, the real payoff will come with females.

Stice and the other principal researcher, James Robl of the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, said they will next try to use their technique to have cows make human serum albumin.

Albumin, a blood protein that regulates the transfer of fluids in the body, is critical to people suffering from liver disease, malnourishment, extreme burns and other conditions.

NASA starts countdown to send space shuttle on another trip to Russian space station MIR

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — The countdown has begun for another space shuttle trip to the Russian space station Mir.

NASA began the countdown Monday for the space shuttle Endeavour, which is scheduled to blast off Thursday night with astronaut Andrew Thomas.

This morning, forecasters said there was a 60-percent chance that clouds, rain or thunderstorms would scuttle the launch attempt. The outlook is no better for Friday.

Thomas, an Australian-born engineer, will replace David Wolf, who has been on Mir since September. Thomas will be the seventh and final U.S. astronaut to live on Mir.

"How do you like my space-station haircut? You think it's going to last four months? Probably not," Thomas told reporters, patting his closely cropped blond hair.

Thomas expects his 4 1/2-month Mir stay to be uncomfortable at times given the deteriorating state of the thermal system and other station equipment. "But I don't feel that the safety is an issue for me flying on this vehicle," he said.

Endeavour will carry up a new air conditioner and computer for the 12-year-old space station, as well as food, water and other supplies.

Excess dust in construction area sets off alarm, causes early stoppage of classes in Kedzie Hall

A fire alarm went off at about 10 a.m. Tuesday in Kedzie Hall.

K-State Police reported the alarm was caused by cement dust in the basement. Construction is being done to install an elevator to make the building handicap-accessible.

Sunflower Builders, the contractors hired to work on the building, has been removing debris from the basement and is in the process of filling the elevator pit, producing dust which set off the alarm.

"The contractor will try to contain that by sealing off the area. The alarm will be disengaged during that time," Lt. Richard Herrman of campus police said. He said they would try to vent the area with a fan to prevent the problem from occurring again.

Jerry Carter, director of Facilities Planning, said construction was not the cause of the alarm going off. He said it was caused by a ballast in a light fixture that had started to smoke, and this is not the first time this has happened.

Carter said concrete dust setting off an alarm is unusual but not unheard of.

Construction has previously set off alarms on campus. During the remodeling of Hale Library, some dust and wiring problems caused fire alarms to go off on more than one occasion.

An official reason for the alarm sounding was not given. Larry Lamb, assistant director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said he did not know why it went off. He said he didn't know if it was a drill or the real thing.

The alarm disrupted classes and work. Janice Hume, assistant professor in the journalism school, said she heard the alarm while working at her desk. She went downstairs and didn't see any flames, so she returned to her office. Students were milling around outside, waiting to return to the building.

The delay of everyday business was an inconvenience, Carter said.

"People don't like having to deal with false alarms," Carter said.

CORRECTIONSCLARIFICATIONS

Due to incorrect information supplied by a source, the Collegian printed incorrect information Friday on a story titled "Manhattan resident preaches, practices diversity at Douglass Community Center." Don Slater never taught and does not run the Douglass Center. He is assistant director of the "Hand to Hand" program at the Douglass Center Annex.

A portion of a story in Tuesday's Collegian about Monday's Privilege Fee Committee meeting was misleading.

According to the story, committee members voted to cut allocations to Sports Club Council by $9,000 per year and to reallocate $9,000 per year from athletic department funds to increase the K-State Marching Band's budget.

However, the committee had proposed reallocating $18,000 from the athletic department to the band budget.

The committee also reallocated $9,000 per year from sports clubs to the athletic department, leaving athletics with a $9,000 net loss to provide for the band increase.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

Awards given for distinguished service to minority education

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

David Griffin
ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF SECONDARY EDUCATION

Two K-Staters will receive awards for their minority service work.

David Griffin, assistant professor of secondary education, and Colette McLemore, senior in social sciences, will both receive the Commerce Bank Presidential Award for Distinguished Service to Minority Education at a reception this afternoon.

STORY BY LORY STONE

Griffin said he didn't have any formula for receiving the award.

"For me, I don't think there is a script for winning the award. I was shocked," Griffin said.

But his qualifications proved him worthy. Griffin has been involved in numerous activities to promote minorities in campus activities, including the Union Governing Board and the Union Corporate Board, and he acts as the co-adviser of the Student Government Organization of the College of Education.

"Everything I do is centered around the betterment of students," Griffin said.

It was through this involvement that Griffin met McLemore. In 1995, Griffin and McLemore were paired in an adopt-a-student program sponsored by the Black Student Union.

McLemore said she thought it was great that Griffin was the other recipient of the award. Griffin agreed, saying it was interesting considering their history.

McLemore, who is president of BSU, said it was a pretty cool award. She said she was proud to win because it is only the second year there has been a student award given in addition to the standard award given to faculty or students.

Ted Haggart, president of Commerce Bank, explained the significance of the award.

"Commerce Bank began funding various teaching awards three years ago. Very simply, we want to encourage outstanding leadership," he said.

Haggart said Commerce Bank also wanted to promote campus and community service, thus the student award was introduced.

"All we hope is to benefit students and teachers who do excel in these areas," Haggart said.

The awards give recognition as well as a cash award to their winners.

McLemore said she was one of five students nominated for the award. In addition to being nominated, students wrote an essay. McLemore wrote about her activities as a leader in the black community.

"I see myself as a spokesperson for black people," McLemore said. "I'm the connection for the entire executive board, and I work to keep things moving in the right direction."

But McLemore was hesitant about taking all of the credit. She emphasized the importance of people like Griffin.

Griffin was also somewhat modest. For him, service to his fellow black people comes naturally.

"I just do what I do," Griffin said. "I was recognized because people deem what I do as going the extra mile. But I didn't try to do anything to gain recognition."

He compared the accomplishment to the birth of his only child, the "absolute highlight" of his life.

"The award stands tall among the very special memories of my life," he said.

The only regret he said he has about the award is that his mother was not here to witness his achievement. She died a year ago this month.

"She isn't here to see that her work wasn't in vain," Griffin said. He credits his mother with setting his values and morals on track.

Both Griffin and McLemore remember Martin Luther King Jr., seeing him as an influence and the inspiration for winning this award.

"What Martin Luther King Jr. did is why I'm here at K-State today," McLemore said. "If there was no Martin Luther King Jr., I might not be here."

King stood for equality and righteousness for everyone, not just black people, Griffin explained. Griffin said he strives to be this kind of person, a humanitarian who works for the betterment of all humanity.

Although both agree that King did a lot to advance the position of black people in society, McLemore concluded, "We are not there yet, but we are getting better."

Individuals shine during King memorial week

Even as Martin Luther King Jr. stirred individuals to action, two individuals at K-State are being honored for their contributions toward keeping the meaning of King's words alive.

The inspiration King kindled has promoted a generation of new leaders to carry their torches of greater equality and integration.

His emphasis on character and leadership is embodied in the leaders honored during the 3:30 p.m. reception today in the Cottonwood Room.

The reception will honor two recipients of the Commerce Bank Presidential Award for Distinguished Service to Minority Education.

Not only have the recipients supported and promoted minority issues on campus, but they have become a force of leadership to bring about change.

Martin Luther King Jr. was one man and further change will happen when individuals become leaders in their communities.

Commerce Bank should be applauded for its support and recognition of both individuals and their leadership at K-State.

Colette McLemore, senior in social sciences, is a student leader who was one of the recipients of the award. As president of Black Student Union, she said King's influence is present in her life.

The other recipient, David Griffin, is an assistant professor in secondary education. His promotion of minority issues is evident in the numerous roles he has on campus.

He is involved in the Union Governing Board and the Union Corporate Board, and he serves as co-adviser of the Student Government Organization of the College of Education.

Talk can be cheap, but the actions of a few individuals such as those honored will continue to speed the improvement of race relations.

In a national holiday with many facets, these are two faces that stand out from the crowd.

The contributions of individuals are acts of honoring the inspiration of King's words and carry the torch forward.

CULTURAL DISNEYLAND
Getty surprises even the most jaded art patron

Winter in Los Angeles means rain.

When visiting the new Getty Center earlier this month, rain was about to prove my visit a disaster. And then we arrived to find basket upon basket of complimentary black umbrellas thoughtfully awaiting us outside of nearly every door. Why let something like rain bother you when the folks behind the $1 billion Getty have considered your every need?

Is this modern paradise of a museum real or just a cultural fanatic's dream — a lost film screenplay miraculously sprung to life in the City of Angels?

Having only seen the Getty Center before from the constantly choked state of the San Diego Freeway some hundreds of feet below, who knew the sprawling arts complex could be so full of surprises?

The Getty publicly opened on Dec. 16, but a visit just one week ago revealed a success story, for both art as well as architecture, landscaping and Los Angeles. Swarming with visitors — from Europeans to Asians to Americans to the rarefied Hollywood celebrity — the Getty is a cultural Disneyland complete with a five-minute tram ride to the top of the Brentwood hill it sits on.

Sliding out of the tram onto a massive marble terrace, the Getty appears before you as a modern San Simeon, a pleasure garden for the senses and the intellect. Its collection of six buildings: an auditorium, a restaurant, administration, a conservation institute, a research institute and the museum.

You walk forward to a triumphant stair that leads one past the elegant restaurant building on your right and the conservation institute on your left to arrive at the entrance to the Getty Museum.

What you notice from the start is the graceful way architect Richard Meier's creamy travertine and metal panel walls, endless amounts of glass and geometric rails and sunshades peel back, layer after layer, to reveal yet another grand view of the city, the ocean or the green hills dotted with mansions. On my visit, a view to Long Beach (at least 25 miles south) was amazingly clear, especially in this traditionally smoggy city.

There is a complex geometry at work in the site plan of the Getty, with buildings running off of two axes corresponding to the freeway below. This is hard to figure when not staring at a site plan, but a subtle cohesion is nonetheless felt.

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Russell is a fifth-year senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu

Entering the museum, Meier has designed an orienting circular rotunda that collects visitors and sends them off to a series of five pavilion galleries. The inner courtyard connects to the rotunda easily, since a large glass wall panel slides open to connect inside to outside.

The curators have arranged the Getty's art collection — ranging from medieval illuminated manuscripts to 19th century Impressionist paintings — chronologically in the pavilions with sculpture, drawings and decorative arts on the plaza level and painting on the second floor. Several special exhibitions, particularly a solid photography gallery featuring a newly acquired David Hockney photocollage "Pearblossom Highway," are interspersed throughout.

Although the Getty is hardly an encyclopedic museum in the manner of New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art, it doesn't pretend to be, either. Instead, the five pavilions are almost small museums unto themselves with distinct courtyards and terraces, art information rooms with interactive computers for learning more about what you are seeing and quiet reading areas comfortably furnished for those in search of a respite. The pavilions contain a thoughtful collection, one strong in 17th century Dutch art such as Jan Steen's "The Drawing Lesson," another in drawings from old masters like Raphael, Michelangelo and Leonardo Da Vinci.

The galleries themselves are nearly all naturally lit, meaning colors appear fresh and true. Much has been made by critics about the use of fabrics by gallery designer Thierry Despont to cover walls, especially since Meier is a stark modernist who would have rather had all white. Needless to say, what color the fabric does interject remains subservient to the art.

Outside, the landscape is both challenging and engaging. A cactus garden on the south promontory of the museum, jutting out toward the skyscrapers of Century City beyond, conveys a simple metaphor of L.A. — the tall column cacti rising above a sprawl of golden barrel cacti and iceplant.

In artist Robert Irwin's zany central garden, azalea appears to float in a maze of water while a zig-zagging path dotted with grasses leads back to a larger terrace. It will take some time for the garden to grow into its intended form. Meier and Irwin were at odds about the design of this garden, but the bowl-shape of Irwin's plan will surely become one of the best-loved spaces at the Getty.

As Getty director John Walsh said once, visitors to the Getty will not want to leave.

As my family sat enjoying a drink at the outdoor museum cafe, with massive travertine columns soaring 50 feet above us to support a pavilion and the city sprawling out to Palos Verdes, Catalina Island and the Pacific Ocean beyond, a perfect contentment seemed to settle over everything.

And then I looked beyond to see a rainbow forming in the mist, as if arcing from a Getty terrace down to a green canyon below. There is more at work than money at this special place.

Though overlooked, biology affects everyday aspects of life

We all know about the three R's: reading, writing and arithmetic. But what is missing from this educational overview, aside from the obvious (spelling), is biology. As soon as sperm met egg, biology began to affect your life.

Yet society tends to overlook the subject as much as the three R's do. Any person who has been through high school has at least been exposed to the basics of biology, yet we fail to consider many of the issues they apply to.

When any issue involving living organisms is being debated, it only makes sense to take into consideration the biology behind the particular subject.

For instance, the ever-debatable subject of eating meat vs. a vegetarian diet. Moral beliefs aside, all you have to do is compare the digestive systems of herbivores to that of humans, and the debate is basically over.

Herbivores in general have one of two basic systems. They either have a compartmentalized stomach, as in ruminant animals, or an enlarged cecum, as in hindgut-fermenting animals. In both systems there is a symbiosis between the animal and the massive population of bacteria living in its cecum, or rumen. This symbiosis exists because mammals lack the ability to produce the enzymes needed to break up the linkages in plant fibers. The animal provides the proper environment and the bacteria crank out proteins the animal can use.

Humans have neither an enlarged cecum, nor a rumen, and in comparison with herbivores, have a minimal bacterial population in our digestive tracts. Our systems are set up to process primarily carbohydrates and proteins with very little digestion of fiber. As vegetarians know, fiber will crash through your intestines like a runaway train.

If you are religious, you could easily argue that if God had intended for us to eat only vegetable matter he would have equipped us to handle such a diet. The more scientifically minded individual understands we do not arrive at our current status in evolution by eating grass.

There's another theory that we evolved to our current form in part because of our need for meat. In order to obtain meat, early humans had to use their brains to create tools and weapons for hunting. They would also have needed to learn about the animals they were hunting in order to make their hunt successful.

This is not to slight vegetarians. They have every right to choose their own diet. However, the fact remains that we are designed to be omnivores. We don't have a bony palate for grinding grasses and grains. We have varied teeth for our varied diet.

This lack of attention to biology also extends into how we handle our children. I recently heard a story on the news about the debate about breast-feeding. I hope this doesn't come as news to anyone, but breasts exist to feed babies.

I realize feeding babies is the furthest thing from the minds of many of us males, but shockingly enough, breasts aren't just ornamental. They actually produce the perfect food for growing babies, providing precisely the right nutrients and immune complexes. There are things in breast milk even Gerber can't duplicate.

Part of the debate does come from the problems created by our society's demands on the working mother, and I can see how breast-feeding could be inconvenient. But I'm afraid you'll have to excuse babies, they had no intention of getting in the way of a busy schedule, and only understand that it's time to eat. Humans have invented hectic schedules and the working mother, but luckily we also came up with the breast pump.

A little further along in the biological development of the child, we come to another obstacle: learning to speak. Psychologists learned long ago that children have a window in their brain development in which they can suck up information about speech like a crack-powered shop-vac.

Yet we fail to take full advantage of this window of opportunity. This period would seem to be the obvious time to introduce foreign languages to children. Instead, most of us weren't given the chance to take a foreign language until we reached high school, a good 10 years after our brains were geared toward learning languages. Obviously after the window closes on the period of peak language acquisition, it is simply far more difficult.

There is a little progress being made in this particular area, as some schools are starting to introduce foreign languages at earlier grade levels. Is there any reason all schools should not adopt a similar approach? Not a good one.

For the most part, tradition is the only thing holding the idea back. Traditionally, students aren't thought to be mature enough to tackle foreign languages until they reach high school, when exactly the opposite is true.

Another argument is that students should learn more about the grammar and sentence structure of English, to help them understand the same concepts in other languages. However, the human brain does not develop in accordance with this course scheduling. So which is easier to change, the curriculum of a school or the development of a child's brain?

There are thousands of issues out there in which the answer to the question is being overlooked. Not because the answer is hard to find, but because no one seems to be looking in the right place. Mother Nature is a very efficient woman. She does everything for a reason.

Fortmeyer review of 'Brazil' misses the mark

Editor,

Your paper's review of "Brazil" was incredible. I've seen "Blade Runner" and "Brazil" isn't even remotely close to it. The movie isn't for people who have never done anything or never been anywhere as I suppose is the case with Russell Fortmeyer. "Brazil" does cover some ground in the information age and issues concerning things that happen in other parts of the world. I wonder how many people don't go to the movie because it was panned by a reviewer who just didn't get it? Maybe you should choose someone who's a little more on the ball. Good luck.

Unoriginal Sunflower-state slams plague pilgrimage to Fiesta Bowl

Over the winter break this year, things went as usual. I spent quality time with my chums from back home, buddied up with the family, and for the second year, made a pilgrimage to see the Cats play in a bowl game. Although the first two weren't out of the ordinary, the third is a time I'll never forget.

It's because of all the partying and fun — I know that's what everyone's thinking. But this trip will stay lodged in my mind for a different reason, because it helped me realize humans are a strange species. Sure, that sounds anticlimactic and should already be a given, but the people I encountered during that pilgrimage reinforced the notion.

I'm not trying to put the entire human race on trial. I'm singling out the minority who are either so insecure or stupid they cannot interact with people without making fun of them. These are the type of people who go out of their way to make others feel like asses. Like when you're at a stop light in your 1972, three-tone green, Ford Ranchero and the guy next to you with the muscled-out Camaro rolls his windows down just in time to shout, "Nice car!" before he peels away. These are the brand of imbeciles I want to talk about.

Sticks and stones will break my bones, yeah I know the whole spiel. But even though such insults don't fade me, they make me wonder what these people are all about.

Like the punks who drove by my friends and me outside Sun Devil Stadium and shouted, "Kansas sucks!" This was after the game, but they weren't pronounced Syracuse fans. Just some dudes out on the town in Tempe, Ariz. After they sped away in their all-black, pimped-out, Honda CRX hatchback, a thought hit me. How did they expect us to reply? Maybe something along the lines of, "Hey thanks, buddy! We didn't realize we sucked so bad — we'll try harder!"

Was this incident just an example of guys with nothing better to do than drive around and randomly shout defamatory remarks about the nifty 50? Or did they know we were from Kansas and thought the remarks would hurt our feelings? No. 2 sounds good to me, but they need better material. A slam on Kansas is just about as guaranteed to get a rise out of me as a slam on Idaho would. Put-downs don't hurt unless they're personalized. So basically the dudes failed. We had a good laugh at them.

We encountered another guy in a gas station in Colorado Springs, Colo. My friends and I were minding our own business and buying road munchies, when some raggedy-looking fellow pushed inside and stopped in front of us. "Well, I guess Jesus Christ has risen," he said sarcastically while looking us up and down. He went on to mutter a few more things under his breath and then walked on, smiling like he just heard a good joke.

Hmmm, let's think about this. Did he honestly mistake one of us for the holy one? Maybe. None of us had the facial hair to be Jesus and we weren't wearing robes or sandals. And I don't remember anyone walking on water or turning one small bag of Chee-tos into hundreds of bags. So, either he was extremely mistaken or was trying to make fun of us. I'll opt for the second choice. However, it's his whole reasoning behind the remark that escapes me. Did he see the hemp necklaces and ratty jeans and automatically think, "Jesus." If so, the guy has problems.

So here we have a completely unsubstantiated claim that neither hurt nor humiliated us. I guess he struck out, too. Oh well, maybe biblical references aren't his forté in the art of mockery. Maybe he was just a nut-ball.

The last example comes from five or six teen-age kids who were walking out of the big New Year's Eve bash in downtown Tempe. These kids should get the trophy for the "most unoriginal wise-crack known to humanity." I'm sure virtually all Kansans have heard this one. Yep, they pulled out the Wizard of Oz. From about five yards behind us the familiar sounds of "Hey guys, where's Dorothy?" and "Don't forget to feed Toto," sifted into our eardrums.

When those words are muttered it pains me deeply. Not because they're harmful words but because I feel woefully sorry for the fool who thinks they would actually bother someone. I mean come on, it's just a movie. And a good one at that. Another example of a stupid put-down. People should put more thought into their slams instead of going with the old stand-by. Those kids could have thrown out remarks like, "Hey, make sure you don't fall in the deepest hand-dug well, buddy," or "Gee, sure hope the world's largest ball of twine doesn't crush me." Now those are original. They're still a bit weak, but I'd at least give them credit for thinking.

When it comes down to it, something that's intended to harm or humiliate someone would be better off not spoken at all. That's just plain lack of character. If you're not comfortable enough with yourself that you have to resort to shelling someone else, go home and chill by your lonesome for the next 20 years. But if you're gonna spray it, and I know many of you will, you'd better make sure you don't spaz out and bomb like the geniuses above. Or you, my friend, will become the joke.

Kaczynski trial stalls after lawyers dispute defense

▶ UNABOMBER SUSPECT ARGUES HIS STRATEGIES WITH LAWYERS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Both sides in the Unabomber trial agreed that Theodore Kaczynski is competent to stand trial — the basic requirement for acting as his own lawyer — but the judge suggested that his request to represent himself came too late.

U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. said Kaczynski had clearly agreed to proceed with his lawyers after a series of meetings with the judge in December. Later, Kaczynski changed his mind.

Burrell suggested that if Kaczynski wanted to be his own lawyer, he should have made the motion when the trial began.

"We're not in a pretrial hearing," the judge said. "We're in trial. This case commenced on Nov. 12, 1997."

The continuing dispute between Kaczynski and his lawyers centers on their desire to mount a defense based on his mental state. Kaczynski is adamantly opposed and wants to base his defense on his anti-technology views.

Government prosecutor Robert Cleary suggested that changes could be made up until the time a jury is seated, but he conceded that case law on the subject isn't clear. Cleary noted that the jury, chosen Dec. 22, has not yet been sworn.

Burrell rejected a government bid to see more of the transcripts of his private meetings with the defendant, who could get the death penalty if convicted.

"Statements by Mr. Kaczynski could be used by the government in its attempt to kill him," the judge said. "That's a deadly serious matter.

"I can understand why the defense doesn't want to release more of what Kaczynski said. They would be helping the government in its quest to obtain its objective."

Defense lawyers agreed to stipulate that Kaczynski is competent to stand trial after reviewing a 47-page report by Sally Johnson, a federal prison psychiatrist who interviewed him for 19 hours last week.

Her report was kept sealed for the time being.

Burrell, whose comments were as forceful as any he has made since the case began, said he was intent on going ahead with opening statements Thursday morning. He said he would resolve the representation issue that morning and have the jury report for duty at 10 a.m.

Burrell said he had contacted San Francisco lawyer Tony Serra — who had offered Kaczynski his services — but Serra's office said the earliest he would be available was September.

"Tentatively, I'm not inclined to bring in new lawyers," Burrell said.

Kaczynski's public defenders, Quin Denvir and Judy Clarke, have made it clear they don't plan to completely abandon a mental defense, despite Kaczynski's objections to being portrayed as — in his words — a sickie.

The judge said his only concern is an ambiguity in the record of his meetings with Kaczynski and the defense lawyers. Kaczynski may have believed that when the defense agreed not to use mental health experts in the guilt phase of the trial, they would not raise the mental issue at all, Burrell said.

"I am still analyzing the record in regard to this matter," he said.

Kaczynski apparently balked when he found out Clarke intended to show jurors pictures of Kaczynski as the Harvard-educated math professor and later as the hairy, wild-eyed Montana hermit arrested in April 1996.

The defense also plans to use lay witnesses, possibly including Kaczynski's brother, to show a pattern of mental illness in the defendant's childhood.

Kaczynski's mother, Wanda, and brother, David, sat in a front row of the packed courtroom for Tuesday's hearing. David, who first alerted the government that his brother might be the elusive Unabomber, has protested the government's decision to seek the death penalty.

Kaczynski is charged in a 10-count indictment with attacks that maimed two scientists and killed two Sacramento men. Prosecutors also hope to link him to all attacks attributed to the anti-technology Unabomber that killed three people and injured 29 over 18 years.

Clarke and Denvir also filed court papers Tuesday seeking any information the government might have related to secret shacks that Kaczynski might have built in the Montana wilderness.

Kaczynski's journals refer to such hideouts, saying he needed them because "there's no place to escape civilization" and he hoped to have "one place at least where I can still feel sure of privacy."

Engineers promote math, science at grade schools

▶SOCIETY OF WOMEN ENGINEERS OFFERS EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS.

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Society of Women Engineers will continue projects from last year and make new ideas a reality this semester.

SWE is open to any man or woman whose field of study is engineering or a related science. Their main objective is to inform young women, parents, counselors and the general public of the qualifications and achievements of female engineers, and of the opportunities open to them, said Kellie Arnold, sophomore in mechanical engineering and SWE president, in an e-mail interview.

SWE encourages members to achieve their full potential as engineers and leaders.

It works toward these goals through different projects on campus and in Manhattan.

SWE members plan to visit local elementary schools and talk about math and science with the classes.

"We're organizing grade school visits to promote engineering, but specifically women in engineering. We want to start with little girls so they will know that math and science fields are open to them," said Sara Overstake, sophomore in biological and agricultural engineering. Overstake is a co-chair of the grade school visits program.

Members plan to point out the effect engineers have on the children's everyday life.

"We ask them to look around the room and tell us what things an engineer might have designed. We point out things like lighting and structures," Overstake said.

The group also invites Girl Scouts to campus to learn about engineering. Girls are interested in math and science come from all around Kansas. The event is scheduled for March 14, said Kusum Patro, junior in industrial engineering and chair of the event.

"Last year we had a speaker during one session and had them do projects like building bridges out of popsicle sticks. We really try to have them do things that are hands-on. They also earn a badge for coming," Patro said.

There will be a meeting about the event at 8 tonight in Durland 151 for anyone interested.

Meetings are monthly and the first regular meeting will be at 7 p.m. Feb. 3 in Durland 152.

Events and meetings are not the only way to get involved in SWE. Two leadership positions are open and will be elected at the first meeting. They are community service chair and engineering student council representative.

Activities for all SWE members will include a regional conference, a plant visit and a bone-marrow drive. A reception at the end of the semester is one of the new events SWE is planning.

SWE is beneficial to all its members, engineering majors or not.

"It provides a support group for those involved. It encourages participation in a professional activity. It provides information both academically and professionally," Arnold said. "Finally, it provides means for people with similar interests to get together socially and make new friends."

McCain presents: italian opera

Order your tickets today.

Cavalleria rusticana/I pagliacci
Friday, January 23, 8 p.m.
Public: $32, $28, $24
Seniors: $30, $26, $22
Students: $16, $14, $12

Cavalleria rusticana, or "rustic chivalry," features music by Pietro Mascagni and is based on a play by Giovanni Verga. Set in Sicily on Easter Sunday, it is the tale of a peasant girl who fears that the man she loves is having an affair with a married woman. Holiday joy turns to bitter sorrow when the woman's husband challenges the girl's boyfriend to a duel.

Continuing the theme of passion and adultery, Ruggiero Leoncavallo's I pagliacci, "the strolling players," is an opera-within-an-opera. The tale told by a commedia dell'arte troupe takes on a life of its own, bringing tragedy to the actors.

These are operas in the grand tradition -- sung in Italian and performed with full orchestra. With English-language supertitles you won't miss a word.

Call McCain at 785-532-6428
You can charge your tickets to VISA, MasterCard, or Discover. Or stop by the box office, noon to 6 p.m. weekdays.

Additional funding provided by the K-State Fine Arts Fee.

Major funding provided by the Friends of McCain.

Presented in part by the Kansas Arts Commission, a state agency, and the National Endowment for the Arts, a federal agency.

Mercy Health Center offers a variety of classes to those wanting to improve their health and fitness. All classes are taught by educated, caring instructors who can help you safely meet your fitness goals.

Gentle Exercise
This class offers slow gentle stretching and range of motion exercises to help participants stay active and independent. Exercises are done while sitting in a chair, and are ideal for people with balance problems, or for those who have difficulty walking. MWF - 11:00am

Chi Gong
An ancient Chinese health practice that consists of combining soft, gentle movements with slow, deep breathing. This is a class for all ages, and is a great stress reliever. The simple movements are an effective method of preventive as well as restorative healthcare. Tu 9:30am

Aerobics & Step Aerobics
This class incorporates a combination of low-impact aerobics and step aerobics. Learn the basics of aerobics, as our instructors teach modifications for beginners, as well as advanced exercisers. You are guaranteed to have FUN while you exercise in a non-intimidating and safe atmosphere. MW - 5:00pm; Tu - 5:30pm; TuTh - 4:00pm & F - 4:30pm

Resistance Training
Strengthen and tone your muscles using weights, bands and rubber tubing. Most exercises are done seated in a chair. Learn to use correct form and exercise safely while you make your muscles stronger and more flexible. TuTh - 11:00am; MW - 2:00pm

Sit & Be Fit
Cardiovascular aerobic movements all done in a seated position. Lessen the impact on your joints as you condition your cardiovascular system. Resistance training and stretching conclude this energetic class. MWF - 10:00am

Moms in Motion
This class is for pregnant and postpartum women and consists of low-impact aerobics, resistance training and stretching - all geared toward the pregnant woman's changing body. A physician's referral is required.
MW - 6:00pm

Body Sculpting
Tone and strengthen your muscles using weights, bands, tubing and balls. This class is an excellent addition to Aerobics & Step.
30 minutes, TuTh - 5:00pm

Seniorcise
Low-impact aerobics performed to music will condition your heart, followed by resistance training to strengthen your muscles. The class concludes with all-body stretching.
MWF - 9:00am

Yoga
Yoga is a great exercise to strengthen your muscles, improve your flexibility and relieve stress. Learn yoga postures, as well as meditation, deep breathing and relaxation.
M - 3:00pm; Th - 9:30am & 5:30pm

Additional Information
Body Sculpting class runs 30 minutes. All other classes run 60 minutes each session. The cost is $20 per month for unlimited class participation. To register or for more information, call or stop by the Mercy Health Center Wellness Department at 1823 College Ave., (785) 776-2837.

Round-up is a daily dose of the latest scores, stats and news from the sports world outside K-State. Compiled from Associated Press reports.

NCAA top-25 men's hoops

No. 1 Duke 101, North Carolina A&T 66

GREENSBORO, N.C. — William Avery scored 11 points during a 2 1/2-minute span in the first half as Duke rolled over North Carolina A&T 101-66 Tuesday night in the Blue Devils' first game since regaining the No. 1 ranking.

Trajan Langdon also added 11 of his 16 points in Duke's 57-point opening half for the Blue Devils (17-1). The Aggies, led by Jonathan Richmond's 15 points, fell to 4-10 and 0-11 all-time against schools from the Atlantic Coast Conference.

Duke, which was No. 1 for the first two weeks of December before losing to Michigan, made 20 of 33 shots (60.6 percent) in the opening 20 minutes to grab a 27-point halftime lead.

The ACC is now 36-0 against teams from the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference during the past five seasons.

No. 16 Michigan 65, Minnesota 57

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — Robert Traylor had 21 points and 12 rebounds as Michigan temporarily took sole possession of first place in the Big Ten.

Maceo Baston added 15 points and 14 rebounds and Louis Bullock 10 points for the Wolverines (15-4 overall, 5-1 Big Ten). Michigan began the night in a three-way tie for first with Michigan State and Iowa, who play Wednesday night in Iowa City.

Sam Jacobson scored 21 points and Kyle Sanden added 11 for Minnesota (7-10, 0-6). The defending Big Ten champion Gophers have lost six straight conference games for the first time since a seven-game losing streak in 1991.

No. 21 Cincinnati 60, Tulane 50

NEW ORLEANS — D'Juan Baker scored eight straight points down the stretch as No. 21 Cincinnati held off a late Tulane rally.

The Bearcats (14-2, 6-0) won their 10th straight game. The Green Wave (6-11, 1-4) have lost five of six.

Cincinnati's 23-point lead shrunk to four before the Bearcats put it away at the foul line.

Baker scored all of the Bearcats' points during a 25-8 Green Wave run that got Tulane within four points with a minute left. Two free throws each by Bobby Brannen and Baker and a dunk by Ruben Patterson in the final minute sealed the victory.

Baker led Cincinnati with 20 points. Patterson, playing just his second game after serving a 14-game suspension for NCAA rules violations, scored 19.

Byron Mouton led Tulane with 13 points.

No. 23 West Virginia 80, Rutgers 72

PISCATAWAY, N.J. — Jarrod West scored 19 points as the Mountaineers made a season-high 11 3-pointers.

West Virginia (16-3, 6-3) entered making 33 percent of its 3-pointers but hurt Rutgers with 61 percent shooting from behind the arc. After winning six of seven, the Knights (7-9, 1-7) have lost five of their last six.

Damian Owens added 18 points for West Virginia.

Rob Hodgson led the Scarlet Knights with 17 points.

No. 25 Clemson 69, Virginia 52

CLEMSON, S.C. — Tony Christie had a career-high 17 points as Clemson held off Virginia's second-half rally.

Christie's four 3-pointers helped the Tigers (12-6, 3-3 Atlantic Coast Conference) take a 40-22 lead with 17:38 to go. But Clemson managed only two field goals in the next 10 minutes as the Cavaliers (10-9, 2-4) pulled within eight points.

Greg Buckner then scored four points and Christie another three in an 14-6 run for the Tigers. Buckner finished with 19 points.

Clemson's victory could prove costly as point guard Terrell McIntyre crashed into the team's bench with 1:38 remaining and reinjured his right foot. McIntyre missed three December games with his foot injury and had been slowly regaining form.

NBA

Mavericks 107, Sonics 98

DALLAS — Erick Strickland had a career-high 30 points and Michael Finley scored 29 as the Dallas Mavericks ended a five-game losing streak with a stunning 107-98 victory over the Seattle SuperSonics on Tuesday night.

Dallas has beaten Seattle in both of their meetings this season, giving the Mavericks two of their seven victories. The Mavericks had lost 20 of 21 before Tuesday's game.

Detlef Schrempf scored 21 points, Gary Payton had 20 and Vin Baker 19 for the Sonics, whose three-game winning streak ended.

Trail Blazers 86, Cavaliers 84

CLEVELAND — Kenny Anderson hit a 20-foot jumper at the buzzer to give Portland the victory.

Anderson, outplayed by rookie Brevin Knight until the final inbounds play, dribbled free and ended a thrilling game with a tough shot from the top of the key that swished through as the horn sounded.

The shot ruined Shawn Kemp's best game since joining the Cavaliers. He had season-highs with 31 points and 20 rebounds while leading Cleveland back from deficits of 18 in the first half and 14 early in the fourth.

Hawks 103, Bucks 93

ATLANTA — Reserve Alan Henderson scored 18 points and Mookie Blaylock had 15 points, eight assists and five steals in his return from the injured list as Atlanta defeated Milwaukee.

The Hawks came back from a 15-point, first-half deficit and won despite an off night by leading scorer Steve Smith, who was plagued by foul trouble and shot only one-for-10 from the field.

Atlanta had seven players in double figures. Dikembe Mutombo scored 16, Christian Laettner 15, Chucky Brown 12 and Eric Recasner and Smith 11 each.

NCAA accuses KU player of accepting money

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW ORLEANS — College basketball standout Lester Earl was accused by the NCAA on Tuesday of accepting $6,600 in cash from an LSU assistant coach before transferring to Kansas last year.

The NCAA also said coaches who are no longer at LSU improperly helped some of Earl's relatives find jobs.

LSU must now answer the NCAA's accusations by April 16; school Chancellor William Jenkins said a committee is looking into them.

The investigation will have no bearing on Earl's eligibility to play for the third-ranked Jayhawks this season and would affect his future only if it were proven that he took the money while a student at the Baton Rouge-based school. He has one year left at Kansas, and the university has appealed to get him a second year.

EARL

LSU could face severe NCAA sanctions, including the loss of scholarships and postseason eligibility, depending on the outcome of the investigation. Penalties are often reduced if the NCAA feels a school has cooperated.

Earl's brother, Louis, a current LSU basketball player, was also cited in the NCAA's letter of inquiry, accused of improperly receiving medical attention from LSU before enrolling. His status will not be affected by the investigation, said LSU sports information director Herb Vincent.

The violations are said to have occurred between 1993 and 1996 while Dale Brown was the LSU head coach and, in some cases, while Lester Earl was still in high school in Baton Rouge. LSU said no current staff members are involved.

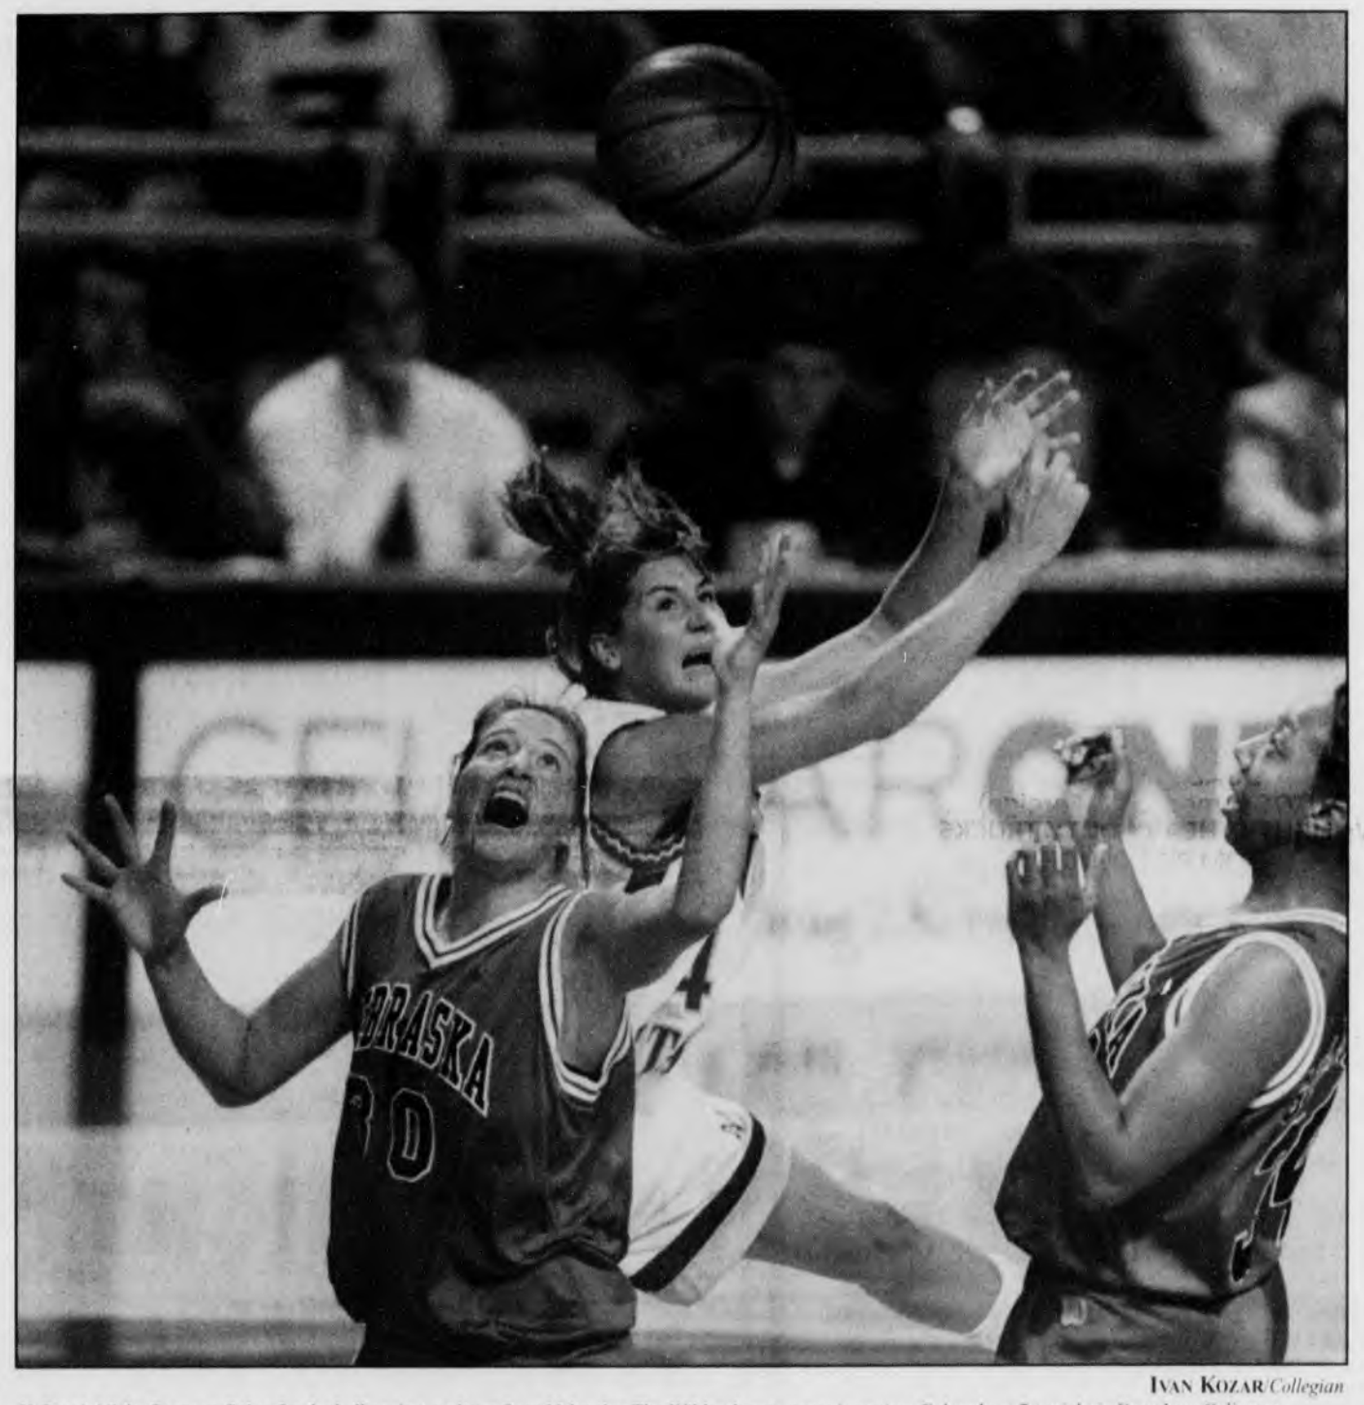
Brown's phone number is unpublished, and he could not be reached for comment. In August, he said the school did nothing wrong in its recruitment of Earl.

Johnny Jones, a former LSU assistant coach and now an assistant at Memphis, is accused of giving Earl the $6,600 between fall 1995 and December 1996. Some of the money was for truck and insurance payments.

But Jones' lawyer, Jerry Crawford, said the NCAA's letter was "dramatically inconsistent with the evidence we have developed in our own investigation." Crawford said Earl was the one who told the NCAA about the money for the truck and insurance payments.

The 6-foot 8-inch, 235-pound forward played in only 11 games for LSU as a freshman in 1996-97. He left LSU last January after being kicked off the team for violating rules and enrolled at Kansas.

The NCAA automatically investigates whenever a high-profile recruit transfers.



Kansas officials, including Coach Roy Williams, declined comment.

David Berst, the NCAA's assistant executive director for enforcement, said violations involving a player normally affect only the school where the violations occurred.

"The more difficult issue for us typically is how to prove whether there are such violations or not," Berst said. "More often, when we are investigating particular institutions, we seek information from student-athletes and transfers without jeopardizing their eligibility."

In other words, Earl could be granted what the NCAA calls "limited immunity" for providing information on LSU.

Earl is averaging 10.3 points and nine rebounds for the Hawks and has started several games since Raef LaFrentz broke a finger.

At this time last season, Coach Deb Patterson was lamenting the shallowness of her bench. A year later, things are no different.

Starting forward Ewa Laskowska, who was averaging nine points and four rebounds a game, returned home to Independence, Mo., over winter break. Freshman point guard Dee DeShay had surgery on an anterior cruciate ligament and is out indefinitely.

And freshman point guard Kim Woodlee dislocated her little finger in the Missouri game Jan. 13. Woodlee played 32 minutes Saturday with her fingers taped together a majority of the time.

The now nine-member roster shortened significantly in the Wildcats' loss Saturday to No. 20 Nebraska, when three starters racked up a dangerous number of fouls.

Senior guard Brit Jacobson hung on with four fouls, but with a little more than a minute left in the game, sophomore center Angie Finkes, freshman forward Brandy Harris and sophomore forward Nicky Ramage were all warming the bench after fouling out.

"When you don't have a great deal of depth, it can really cause a lot of problems," Patterson said. "We had a lot of players out there that hadn't played a lot of minutes before."

And the Cornhuskers capitalized on that fact, stealing the ball 17 times and forcing the Cats into 29 turnovers. Patterson said the depth factor was also a concern in the Jan. 7 Cats' victory over Kansas, but the team handled things better vs. the Jayhawks.

"You just get worn down," Patterson said. "We're going to have to stay tough like our team did last year."

Although Patterson insisted the team had no more depth last year, this season's situation is more crucial because of the experience of last year's roster.

"We had more seasoned players," she said. "They'd experienced things our freshmen and sophomores are reacting to and overre-

Cats try to regain last year's form against Buffs

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

It wasn't that long ago, really.

It was just March 8, 1997. Not even 11 months ago.

At Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo., the championship game of the inaugural Big 12 Women's Basketball Tournament was being played.

The game matched up the K-State Wildcats and the Colorado Buffaloes. The Buffs won the game 54-44 and took home the hardware as Big 12 Tournament champions, and continued to win two NCAA Tournament games before falling to the eventual national champion, Tennessee.

This year is a different story for both squads, though. Both enter tonight's matchup with identical 7-7 records and 1-3 Big 12 marks.

The difference for each team is in the players it lost. The Wildcats return only four players from last year's club and lost three of their five leading scorers — Andria Jones, Missy Decker and Kayla Hester.

The Buffs lost six players from last year's squad, including three starters. Among those were their "twin towers" — Erin Scholz and Raegan Scott. They averaged 25.6 points and 16.2 rebounds per contest last season.

Also, each team is trying to rebound from a big loss to a nationally ranked team. Saturday, No. 20 Nebraska handed the Wildcats a 78-47 home loss, while the Buffaloes were doubled up by No. 5 Texas Tech 80-40 in Lubbock, Texas. Each team is looking to rebound from the lopsided loss and return to the win column.

PATTERSON

"They've lost by some big margins. We've lost to Nebraska twice by big margins," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said. "Every game is a new game and a new opportunity."

Even though the stakes aren't quite as high as last season's final meeting between the two squads, it might be more important for each team to survive in the Big 12.

The winner will improve to more than the .500 mark for the season, as well as improve to 2-3 in the Big 12, but the loser will drop to 1-4 in Big 12 play.

Patterson said she wants the team to both remember and forget Saturday's loss to Nebraska.

"This one I want our kids to forget with respect to the emotion a loss like that can carry, but remember with respect to the experiences they've gained," Patterson said. "We've got to take experiences and build off of them, grow from them."

The Cats and Buffs will tangle at 7 tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

Football gamblers miss point of game, wreck innocence of Super Bowl Sunday

VIEWPOINT

Byron is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Byron at byronv@ksu.edu.

An estimated $75 million will change hands after the Super Bowl Sunday, according to CBS Sportsline. The money will not be exchanged between TV networks and NFL executives, not between team owners and players with incentive-laden contracts and not between advertisers and NBC. Instead, the $75 million will pass between gamblers and bookmakers.

Gambling is America's least-acknowledged addiction. Like alcohol and narcotics, it brings out the worst in people, creating a class of degenerates and junkies in search of a fix. In most cases, that fix lies in sports, where there are instant winners and instant losers.

At the NCAA Convention last week, an ex-mobster and an FBI agent described illegal sports gambling as the biggest problem on college campuses, bigger than drinking, bigger than drug use and bigger than date rape.

Michael Franzese, a former capo of New York's Colombo crime family, said campus gambling isn't a new problem, but it is growing. Franzese added that nearly every large college has at least one bookmaking operation on or near campus.

FBI special agent Thomas French said campus gambling is especially difficult to detect because organized crime uses student bookies and recruits roommates, members of greek organizations and school employees to provide valuable inside information on athletes and teams.

Recent studies reveal that about 45 percent of college students regularly place bets on sporting events, and gambling rings involving athletes and other students earn thousands of dollars every week. Further, a survey of Division I basketball and football players found 27 percent bet on college sports, and 4 percent bet on their own teams.

Research also shows football to be the favorite drug of sports gamblers. Conventional wisdom says football games are easier to pick than basketball or baseball, where upsets abound and even the best teams often lose a third of their games.

Baseball has all but lost its national appeal, and the interest that does exist for baseball teams is mostly local. Basketball's following will become more localized once Michael Jordan retires and fans realize how unbearable the last two minutes of an NBA game can be, not to mention the first 46.

But football will always be a national pastime. Someone in Chicago will always care about a bowl game in Arizona, and someone in Miami will always care about a playoff game in Kansas City, Mo. for one reason: there's money on the game.

Aside from the Pro Bowl, this weekend marks the last time we'll see a football game — college or pro — until August, making it prime fodder for bookies as desperate bettors scramble to compensate for five months of losing. Also, Super Bowl Sunday yields record complaints of domestic violence in some areas.

Gambling is another example of something that used to be taboo but is now commonplace in our society. The growing national availability and acceptance of gambling — along with the affluence of many students — has increased the problem on campus.

We don't blink at billboard advertisements for casinos. We listen to sports talk shows live from Caesar's Palace in Las Vegas, and we read the point spreads in the newspaper every day.

When asked about the prudence of publishing point spreads, Bob Knight once said, "Why don't they just publish whores' phone numbers? Is gambling on basketball, baseball or football any less illegal than prostitution?"

The upward trend of sports betting should cause many people to re-examine why they like sports in the first place. If the only reason they sit in front of the television on a Sunday afternoon is because they have a vested interest in a game, they need to be doing something else.

Unfortunately, in a day when TV ratings for sporting events are sinking like bricks, and fans feel increasingly disenchanted with petulant, overpaid athletes, gambling keeps millions of Americans riveted on meaningless games when they could be elsewhere.

For sports gamblers, though, genuine love for a winning team will never replace the adrenaline rush that accompanies a winning bet.

Cats look to end road skid tonight against Texas Tech

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Thus far in the Big 12 Conference season, road wins have eluded K-State in three different tries. The men's basketball team will look to erase that skid when it faces Texas Tech at 7 tonight in Lubbock, Texas.

But the Red Raiders won't be an easy foe for the Wildcats as they face three of the league's premiere guards in Cory Carr, Rayford Young and Stan Bonewitz. Carr is averaging a conference-best 23.5 points per game, and Rayford Young is chipping in 16.4 per. Bonewitz, a long-range threat, is hitting 42 percent of his three-pointers.

K-State coach Tom Asbury said his team faces a tall order in defending these perimeter players.

"They've got deep range. Bonewitz has deep, deep range," Asbury said. "We really have to make that adjustment in guarding that range."

Asbury said he was especially concerned about Carr because he wanted to make sure Carr couldn't run away with the game by himself.

"He's a great shooter," Asbury said. "He just scores, and the fact that he is the go-to guy gives him a lot more confidence."

However, these days K-State has had a go-to guy of its own in forward Manny Dies. Dies averaged 21.2 points and 7.6 rebounds in the past five games.

"This is Manny Dies' time," Cat point guard Duane Davis said. "The whole team offensively is 100-percent better than last year, and Manny is the epitome of that."

Davis said the difference between Dies this year and last year was that he was working a lot harder to get the ball.

"I know which side my bread is buttered on," Davis said. "I know Manny is going to keep working hard and getting that position for us."

Dies, who was named the Big 12 Player of the Week, said he is working hard at getting that position, too.

"It's just working to get open," Dies said. "Plus, you work a lot harder when you know your teammates are going to get it in to you."

Collectively, the Cats are shooting 48 percent from the field, the second-best mark in the conference behind KU at 49 percent.

Asbury said the field-goal percentage was a team effort and is a drastic improvement from a year ago when K-State was shooting a dismal 38 percent from the floor.

"It's not so much shot selection, but their confidence and their practice and the preparation has improved, and that's probably been the biggest part of that," he said.

Shorthanded Cats struggle to remain competitive

acting to right now."

Senior guard Brit Jacobson was hesitant to use inexperience as an excuse for the Nebraska loss.

"Sometimes you get caught up in thinking, 'We only have nine people that we practice with,' and 'We only have these people that play this many minutes,'" Jacobson said. "But there are only five people on the court at a time. If we're conditioned well, we should be able to play with five girls."

But exhaustion from running the court for 35 minutes and foul trouble sometimes makes this impossible, and bringing up the minutes of play for seventh, eighth and ninth players Heather Smith, Morgen Finneran and Marshela Webb is now important, Jacobson said.

Salaries are not a new problem at K-State. In fact, it goes back 130 years.

TIME LINE BY MATT KREPS
SOURCE: UNIVERSITY ARCHIVES

Recent proposals from the governor's office have focused attention on faculty salaries at Kansas Board of Regents universities. But the problem of paying professors to educate students stretches back for more than a century.

1868 — Then-Kansas State Agricultural College pays faculty in state currency — worth 80 cents on the dollar — instead of federal dollars. The board pledges to make up the difference and does so, using the college's endowment fund.

1875 — Facing budget constraints, several regents meet with senior professors at the college to suggest voluntary salary cuts to keep the school financially sound.

1892 — The first comparison between K-State and other institutions' salaries is entered into the record. It, like the many that followed, indicated salaries were below par.

"A comparison of the salaries paid at this institution with those at similar institutions throughout the West will show that salaries paid here are among the lowest, if not the lowest, in the record," according to the Eighth Biennial Report.

1902 — K-State President Ernest R. Nichols records the first mention of losing faculty to better-paying jobs in the 13th Biennial Report.

"I trust that you will urge upon the Legislature the necessity of a liberal appropriation that you may pay such salaries as the importance of the work demands and stop our teachers from being drawn away by the offer of better salaries elsewhere," Nichols wrote.

1918 — President William M. Jardine requests salary raises to meet cost-of-living demands.

1919 — Raises are given — with a catch. The regents solve the problem of losing faculty to higher-paying institutions by offering raises to only those faculty who were being enticed by other universities.

Other faculty did not qualify for a pay hike.

But the raises still didn't put K-State in line with other universities. In 1920, The Industrialist reported that unless wages at the college were raised, Jardine would be competing against high schools, not colleges and universities, to keep his teaching faculty.

"Some high school teachers are drawing the same rate of pay as full professors at the college," the article said.

Indeed, a comparison between salaries showed faculty at Iowa State College making up to 27 percent more than their peers in Kansas.

1932-33 — Faculty salaries are decreased by as much as 24 percent to account for the Great Depression. Later reports showed that Kansas salaries were among the hardest-hit and the slowest to recover.

1947 — President Milton S. Eisenhower reports that raises of up to 17 percent will be handed out.

However, he still expected many faculty members to resign for better offers. He did offer one glimmer of hope.

"There is no doubt, however, that our situation will be better this year that it was last year when 121 faculty members left the College," he wrote in the biennial report.

1948 — The raises are granted.

1949 — The Industrialist again reports, "Kansas State's faculty salaries are among the lowest in the Big Seven Conference or the six-state area of Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma and Kansas."

From 1949 to the present, various reports have indicated that K-State's salaries lag behind peer institutions.

In 1995, the gap between a K-State professor and a counterpart at a peer institution averaged $7,264, according to the Annual Report on the Status of Faculty Salaries and Fringe Benefits at Kansas State University.

K-State ranked 42nd out of the 50 land-grant colleges in the United States in the 1995 report.

State legislators to debate partial birth abortion, technology

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Although the mood in Topeka since Gov. Bill Graves announced his budget proposal on Jan. 12 is almost one of guilty pleasure, many legislators express doubts that the euphoria will last long on other issues.

Mike Matson, Graves' press secretary, said the legislative session has started well and could promise to be friendlier than in past years, but the potential for partisan bickering is always there.

"It's always encouraging when we get that sort of reaction," Matson said, referring to the positive attitudes in Topeka about Graves' budget.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said this session should be less divisive than in past years.

"We're not going to have the hard-core fiscal disagreements we've had the last three years," Glasscock said.

Of the many issues facing legislators, sources said two might become especially touchy during the coming months in the Statehouse:

Partial-birth abortion

One potentially hot-button issue for this year's session is partial-birth and third-trimester abortion.

Closing his State of the State address, Graves launched an attack on partial-birth abortion as an abhorrent procedure, urging the Legislature to outlaw the procedure. Graves is pro-choice.

Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, a pro-life supporter, said he thinks a partial-birth abortion ban has support in the Legislature, but some legislators might want to take it further.

Glasscock, who is pro-choice for abortions performed in the first two trimesters but against third-trimester abortions, said the House will probably grapple most with the issue of post-viability.

He said the House would like a 24-week time constraint for abortion; after that, the fetus would be considered viable, or able to live on its own outside the womb.

"I have no doubt we're going to have a big brouhaha about it," Glasscock said.

The Senate unanimously approved a ban last year on partial-birth abortions, but the House has yet to pass a bill that reconciles with the Senate's.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, whose conference committee has tried to reconcile the Senate and the House abortion bills, said first there needs to be a common approach between the Senate and the House on the subject.

She said a House bill that would also mandate autopsies on all fetuses more than 23 weeks old has insulted many senators who view the right of families to have funerals for lost babies as sacred.

"It's in the House's court now," Oleen said.

Rep. Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita and House minority leader, said the House will probably debate a provision in a bill that would require women to have all babies after the beginning of the third trimester, regardless if having the baby would put the mother's life in danger or if the baby would be born with defects.

"Since it's an election year, odds are the abortion politics will be greater," Sawyer said.

Technology and Education

While many legislators might agree on the concept of funding more technology expenditures for education, some don't think students should be asked to pay for it.

A Kansas Board of Regents proposal, which would institute a $1 per-credit-hour fee for students to be matched with a $2 per-credit-hour expenditure by the Legislature, could prove to be a contentious subject.

Peterson said it is unfair to ask students to lay money on the table to bargain with the Legislature. He said he doubted if too many legislators were aware of the two-for-one proposal.

"I think that's unortunate," Peterson said, referring to the regents' proposal of the two-for-one fee. "They probably felt that's the only way we're going to get it. The state needs to keep its commitment to technology."

Glasscock said he thinks another proposal to give $5 million in technology money to regents institutions can be passed, but he doubts the amount can be raised.

"I feel confident that we can protect this recommendation and the others in the legislative review," Glasscock said.

As for the two-for-one proposal, he said it's too early to tell how the Legislature will view it.

"Since the students support it and have effectively stated that, I think it would be hard for the legislature not to go along," Glasscock said.

Graves has proposed a one-time expenditure of $23 million for technology for education, but not all legislators agree Graves' proposal goes far enough.

Sawyer said Graves' technology initiative is a good start, but that technology is an ongoing issue that needs more than a one-time allocation.

Pope visits Cuba with intentions of change

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAVANA — On the eve of John Paul II's first visit ever to Cuba, the communist government was still laboring to patch and pretty up sections of the crumbling capital, which has been ravaged by a collapsed national economy.

While most Cubans agree the pope's five-day visit will leave their country changed, expectations on what the change will be depends on their political and religious perspective.

Foes of Fidel Castro hope it will weaken his communist regime. Castro hopes to gain stature for his revolution. And the Cuban church hopes for more freedom of action.

A nationwide prayer vigil was planned in churches throughout the country Tuesday evening. Outside downtown Havana's Our Lady of Carmen Church, boys and girls joyously swung each other around as young and old worshippers sang and prayed in a festival atmosphere, oblivious to the evening traffic on Infanta Avenue.

At Medalla Milagrosa Church, in the Havana neighborhood of Santos Suarez, 10-year-old Claudia, dressed in a pink Snoopy sweatshirt, dreamed of shaking hands with the pope as she and others finished work on the last of 80,000 simple Cuban and papal flags made at the church.

"The pope is like God, a beautiful picture," Claudia said.

While Castro sought to burnish his government's image and the pope hoped for a spiritual awakening in Cuba, it was unclear which of the two men has a tougher task of evangelization.

"Missions are more difficult here than in Africa or India. We have to start from scratch. We have to explain everything," said the Rev. Jesus Luzaretta, a Spanish priest who spends two months a year at Medalla Milagrosa Church. "You can't easily wipe out 40 years of restrictions."

In Washington D.C. on Tuesday, President Clinton was asked what the United States was gaining by pressing the embargo against Cuba.

"We want Cuba to move toward freedom and openness, and if they do, we'll respond," he said. "That's always been our position, and I believe that in the end it will prevail."

House stresses higher education with budget

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — House members who want to change the way the state runs its higher education system are using the budget process to force the issue.

The House Appropriations Subcommittee on Education has decided to postpone hearings on proposed budgets for state universities, community colleges and other higher education institutions until at least Feb. 10.

The subcommittee wants to give the new House Select Committee on Higher Education time to draft a proposal for changing the governance of higher education. The budget subcommittee's action also is designed to pressure university and community college officials into cooperating in the effort.

The State Board of Education supervises community colleges and vocational-technical schools. The Kansas Board of Regents oversees six state universities and the University of Kansas Medical Center.

Critics contend that community college and university programs often compete against one another and the result is a higher education system that is inefficient — and too expensive for taxpayers.

Rep. Mike Farmer, R-Wichita, chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee, said postponing budget hearings should add weight to the importance of the special committee on governance.

"It's a definite indication that we're serious about this," Farmer said.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, whose district includes K-State, said the House is holding higher education budgets hostage.

"Do we hold other budgets by the same standards?" she asked.

The Legislature has struggled with the issue of who should supervise universities, community colleges and other post-secondary institutions for more than two decades. In that time, various committees and commissions have produced nearly two dozen studies, without legislative action.

A special committee this summer and fall studied governance issues, but said only that community colleges and universities should better coordinate their activities. It proposed increasing state spending on community colleges by more than $30 million, most of it to decrease their property tax levies.

House Speaker Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, was so disappointed with that committee's work that he appointed the new committee on higher education, led by Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood.

House Minority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, said, "I think we've got a group of people who are dedicated to getting a plan out there. I think this will force the special interest groups into paying attention to the Legislature."

Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said he does not expect any delays in getting a budget drafted and approved, noting House members have promised they will have their work done.

But he said, "I certainly don't believe you're going to come up with a plan within 30 days that is the ultimate plan."

Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, predicted the House Appropriations subcommittee's tactic will prolong the session.

Why not try contact lenses?

Contact lenses may often be a simple, comfortable, clear vision solution for today's active person. Contact lenses will not slide down your nose in the summer heat, and won't fog up in winter's chill. If you were once told that you could not wear contact lenses because you need bifocals, have astigmatism or dry eyes, that may no longer be true. Refs, coaches needed for Manhattan youth soccer

Manhattan youth soccer programs are about to begin, and Recreation Supervisor Karen Perry said K-State volunteers are needed.

The program, sponsored by the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation, is looking for soccer coaches and officials to work with students in first through eighth grades. The season runs March 1 to May 9.

Perry said student volunteers are crucial to the soccer program, which is a relatively new sport in Manhattan.

"Sometimes kids grew up with soccer and are able to bring their skills to Manhattan," she said. "The college students have had experience with soccer."

Many K-State students have coached in the past, getting first-hand experience with the players.

Monica Murphy, sophomore in elementary education, said the coaching job was an active one.

"I get so involved in the game. After the first two games, I lost my voice," she said.

Although Murphy's enthusiasm was positive and directed at her team, officials can be at the opposite end of more negative yelling.

"When I'm on that field, I'm an official," Ryan Crowell, junior in journalism and mass communications, said. "They know that. You have to be stern, but fair.

"Coaches will apologize for giving you a hard time. Most of them are good-natured," he said.

Program offers models for Russian schools

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Three members of K-State's faculty delivered a presentation of Russia-Kansas relations Tuesday afternoon in Bluemont Hall.

Provost Jim Coffman, Dean of the College of Agriculture Marc Johnson and Professor Emmett Wright spoke about ARIOS-Kansas, an organization founded in Russia to promote better education in Russian schools.

ARIOS is an acronym translated in English to mean the Russian-American International Association for the Development and Integration of Educational Systems.

This organization is dedicated to finding ways to improve Russian schools at all levels.

Wright, a professor of education and director of ARIOS-Kansas, said K-State is privileged to be one of the two ARIOS locations in the United States. The other location is in Washington, D.C.

"This all began from the trade of ideas six years ago," Coffman said.

The affiliation of K-State with the city of Voronezh, Russia, through the efforts of ARIOS-Kansas is now a model for future educational collaboration between our two countries, Coffman said.

Johnson said a larger purpose of ARIOS-Kansas is as an education model for Russian universities. American universities have the decentralized model the Russians need for economic change. He said Russians are beginning to realize the importance of the research university as an engine to help build the economy.

The presenters noted several obstacles Russia faces in trying to improve its education.

Among these are a legacy of war in the 20th century and an economy struggling to make the transition from a collective to a market-based system.

"These problems are important to address because the people haven't seen the benefits they've been promised," Johnson said.

ARIOS-Kansas is trying to help solve these problems.

"It's fascinating what they've achieved," said Elena Lyutykh, a graduate student at K-State from Voronezh.

Johnson summed up the presentation titled "Higher Education in Voronezh, Russia: Problems and Promises," with a reminder that cultural differences are in people's experiences, not the way they look.

"People are alike all around the world," he said.

Coffee hour entertains with music, socializing

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

The International Coffee Hour Series kicks off at 4 p.m. today at the International Student Center. Amir Hajdar, senior in computer science, will play the acoustic guitar and talk about the situation in his native country, Bosnia-Herzegovina.

"Last year Amir played a song in his native language and played the English translation. It was such a hit that we had to get him," said Jim Endrizzi, program coordinator for the International Student Center.

The coffee hour is co-sponsored by the International Student Center and the Union Program Council. There will be free coffee and snacks.

Endrizzi said the reason for this series is to provide an informal environment for students to interact.

Endrizzi said this is a great opportunity for all students to come and enjoy music and learn a little bit about Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Hajdar said he has been in the United States for 5 1/2 years. He has played the guitar since he was 9 years old and has taken six years of classical lessons.

He said he plans to play a couple of classical songs, two Bosnian songs, a couple of songs he has written and one song with lyrics half in Bosnian and half in English.

Last year between 35 and 40 people attended the coffee hour on average, said Paul Donovan, program adviser for the UPC Multicultural Committee.

Last year, the series won the National Association for Collegiate Activities Outstanding Standing Series Program Award.

"I encourage any student who wants to learn more about fellow students to go," Donovan said.

The coffee hour series will be from 4 to 5 p.m. every other Wednesday through March 4.

Opus 11-winning band energizes CD with mix of ska and blues

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

Aaron Weisbender, lead singer and guitarist for the band Gobofiddlers, performed during the 1997 Opus band competition. The Gobofiddlers won the competition.

REVIEW BY MARY RENEE SMITH

The Gobofiddlers, last year's Opus 11 band competition winners, put their award to good use and produced their debut compact disc, "Get On Your Horse and Go ... Bo." The band's multilevel melodies and rough blues lyrics show a maturity far beyond the band's years — its members range in age from 17 to 19.

The CD manages to capture that which makes the band one of the area's most popular — its energy. Wearing suits to live shows, the Gobofiddlers treat audience members to a performance with the enthusiasm of a Blues Brothers show. It is difficult to capture the feel of blues or ska on a disc, but "Get On Your Horse And Go ... Bo" succeeds.

The band has been together since summer 1996 and is already enjoying the fruits of its labor. Aaron Weisbender, freshman in secondary education and the band's leader, said the CD is selling well.

"All together we've sold close to 300 already," he said.

The band is known for their rocking ska and rhythm and blues, and the CD delivers. "I Want To Be A Mobster" and "Going Back To Nowhere" show the band's mastery of both genres.

Weisbender said he has been a blues fan for a long time. As the songwriter of the group, he said the blues have a big influence on him.

"The way I write and get a lot of ideas for songs is either from stories of blues performers I have read, or I try to get an idea off a good blues riff," Weisbender said.

Songs like "Snakeskin Tooth" and "Pretty Bar Maids" show Weisbender's taste for blues, with lyrics seemingly drawn from long nights spent drinking away heartache in smoky bars. The sky is the limit for the young, talented band.

"I'd really like to get on some sort of indie label," Weisbender said. "We'll be happy as long as we are able to continue to play the music we really love."

There are tracks on the CD that could be a bit tighter, but nothing a few years of working and playing together can't cure. The first track, "Never Gonna Fall," is a good example of a song that will be greatly improved with time.

The CD is available at Streetside Records; On The Wildside; Hastings Book, Music and Video; Musicland; Sam Goody; and The Music Co.

Charles Dickens probably never imagined his novel "Great Expectations" would be teamed with some of the most popular musical acts in the 1990s, but with the pending release of the film adaptation, it has been.

In anticipation of the film release of "Great Expectations," a contemporary take on the classic novel, "Great Expectations the album" has been released

Music Review

GREAT EXPECTATIONS
the album

The album, a compilation of original songs written to accompany the film, is available although the film will not open until Jan. 30.

Tracks by Tori Amos, Poe, Duncan Sheik, the Verve Pipe, Scott Weiland, Iggy Pop and the Grateful Dead, among others, provide an intriguingly original combination of styles.

Eileen Meyer at Streetside Records said the album is selling better than most albums released before the accompanying movie.

"I'm really looking forward to the movie's release and the increase of sales that will come with it, because so far it's doing very well," Meyer said.

New music by Tori Amos is enough to spark a die-hard fan's interest in it. Amos, a moving, passionate and powerful performer, does not disappoint.

Amos adds an instrumental vocalization to the song "Finn." This light and airy tune is not necessarily typical of what one might expect from Amos. Its combination of chimes, flute, guitar, oboe and Amos's more delicate sounding voice is beautifully haunting. Amos's other addition, "Siren," is much closer to her deeply intense style of performance.

On the other hand, the inclusion of Duncan Sheik's song "Wishful Thinking" did nothing to improve this album. This tune starts out with a beautiful guitar and a nice beat — so far, so good — but quickly becomes more whiny and trite than compelling. Its vocals do nothing more than ruin a pretty song.

The Verve Pipe does not give us anything close to an annoyingly Freshman-esque tune. "Her Ornament" is an upbeat, interesting tune that truly makes one fight the urge to get up and dance.

Aside from the true fan's immediate love affair with Amos's contributions, the track "Life in Mono" by a virtually unknown artist named Mono also draws the listener in. It has a stirringly sensual, erotic quality that makes one long to hear it over and over and over again.

Although many varying styles of artists are included, there is an amazing sense of camaraderie between them. When one listens to the album from top to bottom, it obviously exists as a unit, bringing together a truly unusual combination of artists.

Much the same as blending plaids, solids and prints in decorating, this album meshes the best of everything to create a comfortable aura.

The film's release will be the true test of whether it will live up to the great expectations this worthwhile compilation of performances created.

Worlds of Fun to audition summer performers

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

Instead of making a one-day visit to Worlds of Fun, talented actors, singers, dancers and technicians can spend the entire summer there and get paid for it.

Worlds of Fun, a theme park in Kansas City, Mo., will be having auditions and accepting applications at the K-State Student Union for its 1998 live entertainment program. The auditions will be from 3 to 5 p.m. on Feb. 3 in the K, S and U rooms.

Worlds of Fun will be hiring singers, dancers, costume character actors and stage technicians.

Singers are required to perform one verse and the chorus of two songs of contrasting style at the audition. Dancers need to prepare a jazz routine no longer than two minutes and sing one song.

Performers must provide their own accompaniment. A piano and cassette deck will be available.

"Auditions are very simple. They will be on a first-come, first-serve basis," said Brent Barr, Worlds of Fun's live entertainment program spokesman. "They will fill out an audition card, turn it in to the judges and get a number. Call-backs will be held at the same time. If one is requested, the judges will let the person know right after performing."

For singers and dancers who cannot attend auditions, Worlds of Fun will accept taped auditions on a nonreturnable VHS videotape no later than Jan. 31.

It is requested that singers and dancers be able to perform a wide variety of styles of music, including Top 40, country, pop, rock oldies, Broadway and Motown.

Jennifer Edwards, assistant professor of music, said performers should fit their auditions to the style of music they will be hired to do.

"Play to your strengths, but don't take chances in an audition," she said. "It's always a good idea to show your range. If you have especially good high notes, you should show them off. If you don't, don't select a piece with high notes."

Edwards also suggests finding someone to listen to and watch the performance ahead of time to catch things the performer might miss.

Those applying for technical or costume character actor positions do not need to audition. They may turn in an application and résumé at the auditions or mail them to Worlds of Fun.

"Many people who have done local community theater have been selected. At this level it would be best if applicants have had technical experience in college," Barr said.

For those concerned about how such a job might affect their pocketbooks, Barr said the pay rate is a weekly salary between $325 and $400, based on experience, and there are bonuses on top of that.

"The first cast will begin rehearsal in March and start working when the park opens on April 18. This cast runs through October 18. Two additional casts will begin rehearsal in May and run through June, July and August," Barr said.

For those intimidated by the idea of auditioning, Barr said there is room for many levels of performers.

"We have hired at all levels of experience. Some kids in high school have even been cast before," Barr said.

destroying the culturally different," she said.

She said simply by failing to see another point of view, we often alienate those around us.

Bacon recalled that in the past, issues were black and white. In King's era, the sides were very clear, but today in our multinational society, more than two sides to an issue exist.

She called for new and creative ways to break down the barriers that people of color face when trying to achieve the American dream.

"These barriers are race, poverty and cultural isolation," she said.

She discussed how these barriers aren't always obvious.

"Racism today is very subconscious," she said.

She explained that our society shouts that all people are created equal, but quietly asks who deserves more, and who is more likely to win.

"Our explicit belief is equity, but our implicit belief is inequality," she said.

Bacon also discussed how racial inequality is interwoven with the increasing gap between the rich and the poor.

"Are we willing participants in this flawed system?" she asked.

She said the system continues because the upper class has convinced the middle class that people in the lower class are outsiders.

There is hope, Bacon said.

"Yes, we can overcome, but not until we deny the legacy of the survival of the fittest," Bacon said.

Her credentials include a doctorate in social psychology from Stanford University, but she said she would object to the listing of any of her academic pursuits above her powerful conviction of the need for social change.

Her presentation illustrated that nothing can happen until we understand that change isn't an event, it's a process, and that process is not brought about by institutions, but by individuals.

"The only difference between a rut and a grave is the size of the hole." She said now is the time to act.

"If we will not live together as brothers and sisters, we will die together as strangers."

Housing fees increased for 1998-99 school year

Werring said he knows some students won't be pleased with the increase, but most know costs rise over time.

"I don't think that the increase will have a catastrophic effect on students leaving the dorms. I think we are very competitive in the overall big picture in Manhattan," Werring said.

Among the University of Kansas and Wichita State University, the other two of the three largest regents universities, K-State remains the lowest in housing costs. Burgess said the rates are also some of the lowest in the Big 12 Conference, ranking 10th last year and 11th this year.

"We don't use those comparisons when reviewing housing rates to try to be in the lower half, but we try to remain competitive," Burgess said.

Regents universities submitted their proposed housing and dining plan in November for a first reading by the board, with final action at the December meeting. Regents must approve any housing-rate increase.

Schaaf said his committee was satisfied that the increase was needed.

"There was nothing about the department proposal that we were opposed to. It all was justified," Schaaf said.

Stadium expansion could get approval today

"THE VOTE WAS SIMPLY TO INDICATE WHETHER STUDENTS WOULD PARTICIPATE IN STADIUM EXPANSION ... ONCE WE FOUND THAT OUT, WE WENT WITH WHAT WE COULD AFFORD."

MAX URICK athletic director

KSU Stadium expansion plan

- Students will still receive only 7,500 guaranteed seats, but the proposed expansion would add about 7,000 seats to the stadium, boosting capacity to 46,074 permanent seats.
- Expansion plans would add 1,600 chairback seats to the upper deck on the stadium's east side. At $700 per seat for 5 years, the chairbacks are an important source of funding for the expansion project.
- The Dev Nelson Press Box would also see renovations as part of the expansion. New luxury suites to seat 484 fans and 126 theater-style club seats will also generate revenue for the project.
- The expansion plan also renovates the existing restrooms at the east entrance and adds four concession stands to the area.

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

With a nod today from the Kansas Board of Regents, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics will add 7,000 seats to KSU Stadium by the 1999 season without a student privilege fee or an increase in ticket prices.

The regents will vote on whether to allow the athletic department to borrow up to $16 million to pay for the proposed $12.8 million expansion project and $3.2 million to refinance existing debt.

Construction would begin after the last home game of the 1998 season.

Vice President for Institutional Advancement Bob Krause said he expects the proposal to pass without incident.

"In our conversations with the regents, everybody understands the request," he said. "We've certainly had alumni and supporters at K-State who would like us to expand. This is a fiscally sound proposal that will certainly accommodate fan needs."

Last semester, the athletic department proposed a student privilege fee to pay for about one-third of the expansion cost. Students rejected that proposal in a November student-body referendum vote.

Athletic Department Business Manager Bob Cavello said the referendum's failure and the lack of student money forced his department to re-examine the expansion.

"When students voted against helping pay for a student part of the stadium expansion, we went back to the drawing board and made $2 million in reductions to the original plan," he said.

But those reductions didn't cut into the number of new seats in the plan. With the regents' approval, the project will still add 7,000 seats to the stadium — the same number that would have been added with a $1 per-credit-hour privilege fee. That boosts the total number of permanent seats to 46,074.

With temporary seating, the stadium could potentially seat 50,000 fans.

Athletic Director Max Urick said the $2 million in reductions came in other areas besides capacity. Fewer restrooms and concession stands will be added to the stadium, and other, smaller changes were made.

"We didn't touch anything that had to do with capacity, revenue generation or code. We've just modified the infrastructure to live within our means," Urick said. "We had to eliminate some things and put them on an add/delete system. After the bids come in, if it comes in under what we've projected, we can add to the project."

Urick said other sources of revenue — mainly luxury seating — were increased to help fund the project without a student fee.

Originally, plans called for the addition of 1,000 chairback seats on the stadium's east side. Now, 1,600 seats will be added with a $700 per-season price tag, generating more than $1.1 million per season at 100-percent occupancy.

The Dev Nelson Press Box will still provide revenue for the project with the addition of 28 skyboxes and 126 theater-style club seats to the building. The additional luxury seating, if filled to capacity, could generate about $1.04 million per season.

The chairback and press box seats and suites are sold on five-year contracts.

Urick said revenue from parking charges at games could also add up to $50,000 per year.

Those sources of revenue will be the only money used to pay the stadium expansion bond, which University Controller Keith Ratzloff said could total

Speaker urges churches to take anti-racism stance

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

A panelists at an interfaith forum held for Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week said churches should combat racism in today's society.

"The role of religious communities is to inspire their members to be better people, and there is a lack of modeling by churches to combat racism," Karyn Wiseman, United Methodist campus minister, said.

The questions discussed by the panel were generated by the panel members, students and community members and focused on minority issues in religious communities.

Jayne Thompson, Lutheran campus minister, said the Lutheran church's mission is to educate people about racism.

"We know the church is not a perfect institution. It is made of individuals who are sometimes very broken," she said.

Eastern Orthodox Christians and Jewish people have a different perspective of racism, said David Yetter of the campus Orthodox group and Stacy Brown, representative for the Reformed Jewish community.

Yetter said Eastern Orthodox Christians have a history of being second-class citizens. The church has a history of being a minority in its Turkish homeland.

Brown said Jewish people have also been the victims of racism and have been in the forefront of ending social injustice.

Kathy Donley, American Baptist campus minister, said religious groups need to take a more active stance against racism.

"This must be something very intentional," she said. "I must seek out groups that I'm not already in."

Another related issue the panel discussed was the use of racial terms and titles.

Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week

"Call me Don Slater, then call me American or just a human being. Don't call me Negro, African-American or black," said Slater, who works at the Douglass Community Center and was an interfaith forum attendant.

Thompson said titles were often an issue of recognition.

"The dilemma is that we want to honor people's heritage," Thompson said.

Yetter said people are often separated when terms are used merely to identify them.

"One thing we can do is get to know people. It's easy to have judgments until you know someone," Keith Weber, the Catholic representative for the panel, said.

Panel discussion focuses on minority roles in media

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

The KSU Alumni Association had a forum Wednesday night to discuss the portrayal of minorities in the media.

"These types of discussions, I hope, get people thinking, not necessarily make huge changes," said Tammi Abdulhaqq, assistant director of Constituent Programs of the Alumni Association.

Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week

The topic for the evening was "Portrait of the Truth or Unseen Truth: Minorities in the Media." It was the first time the Alumni Association has sponsored a panel discussion in conjunction with Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

The panel consisted of Ron Kelley, a K-State alumnus and director of External Relations of the School of Journalism at University of Missouri-Columbia; Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc.; and Keener Tippin, research news coordinator for K-State News Services.

Discussion covered several examples of recent news coverage and how the news media have reacted to them.

Media coverage of Tiger Woods' race and the conflict it caused in the black and Asian communities was discussed.

"We are becoming more of a multicultural society. It's important that journalists get a person's heritage right," Kelley said.

Tippin said journalists tend to put labels on people, and that because race is a hot topic, it sells. Woods is an oddity on the Professional Golfers Association Tour, and that sells, he said.

The panel discussed a case in which Tawana Brawley, a black woman in New York City, accused white police officers of rape and assault. The grand jury rejected the case 10 years ago, and it is now under review. Brawley claims she was discredited and made out to be a liar because of her race,

Mac computer lab closure could create confusion

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Computing and Network Services' removal of the Macintosh computers from public use on campus with the closing of Nichols lab has caused some concern in campus departments that use Macintoshes.

Peter Knupfer, associate professor of history, said CNS saw the future of the Mac was not encouraging and was declining in visibility, and CNS was being responsible in this way.

▶ Mac Attack
The Collegian Editorial Board gives its take on the decision. See Page 4.

"They decided to segregate the Mac platform to specific parts of the campus, and they did this for economic reasons," Knupfer said.

Knupfer said he disagrees, however, with the way CNS made the decision to remove the Macs.

"There was no public discussion or consulting with Mac users or with departments that rely on them. I don't think it should have been done behind closed doors," Knupfer said.

Knupfer said there are four majors where Macs are used extensively: journalism, art, education and English. But there has been no evidence to show that CNS is working with these campus Mac users.

"They are simply saying that your platform is too expensive, and we can't support it," he said.

"They are basically giving up on Mac users."

Knupfer said he would like to see Faculty Senate establish a technology committee to look at this problem, and he invites any person to subscribe to KTECH-L, a K-State listserv that discusses the end of Mac use in public campus labs.

Charles Pearce, associate professor of mass communications, said a significant number of students still support the Macintosh system. Pearce manages the Mac labs in Kedzie Hall for the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

"I think it is a shame, but I understand that the Macintosh platform is a minority on campus," Pearce said.

Pearce said the removal of the Mac systems might increase the use of the journalism school's private Mac lab, although it is limited to students in mass communications majors.

Tweed Ross, director of tech services for the College of Education, said the removal denies any students who want to use the Mac environment on campus.

"The College of Education has a private lab, but it isn't open 24 hours a day, seven days a week," he said.

Pope arrives in Cuba, looks forward to speaking with Castro about status of Catholic Church

HAVANA) — Pope John Paul II, a messenger of truth and hope, began a historic pilgrimage Wednesday to Cuba, land of hardship, embattled faith and an aging, struggling revolution.

President Fidel Castro, dressed in a double-breasted blue suit instead of his usual fatigues, was among those waiting to greet John Paul as the 77-year-old pope slowly climbed down from his plane after arriving at 4 p.m.

Four children, dressed in white, held up a box of Cuban soil so the pontiff could continue his tradition of kissing the ground as he arrived.

For more than an hour, at the center of world attention in the televised airport ceremony, the white-clad pope and the gray-bearded 71-year-old revolutionary moved easily together. The Cuban leader aided the bent and ailing pontiff, offering his hand at the pope's elbow.

Castro hopes the visit will gain stature for his revolution and support for an end to the more than three-decade-old U.S. economic embargo. The Cuban church hopes the visit will help it expand its influence.

In his airport remarks, John Paul said he was praying that Cuba "may offer to everyone a climate of freedom, mutual trust, social justice and lasting peace." Castro said if there have been difficulties between the church and his revolutionary government, the revolution is not to blame.

En route to Havana, the pope told reporters aboard the papal plane he wants to hear from Castro the full truth of his country, about relations between church and state.

Standing at an airport lectern under a blazing sun, the pope celebrated this long-awaited day and spoke out on the U.S.-Cuban standoff that has long isolated this communist nation.

"May Cuba, with all its magnificent potential, open itself up to the world, and may the world open itself up to Cuba," he declared.

And he firmly endorsed what he called the legitimate desires of the Roman Catholic Church in Cuba — its quest for more privileges under Castro's government.

"I wish to say with the same force as at the beginning of my pontificate: 'Do not be afraid to open your hearts to Christ.' Allow him to come into your lives, into your families, into society," he said.

Castro, in his address, denounced the U.S. embargo as genocide and sought to identify his revolution's ideals with those of the church.

Each morning, beginning Thursday, the pope will travel to a provincial city — Santa Clara, Camaguey, Santiago de Cuba — for an open-air Mass, and then return to the capital for afternoon events.

In Havana, he will meet with Castro and other Cuban leaders Thursday and officiate at a Mass on Sunday in the Plaza of the Revolution — an event that might draw a half-million or more Cubans.

Zimbabwe troops arrest 300 citizens after riot caused by 21-percent increase in food prices

HARARE, Zimbabwe — The government promised Wednesday to review rising food prices that touched off two days of riots, Zimbabwe's worst civil unrest since independence.

Although the capital was relatively calm Wednesday, the protests sparked by a 21-percent increase in the price of cornmeal spread to provincial centers southwest of Harare, witnesses said.

Shops were looted late Tuesday and early Wednesday in the towns of Norton, Chegutu and Gweru in central Zimbabwe.

Troops in armored cars and trucks patrolled downtown Harare streets. Businesses that opened after the rioting quickly shut down after police and a military helicopter fired tear gas at crowds gathering on a highway leading into the city.

Police said 300 people were arrested after being found with looted goods in door-to-door searches.

The riots forced the government to send troops Tuesday to the capital and its volatile suburbs, where looting has been widespread.

It was the first time troops have been dispatched to quell riots since the nation, formerly known as Rhodesia, became independent in 1980.

Judge upholds attorney general's authority to determine status of insurance organization

TOPEKA — A Shawnee County District Court judge has held that Attorney General Carla Stovall has authority to seek a legal determination whether Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas is a charitable organization.

The issue is critical to the health insurance giant, because it could hinder the possible sale or merger of Blue Cross-Blue Shield with another insurer.

The Kansas Blues had merger talks with Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas City, but they broke off after Stovall expressed concern about the Kansas Blues' status as a charitable organization.

Judge Fred Jackson's ruling, which became public Tuesday, came in a lawsuit Blue Cross-Blue Shield of Kansas filed against Stovall last May. Blue Cross-Blue Shield asked the court to find that it is not a charitable organization.

Stovall's office asserts that Blue Cross-Blue Shield has assets that constitute a charitable trust. Charitable assets could not legally be part of a merger.

The attorney general bases her opinion on the fact that Blue Cross-Blue Shield of Kansas was formed in the 1930s under legislation aimed at making health insurance available to all. The legislation defined organizations formed to provide that insurance as charitable and benevolent corporations.

Blue Cross-Blue Shield attorneys asked for a dismissal of Stovall's claim, saying she doesn't have authority to pursue it.

Jackson disagreed. In his ruling, the judge said the insurer failed to convince him the dismissal is warranted.

Graham Bailey, spokesman for Blue Cross-Blue Shield, said the motion sought by his company was merely a technical issue and didn't have any bearing on the crux of the lawsuit — whether Blue Cross-Blue Shield is a charitable organization.

Bailey said Blue Cross-Blue Shield is reviewing the judge's denial and will decide whether to appeal or ask Jackson to reconsider.

K-State's Army ROTC program welcomed students back with an awards ceremony Wednesday in the Union Little Theatre.

An award was given by a K-State professor of military science, Lt. Col. Robert Kennedy. The award was for the best cadet and named for Tyler Houdek, a cadet who died in April 1997. The Tyler Houdek Memorial was awarded to David Traynham, a cadet who Kennedy said is well-liked and respected for his character and enthusiasm.

"Houdek was my mentor and role model," Traynham said. "It was a heartache to lose him. I kept thinking to myself, 'this award would mean so much,' but I had no idea I would receive the award [named] after him."

Other awards were given to the outstanding military science freshman, sophomore and junior.

Out of all three participants, Paul McGuire, a sophomore in criminology, was awarded cadet of fall 1997. He received a $100 savings bond from the KSU Foundation.

"To choose a cadet of the semester, we had a board consisting of five members that evaluated the cadets based on their criteria," Doug Thomas, cadet captain and senior in marketing, said.

The criteria was based on the cadet's knowledge, appearance, physical training and military bearing.

"The main reason I'm in ROTC is for the leadership development," McGuire said. "And my main goal is to be second lieutenant commission in the United States Army when I graduate."

He said ROTC provides training and job security.

"I knew that being a second lieutenant commission is a career I could count on after college," McGuire said. "I've always been fascinated by the military. It was my biggest interest in coming to K-State."

McGuire said ROTC is a great way to get involved at K-State.

"It's a good experience," McGuire said. "It builds character and definitely helps later in life."

Ribbons were given to the cadets who had a 3.0 GPA or above. Dustin Heder was awarded as the only cadet to receive a 4.0 GPA last semester.

Intramural ribbons were given to those who participated in at least three-fourths of all practices and games in a particular sport.

Ranger Cmdr. David Estrada awarded Jason Hudson the outstanding individual in the ranger program. He received a beret as part of the award.

The Jerald Ely Award Scholarship was awarded to Jennifer Barton.

The George C. Marshall ROTC award for the best cadet was given to Charles Day, an outstanding ROTC senior.

Library to request funding

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

The possibility of a new student privilege fee to help solve Hale Library's funding woes was discussed at Wednesday's meeting of the University Library Committee. The fee is one of several long-term funding options outlined in a task force report to the committee late last year.

Aaron Otto, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, encouraged University Library Committee members to attend the fee committee's Jan. 26 meeting to explain the library's financial needs.

"New fees have to be imposed sometime between Feb. 26 and March 1, so if you want to present something to the committee, it would be good to get started," Otto said.

Library funding has been a source of debate since many printed academic journal subscriptions were cut last semester due to budget constraints.

A report on funding possibilities issued by the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century outlined funding considerations for the library. Along with increased state funding and a proposed KSU Foundation endowment, the task force proposed a student fee to boost library budget levels.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock, also a University Library Committee member, said it was vital that K-State students, not faculty and administration, take the initiative in funding Hale Library with a privilege fee.

"We have a much better chance (of a new privilege fee passing) if it is driven by students," Hobrock said. "I have a group of students now, a grass-roots group, that is concerned about the library and ready to get involved."

Though most committee members agreed that a new fee was important, they also said the bulk of the funding responsibility should be carried by the state.

Hobrock said the Kansas Board of Regents requested a 1-percent increase in Other Operating Expenses for the library's budget, while Gov. Bill Graves proposed a 0.5-percent increase in OOE. The 0.5-percent increase, if approved by the Kansas Legislature, would amount to approximately $160,000 and take effect in July.

The increase would apply to all state universities governed by the regents.

Committee member Tom Parish said he would like to be able to tell the Privilege Fee Committee the level of state support as soon as possible. That level could affect the amount of any potential student fee, he said.

"In all fairness I don't want to ask for a privilege fee before we know the exact level of financial support we will be receiving from the state," Parish said.

Hobrock said state funding levels might not be final in time to present them to the Privilege Fee Committee, which must complete its work by March 1.

"We would probably have to offer the committee a matrix of possibilities," he said.

Committee members also discussed another aspect of the task force report — a proposed $10 million KSU Foundation endowment fund. If a $10 million fund were established, its interest could be used to fund a portion of the library's needs.

Until the endowment is completed, the task force recommended administrators ask the Foundation to provide $500,000 per year for library acquisitions beginning in July.

But Foundation officials have yet to receive any request for library funding assistance.

President Jon Wefald told the Collegian last semester that a formal request for library funds would be made to the Foundation.

But Gary Hellebust, Foundation president and chairman, said no formal request has been made.

Hellebust said he was aware of the task force's recommended endowment, and that the Foundation was prepared to help the library even without communication from Anderson Hall.

"All I can say is that we are taking pro-active steps," Hellebust said.

Poor communication frustrates CNS lab decision

After the recent removal of Macintosh computers from public labs on campus and Computing and Network Services' decision not to support them, students in several majors might find it more difficult to stay plugged in.

CNS not only failed to have a public discussion concerning this decision, but notification of the change was delivered via UNIX during the semester break.

The segregation of Macintosh computers to private (college- or major-specific) labs, including those in Bluemont and Kedzie halls, could leave students who have not declared a major out in the cold. The loss of public access to Macintosh computers could even result in additional lab-access fees.

The potential of increased traffic and the reduced hours of the private computer labs could have been alleviated with communication from CNS and a possible grace period.

The suggestion of establishing a technology committee to review this problem should have been heeded by Faculty Senate. Mac-users, surprised by this decision, should have somewhere to voice concerns.

After this decision, CNS is supporting UNIX and PC (or Intel-based machine) platforms. Macintosh computers, however, should never become obsolete on this campus.

Perhaps the administration and certain departments should make a commitment to continue support of Macintosh computers.

Students in art, education, English and journalism rely heavily on Macintosh computers, primarily because they are widely used in educational communities and newspapers.

Although many programs are available on Macintosh and PC, design-based and photo-manipulation programs were originally designed to work on Macs, and therefore, run faster.

CNS' decision to support a platform that is more cost-effective is commendable.

However, CNS decided to execute this plan poorly, and students should be able to expect more communication in this information age.

Survey results show K-State lacks Wefald-touted reputation

Similar to David Letterman's penchant for cranking out top-10 lists, U.S. News and World Report, the weekly news periodical, is in the business of ranking everything from law schools to HMOs. The effect is the same, as well; by the time U.S. News finishes ranking everything it does, it's easy to forget it existed for any other reason to begin with. The release of the 1997 rankings of undergraduate institutions of higher learning, though, left me dumbfounded.

The rankings revealed that, despite President Jon Wefald's valiant efforts, K-State's status as the so-called Harvard of the Plains is not universally recognized. Not even close. In fact, K-State's numbers didn't land in the top tier of schools. They didn't even place in the second tier. K-State finally appears near the top of the list of third-tier institutions.

Three other Big 12 schools, including the University of Kansas, were ranked in the second tier of institutions, with Texas A & M and the University of Colorado in the top-25 public universities. Such rankings do not and cannot represent the entirety of an institution, but they are not meant to.

Rankings are important, however, because they play a role in shaping the opinions of prospective students and the public at large, groups important to K-Staters who would like job offers or entry into graduate school after matriculating. That's every one of us, right?

Besides, even if the statistics used to generate rankings can't paint a perfect picture of a school, they do give an indication of an institution's relative strengths and weaknesses.

What did the K-State administration have to say about this obvious injustice? Ronald Downey, associate provost and director of planning and analysis, said, "If you take a wood like pine and want to use it to make furniture, you have to accept that it's less hard and it won't have the same depth of grain as oak."

With an administration at the helm whose command of metaphor runs this deep, who could doubt that we are in able hands?

Does anyone else sense, though, that maybe, just maybe, we as students have a right to expect a wee bit more from our administration?

If K-State's administration wants K-State to be known as the Harvard of the Plains, it's going to have to adopt an attitude far more proactive than its current plans to move up the rankings by relying on the increase in academic reputation that comes from Alliance Bowl exposure and the number of prestigious scholarships that K-Staters will be able to bring home each year.

Both bricks in this "wait-and-see" house rely on the performance of a very small group of students. Hope that every sport, male and female, brings home a NCAA championship, and you're talking about the efforts of less than one-twentieth of the student body.

VIEWPOINT

Paul Robben

Paul is a senior in chemistry. You can send e-mail to Paul at vladi@ksu.edu

Hope that the Marshall, Rhodes, Goldwater, McNair, Fulbright, Truman, Udall, Glamour Magazine, USA Today and Rotary Club Scholarship committees are particularly kind to applicants from K-State and you will still be discussing far, far less than one out of every 20 students on campus.

What needs to be accomplished in Anderson Hall is an inversion of thinking. Instead of relying on the efforts of a select number of students, they should see the accomplishments of this small group of students as evidence that K-Staters are not pine. Even if we're not oak, most of us could pass for ash (which looks a lot like oak when done right).

Addressing the situation of the "average K-State student" is a much more promising route to the land of national prominence. Would Bill Snyder have been the apple of the administration's eye for so long if he spent his post-game press conferences making references to "value-added evaluation?"

I can see it now. Reporters asking, "What happened, Coach?" after a rough 65-0 loss at the hands of the Akron Zips and him answering, "Well, you know, we couldn't score. We always started in poor field position, yet managed to move the ball nearly 40 yards every drive before having to punt. That should count for something." Then they ask, "On defense?" He answers, "Well, we certainly made it more difficult for them to score than had they had the field all to themselves."

The same commitment to detail sports journalists attribute to Bill Snyder's football program should become the hallmark of Anderson Hall. If the administration wants to ride Snyder's pony, they should be ready to saddle up. What's good for the goose, is good for the gander, right?

If faculty pay is too low, facilities lacking, and students who are poorly motivated and unprepared to learn are being admitted to K-State, then these items must be addressed in a concerted, nothing-but-the-best-will-do effort and not in the current rationalization-laden fashion.

The administration's rationalization that a tight-fisted Kansas Legislature will always prevent a public institution in a state with a small population from rising in the rankings is debunked by KU's presence in the list of second-tier schools.

Somehow KU was able to overcome the same obstacles and managed to eclipse K-State. Furthermore, the Legislature's fiscal conservativism should be seen as a rallying point, not a hindrance.

Why not address the Legislature's obstinance by scheduling experiential visits? Cajole legislators into attending a couple classes in Cardwell Hall, spending some time in a Chemistry II lab class in King Hall and visiting Holton and Leasure halls. Even better, hold a session of the Legislature on campus.

Perhaps the Legislature would be less willing to continue to underfund its state institutions of higher learning if members had to cast their votes in the free-speech zone? Silly as it might sound, an administration with gumption might try it.

Students understand that K-State will never sit astride the No. 1 spot in these rankings, but it's high time for the administration to demonstrate its depth of grain.

College men need to show compassion for victims of rape

She stands at the end of the bar sipping a malibu and cranberry juice. Her long blonde hair cascades over her shoulders and halts in the middle of her back. The black knee-high stockings reveal her tanned thighs, and you wait until she bends over the bar to order another drink. So you can watch.

This must be where my actions and the actions of a select few college males seem to deviate. At this point, I would walk over and ask her to dance. If rejected, I would say something witty and pursue my next rejection.

The following is, however, what another male might do. He strolls over and offers to pay. Instead of another easy drink, he chooses shots of hard liquor. Being that she is already a bit tipsy, she agrees. Seeing she is a small woman, he knows it might only take a few shots to achieve his goal.

Now she is drunk, possibly at the point of puking. He offers to take her home. She refuses, but her friends show indifference because they are drunk also, and she gives in to his constant prodding. They get into the car, but he doesn't take her home.

> "Guys, how would you feel if you were raped? Having someone force themselves upon you isn't easy to imagine, is it? This is the reality of many women on our campus.
> Scott Hopper

This does not have to be a fictitious story. Rape happens in Manhattan. So often, in fact, it's surprising to see in such a small Kansas town. Don't kid yourself. It happens.

Most women don't report the incident. This is where they go wrong. If not reported, the guy is free to act this way again with no repercussions. By not saying anything, you doom the next woman he meets in a bar or at a fraternity party. By talking, you save unspeakable hardship from the next woman and her family. If not for yourself, then do it for others.

Now a message to the men on campus. The majority of us are good, God-fearing individuals. There are some, however, who are giving us a bad reputation. If you feel you need to get a woman drunk to have a chance, then you are pathetic. The ability to carry on a decent conversation with a woman takes practice, but it is well worth it when she is sober.

If you feel you need to muscle or beat a woman into submission, then I know a few fathers and brothers who might want to talk with you, myself included. Women, in general, are smaller than men. It is no great feat to be able to muscle the majority of women around.

Almost no one can teach a potential rapist compassion, I presume. It is up to men and women both to help control these rogue victimizers.

Before you act, picture how she will feel. Likely, she will cry and feel guilty for years. You will destroy her life.

The heartache and pain of that one act is incredible. It will devastate her and her family.

Guys, how would you feel if you were raped? Having someone force themselves upon you isn't easy to imagine, is it? This is the reality of many women on our campus.

We can stop this, however. Women, if you need help and you don't feel you can turn anywhere else, contact someone, including law-enforcement and social work personnel, to help you. Let's identify these criminals and get them off our streets.

Rape statistics

The following statistics show the prevalence of rape in the United States.

- Every minute 1.3 women are raped. That results in 78 rapes each hour, 1,872 rapes each day, 56,160 rapes each month and 683,280 rapes each year.
- One out of every three American women will be sexually assaulted in her lifetime.
- Victims less then 18 years old are involved in 61 percent of all rape cases. Twenty-two percent are between the ages of 18 and 24.
- In a survey of college women, 38 percent reported sexual victimizations which met the legal definition of rape or attempted rape, yet only one out of 25 reported her assault.
- One in four college women have either been raped or suffered attempted rape.
- In a study of college students, 35 percent of men indicated some likelihood they would commit a violent rape of a woman who had fended off an advance if they were assured of getting away with it.
- One in 12 male students surveyed had committed acts that met the legal definition of rape. Of the men who committed such acts, 84 percent said what they had done was definitely not rape.
- 75 percent of male students and 55 percent of female students involved in acquaintance rape had been drinking or using drugs.

BSU meeting gives chance for input

Editor,

It was a wonderful opportunity to meet with some of the Black Student Union members Tuesday night to discuss the Distinguished University Lecture of Mary Montle Bacon during the Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week event, "Reflections of the Distinguished Lecturer." The BSU students articulated their experiences, views, perceptions and perspectives about issues of race as people of color in light of Bacon's words.

As I listened to the students, (the majority of whom were freshmen, I later discovered), I admired their determination in wanting to make a difference in their lives and in the lives of others and wanting to contribute to society in significant ways. Above all, I was impressed by their genuine honesty, humor and insight.

K-State is fortunate to have such individuals who are ready to challenge themselves. We all can learn from these bright, young intellectuals who add a refreshing dimension and depth to the K-State academic community. If you have an opportunity, talk to them, and if you don't have the opportunity, make the time.

I thank them for their many gifts and talents they bring to our campus. I plan to keep an eye on these aspiring individuals, and I hope others within the K-State family welcome them while at the same time, listening, talking, encouraging and supporting them through their academic career here. They are destined for great things, and we all will benefit as a result.

Thank you, BSU members, for an enchanting evening, resplendent with your voices, your dialogue, your visions and your plans for action.

As Jesse Jackson once said, "It's not your aptitude but your attitude that determines your altitude."

Interviewing clinic could sharpen skills

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

Finding that first real job or summer job can be difficult, and participating in mock interviews could help students perfect their interviewing skills.

Students in the colleges of Agriculture; Architecture, Planning and Design; and Arts and Sciences will have the opportunity to attend mock interviews next week. Registration for the College of Agriculture and College of Arts and Sciences is going on now.

"This is the perfect opportunity for students to practice their interview skills," said Rebeca Paz, assistant director of Career and Employment Services. "They get to go through the entire interviewing process, including researching the companies."

Paz said this is the first mock interview session for the College of Arts and Sciences. Six companies are coming to interview students. The 20-minute interviews will conclude with a 10-minute critique by a company representative.

Registration will continue through Monday in the north hallway of Holtz. The mock interviews will be Wednesday in Holtz Hall. Students must bring a résumé when registering and should sign up with the company of their choice as soon as possible.

"There will be slots for 100 interviews, and we have a company coming that can interview every major in arts and sciences," Paz said.

Students in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design registered for interviews during December.

"We have 19 companies coming and had 120 interview slots," said Allan Hastings, associate professor of interior architecture. "They were all gone within three hours."

Mock interviews for the College of Architecture, Planning and Design will be Jan. 30 in Holtz. The session will also include lectures by company representatives and an employer panel. Hastings said many prestigious firms are participating in the interviews.

"They are in the top 5 percent," Hastings said. "We want our students to test their capabilities against the best in the nation."

Workshop to provide network opportunities

AMY BICKEL
Kansas State Collegian

Students in the College of Agriculture will get the chance to brush up on their interviewing skills.

Alpha Zeta, the agriculture honorary, is sponsoring an interview clinic Jan. 29 for students to get practice interviewing with top agricultural companies.

Students wanting to participate need to sign up by 5 p.m. Friday in Waters 119.

Companies represented include Cargill, Quaker Oats, Koch Industries, KSU Cooperative Extension, Management Recruiters, Continental Grain, Excel Corporation, Farm Credit Bank, and Earl May Seed and Nursery.

"This is a good opportunity for students to network with employers," said Jackie McClaskey, assistant director of Ag Academic Programs.

About 90 students participated in last year's clinic. There is room for about 120 students this year, McClaskey said.

Students sign up for 30-minute appointments. For 20 minutes students go through a mock interview with a company employer. The last 10 minutes is reserved for critique.

"Any time you can get experience interviewing is helpful," McClaskey said. "Actually practicing with a real employer will benefit the students down the road when looking for a real job."

Brian Placek, senior in bakery science and Alpha Zeta student coordinator of the clinic, said besides getting experience with the interviewing process, students can get input from different employers on what they want to see.

"I think it's a privilege to students to have this opportunity," Placek said. "It helps them be more relaxed and more organized for later interviews."

Abra Ungeheuer, sophomore in agricultural economics, said she decided to participate in the clinic this year to get an idea of what it would be like when she interviews for a job.

"It gives you a little edge," Ungeheuer said. "I'll get to know more about agribusiness companies. Why wouldn't you want to take advantage of that opportunity?"

McClaskey said students not ready to sit through an interview now can attend a panel session at 3:30 p.m. in Williams Auditorium, Umberger 105. Several of the employers will discuss what they look for in interviews.

"We can all talk to students about it, but no one's better than those actually hiring students," McClaskey said. "I strongly encourage students to participate."

Cavalleria rusticana/I pagliacci
Friday, January 23, 8 p.m.
Public: $32, $28, $24
Seniors: $30, $26, $22
Students: $16, $14, $12
Cavalleria rusticana, or "rustic chivalry," features music by Pietro Mascagni and is based on a play by Giovanni Verga. Set in Sicily on Easter Sunday, it is the tale of a peasant girl who fears that the man she loves is having an affair with a married woman. Holiday joy turns to bitter sorrow when the woman's husband challenges the girl's boyfriend to a duel.
Continuing the theme of passion and adultery, Ruggiero Leoncavallo's I pagliacci, "the strolling players," is an opera-within-an-opera. The tale told by a commedia dell'arte troupe takes on a life of its own, bringing tragedy to the actors.
These are operas in the grand tradition -- sung in Italian and performed with full orchestra. With English-language supertitles you won't miss a word.
Call McCain at 785-532-6428
You can charge your tickets to VISA, MasterCard, or Discover. Or stop by the box office, noon to 6 p.m. weekdays.
Additional funding provided by the K-State Fine Arts Fee.

NCAA Men's top-25 hoops

No. 2 North Carolina 74, North Carolina State 60

RALEIGH, N.C. — Antawn Jamison matched his career high with 36 points Wednesday night as No. 2 North Carolina held off a depleted North Carolina State 74-60.

The Tar Heels (19-1, 5-1 Atlantic Coast Conference) moved within one victory of their 28th consecutive 20-win season.

Meanwhile, the Wolfpack (10-7, 1-5) has lost five of its last six after a 9-2 start.

Jamison was 14-of-17 from the field and grabbed 14 rebounds as the Tar Heels held a 41-16 advantage on the boards.

Ishua Benjamin led N.C. State with 18 points.

The Wolfpack dressed only eight players — four freshmen — because of injuries.

No. 7 Kentucky 70, Alabama 67

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Scott Padgett scored 24 points and Nazr Mohammed added 22 as the Wildcats overcame an inspired effort by Alabama.

Alabama (9-10, 1-5 Southeastern Conference) was coming off the worst loss in school history in falling 94-40 to Auburn on Sunday.

Damon Bacote had 25 points on 7-of-9 shooting from three-point range for the Crimson Tide, who were 14-of-26 from beyond the arc. They scored 27 points off Kentucky's 18 turnovers in nearly pulling off the upset, but have lost four straight games and five of seven.

Padgett's two free throws with 12 seconds left gave Kentucky (17-2, 6-0) its final margin as Bacote's game-tying three-pointer from the right wing fell short of the basket as time ran out.

Michigan St. 78, No. 10 Iowa 57

IOWA CITY, Iowa — Reserve Morris Peterson scored a career-high 20 points and helped the Spartans move into a first-place tie in the Big Ten.

Michigan State (12-4, 5-1) shut down an Iowa team that had been averaging 85 points and was second in the league in field goal percentage. The 57 points were a season-low for Iowa (15-3, 4-2), which managed only 14 points in the first 16 minutes of the second half.

The 21-point margin was Michigan State's biggest ever in Iowa City. The Spartans' widest margin previously was 18 points in 1958 and 1964.

No. 12 Purdue 82, Ohio St. 71

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind. — Jaraan Cornell tied a Mackey Arena record with seven three-pointers and scored 23 points to lead the Boilermakers.

It was the Buckeyes' eighth straight loss and a school record-tying 11th straight defeat in the Big Ten over two seasons.

Cornell, a sophomore guard, missed his only attempt from inside the three-point line but was seven-of-11 from long range, including six in the first half when Purdue (16-4, 4-2) took an 18-point lead.

Ohio State (7-11, 0-5) rallied in the second half behind freshman Michael Redd, who had 25 points, closing within seven points with just over six minutes to go.

No. 13 Mississippi 80, LSU 58

OXFORD, Miss. — Ansu Sesay scored 25 points as the Rebels (13-2, 4-1 Southeastern Conference) tied a school record with their 15th straight home victory.

Ole Miss scored the first 11 points, and after Sesay's 16-footer made it 13-2 just five minutes into the game, the Rebels maintained a double-digit lead.

LSU (9-7, 2-4), which had its two-game winning streak stopped, had five turnovers and was 0-for-3 from the field as the Rebels jumped ahead 11-0. The Tigers went on to shoot 50 percent (21-of-42), but that wasn't enough to overcome the early deficit.

Maurice Carter led the Tigers with 22 points.

No. 14 South Carolina 81, Tennessee 51

COLUMBIA, S.C. — LeRon Williams scored 13 of his career-high 25 points in the first half, and the Gamecocks held Tennessee to its lowest scoring output of the season.

Williams and BJ McKie scored 13 points each as the Gamecocks (12-3, 4-2 Southeastern Conference) outscored the Volunteers 33-9 over the final 14 minutes of the first half. McKie finished with 20 points.

Rashard Lee scored 10 points for Tennessee (11-4, 1-4), which has lost seven straight at Carolina Coliseum.

Notre Dame 83, No. 15 Syracuse 63

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Keith Friel scored a career-high 30 points Wednesday night, including a school-record eight three-pointers, as Notre Dame upset No. 15 Syracuse 83-63.

Friel missed just two shots from three-point range and was nine-of-13 from the field. The sophomore wasn't the only one who was hot from the outside, as Notre Dame (10-6, 4-4 Big East) went 13-of-19 (68 percent) from 3-point range.

It was Notre Dame's second win in seven days over a ranked team — it beat then-No. 20 West Virginia 74-72 last Thursday on Friel's buzzer-beater — and the first time since 1993-94 the Irish have beaten two Top 25 teams in one season. With about two minutes to go, the Notre Dame fans started chanting "Over-rated, over-rated."

No. 18 Arkansas 79, Auburn 65

AUBURN, Ala. — Pat Bradley triggered two 10-0 second-half runs to help the Razorbacks pull away.

Bradley and Landis Williams each had 17 points, while Nick Davis finished with 12 points and 17 rebounds as the Razorbacks (15-3, 4-1 Southeastern Conference) bounced back from an emotional overtime loss to Kentucky last weekend.

Doc Robinson had 20 points for the Tigers (11-5, 3-2), who were coming off a 54-point win over Alabama.

▶ WOMEN'S TEAM ABLE TO REBOUND AFTER WORST LOSS OF SEASON.

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team recovered from its worst loss of the season by defeating Colorado 64-52. The Wildcats' second conference win of the season was their first since a Jan. 7 victory over Kansas.

The Buffaloes, defending Big 12 Conference champions, lost their fourth-consecutive game and dropped to 1-4 in conference play.

Early in the game, the Cats found themselves down 11-3, but they recovered to take control. K-State scored the next seven points of the game, but didn't take the lead until a three-pointer by guard Kim Woodlee with 5:02 left in the first half gave the Cats a 20-18 advantage.

Despite shooting 31.4 percent in the first half, the Wildcats took a 26-23 lead into halftime. Defense was an important factor for the Cats. K-State forced 12 Buffs turnovers in the first half and held Colorado to seven field goals.

After accumulating a season-high 29 turnovers Saturday night against Nebraska, the Cats had only seven in the first half and 17 for the game.

"I was real pleased with our response to Saturday's game," K-State coach Deb Patterson said. "I thought we came out and played the kind of basketball we needed to play."

The Buffs stormed back in the second half, gaining the lead by as many as three points. After going back and forth for much of the second half, the Cats

Finkes delivers big plays in victory over Buffaloes

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Whenever the Wildcats were desperate for a basket in Wednesday night's 64-52 win over the Colorado Buffaloes, sophomore center Angie Finkes delivered.

"I didn't play well against Missouri and I didn't play well against Nebraska, so I figured it was time to step up," Finkes said.

Finkes racked up 16 points on six-of-14 shooting, and she also grabbed five rebounds, but her biggest contribution was her timely way of answering Colorado's spurts with spurts of her own.

At the 4:24 mark in the second half, Finkes took her largest step of the game. With two seconds on the shot clock and the score tied at 50, Finkes connected on a turnaround shot from the block. She drew a blocking foul from Colorado's Nikki Weddle on the play and made the foul shot to put the Cats ahead 53-50. From there, the Cats never relinquished the lead.

Colorado coach Ceal Barry said the game could have gone either way until Finkes' three-point play.

"I thought we had a pretty good chance of winning until about the three-minute mark when they had a three-point play foul with about two seconds left on the shot clock," Barry said. "That really broke our back."

Intramural registration continues until Friday

CHARLEY MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

As the cold, dreary winter weeks lumber on, students flow back into the everyday routines of class, studying and arm wrestling.

That's right, arm wrestling.

Wrist wrestling, the name the sport is classified by, will be one of many intramural sports sponsored by Recreational Services.

Sign-ups for wrist wrestling started Tuesday and end Friday at midnight, while sign-ups for the first activities have been taking place at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. Students and faculty planning to participate have a number of options when registering.

"They can come in to the office here at the Rec, or they can visit us on our web site," Steve Martini, intramural director, said. "And anyone in a fraternity, sorority or dorm has a Rec chairperson."

Individual sports cost $1 per person to enter.

The first-quarter sports are all indoors. The individual sports are four-wall handball doubles, four-wall racquetball doubles, table tennis doubles, wallyball doubles and squash singles. Wrist wrestling and free-throw shooting sign-ups are Feb. 9 through Feb. 13.

Martini said basketball is by far the biggest winter sport. Team fees are $15.

"For basketball, we typically have 370 teams," Martini said. "It's a big program, the participation is good and it's fairly competitive, as much as people want to make it."

With so many individual sports, participants might be concerned about time constraints.

"There is a lot of overlap between the individual sports," Ron Miller, assistant intramural director, said. "But typically, those work out."

The second-quarter sports are mostly outdoor activities.

"After spring break we move outdoors and the team sports will be softball and sand volleyball," Martini said.

Sand volleyball is new for intramurals and will be co-ed four-on-four. The individual sports next quarter will be three-wall handball doubles, three-wall racquetball doubles, horseshoes doubles, tennis doubles, badminton doubles, three-on-three basketball, triples volleyball, around the world, home-run derby and a track meet. There will also be a faculty/staff golf tournament April 24.

"We have a very active campus," Martini said. "We're very fortunate to have a building like this, and I think everyone realizes that."

Martini encourages students and faculty to try intramurals they might be interested in even though some intramurals have a reputation of competitiveness.

"If someone is concerned about the competition we have other things to offer them," Miller said.

Cats fail to pick up 1st Big 12 road victory

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUBBOCK, Texas — The Texas Tech Red Raiders got just what they needed to end a three-game Big 12 Conference losing streak.

Texas Tech got 31 points from Cory Carr, clutch free-throw shooting from Rayford Young down the stretch and a strong second half from Cliff Owens, resulting in a 79-76 victory Wednesday night over K-State.

The victory was the first for Texas Tech (8-7, 2-3) since a 66-55 victory over Iowa State on Jan. 3 and, at least for the moment, boosts the morale of a slumping Raider team.

"This is very important for us," said Carr, who scored in double figures for the 36th consecutive game. "Our confidence was low, our self-esteem was low. Some people were pointing figures. We pulled together tonight. Certainly any game you win at this point is a confidence booster for your team."

K-State (11-5, 2-4) suffered its fourth loss in five games. With Tech leading 75-74, the Wildcats fouled Young with 10.8 seconds to play, but he made both ends of a one-and-one to put the Red Raiders up by three.

K-State's Duane Davis hit two free throws to cut the lead to one point again with 4.7 seconds remaining, and the Cats fouled Young immediately. The sophomore guard iced the game by hitting two more foul shots with 3.9 seconds to play.

"We just didn't make the plays down the stretch when we needed to," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "We have to stop doing dumb things. We had our opportunities, and we didn't make any plays, and we didn't have an answer for Carr."

Texas Tech University Daily

Aaron Swartzendruber led the Cats with 21 points. Shawn Rhodes added 15 points, and Davis and Manny Dies added 13 points apiece.

Dies, the Big 12 player of the week, did not start because of disciplinary reasons, having arrived late for practice Monday.

Texas Tech struggled through the first half, shooting 35 percent. A 15-4 run midway through the second half finally lifted the Raiders, who shot 67 percent after halftime.

"I'm very proud of our team, especially in the second half," Tech coach James Dickey said. "Our team really responded, made some big plays, did a great job defensively, and played with confidence."

Let it ride when it comes to Big 12 basketball these days

VIEWPOINT

SCOTT FRITCHEN

Scott is a junior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

It seemed appropriate that I was standing at a blackjack table in Station Casino Monday night letting my money ride while watching Kansas play Missouri.

My buddy won $500 on his third hand. Three sevens on a $1 bet. Boom. $500. It was the first time it had been done at that table. Deal the cards. Let the money ride. That's the stuff dreams are made of in casinos.

The four other card players at the table clapped, gave high-fives and issued pats on the back, and my buddy left the table to cash in his chips. Slot machine bells echoed. Cocktails were bought. Yep, the stuff dreams are made of.

And there was Kansas — a team that had won 21 of the 23 hands it had been dealt, a team that started the season with two aces, two all-Americans and didn't have to take many chances — playing Missouri on television. The Jayhawks were used to winning. Odds were always on their side.

But this was the Big 12. Kansas was playing at Missouri.

Although Missouri, which had only won nine of 16 hands, staggered onto its home floor like an unemployed insurance salesman in a polyester suit trying to change his luck. Its coach, Norm Stewart, knew he had sent Kansas coach Roy Williams home broke three of the last four times he had visited Hearnes Center in Columbia, and Williams stood sweating on the sideline.

One of his aces, All-American Raef LaFrentz, was forced to sit injured on the bench again like an unplayable joker. Williams also had to hold onto the other ace, All-American Paul Pierce, for much of the game with three early fouls.

So this was a perfect shot for head coach Stewart. Nothing to lose. Everything to gain, including looks from the tournament-selection committee in March, when the ante is much greater.

A national audience saw the cards that were dealt. There were 13,500 people packed in the arena, all knowing the house rules, and there was senior Tyron Lee out to prove with 11.4 seconds left that a single can beat a Flush in Hearnes Center.

Lee sank both free throws. Kansas' ace, Pierce — the Hawks' only hope of winning the game — came up short in the end.

The 13,500 fans stormed the court. High-fives were exchanged. Stewart was patted on the back. Kansas players walked from the table in disbelief and headed home broke once again.

"That's luck!" a guy at the casino yelled.

"Missouri got so lucky," another man said, walking away from the blackjack table. "Incredible."

It takes a little luck to play in the Big 12 Conference these days. Rack 'em up, deal 'em up, let it ride. Anyone can beat anyone on a given night. Match up card to card and show them whatcha got.

Sometimes you get a hunch like Lee did Monday night that things are just going to go your way. Sometimes you can just feel it in the air, you can taste it, and you hope the flavor never goes away.

Don't get me wrong, it takes a lot of skill to perform like Lee did with everything on the line. But say you had an off night like Kansas freshman Eric Chenowith, missing all eight of your shots and choking under the pressure and missing the free throws at the end. And you lose. See what I mean?

Reason No. 2 why basketball involves luck: see NBA Draft Lottery.

Man, this Big 12 stuff gets almost sickening. Technically, Missouri should have lost to Kansas by 75 points since K-State walloped Missouri by 55 and Kansas beat K-State. That was what the basketball gurus would reason.

But throw in the following wild cards: Missouri had beaten Kansas three of four times at home. Tiger fans argue they were louder than Jayhawks and could cause Kansas' shots to fall flat with the wind produced from their yelling.

Lee could have been wearing lucky underwear while Pierce discovered during halftime he was wearing the same socks he wore against K-State, and Baylor is 5-0 in conference play. What do you have?

No reasoning at all. None. That's the way Big 12 games are played these days. You feel it in the air. You take the chance. You just let it ride.

Cats break out of skid, beat Buffaloes at home seemed to be in control with a 49-43 lead with 8:18 left in the game.

Colorado again rallied. Consecutive field goals, including a three-pointer by Buffs forward Shelley Garcia, tied the game at 50 with five minutes left.

K-State took control from there. Wildcat guard Brit Jacobson hit center Angie Finkes with a pass inside, and Finkes converted, being fouled in the process. After the made free throw, the Cats took a 53-50 lead.

On the Cats' next trip down the court, Jacobson made a shot from the paint to extend K-State's lead to five points.

Garcia scored inside after two free throws by K-State forward Jenny Coalson to pull Colorado back within five, but a Coalson jumper with 1:37 left gave the Cats a seven-point lead. Woodlee nailed a triple with less than a minute remaining to seal the victory.

The Cats used a 14-2 run over the last five minutes of the game to take a 64-52 win.

Patterson said the reason the Cats won was because they stayed in system, something they had not done recently.

"People did their jobs," Patterson said. "We refused to let Colorado take us out of offense. When we're playing within the framework of the system, we're a much better ballclub."

K-State shot a season-high 71.4 percent in the second half to propel them to victory.

All five Wildcat starters had at least nine points, led by 16 from Finkes. Jacobson was one rebound shy of her first double-double of the season and Coalson added a season-high 11 points for the Cats.

The players agreed that running the offense correctly was the difference in the game.

"When we run the offense, we get the shots we want," Coalson said.

Jacobson added that the success of running offense correctly was important for morale.

"We taught ourselves tonight that we can run offense and we can win," Jacobson said. "When we don't run offense, we play like we did against Nebraska and against Missouri."

Stoudamire trade proposals pour in

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Damon Stoudamire was nearly traded to the Houston Rockets on Wednesday, but the Toronto Raptors decided to reconsider offers that came pouring in from other teams.

The Rockets, Los Angeles Lakers, New York Knicks, Vancouver Grizzlies, Portland Trail Blazers and Orlando Magic were in contention to acquire Stoudamire, according to several league sources who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

The proposals were much better than what Houston was offering: Kevin Willis, Mario Elie and a third player — either Brent Price, Matt Maloney or Emanuel Davis — and a No. 1 draft choice in 1998 for Stoudamire, Walt Williams and Zan Tabak.

"I can't worry about everything that's going on off the court," Stoudamire said after his last-second shot lifted Toronto over Sacramento 99-98 Wednesday night.

"There's been a lot of distractions, a lot of talk of me going here, going there. But the main thing for me to do is play basketball," said Stoudamire, who scored 36 points. "I've said it from the day all this stuff started, that all I wanted to do was to continue playing basketball. Whatever else happens, happens."

Raptors general manager Glen Grunwald said he expects to make a trade within a week, but suggested the deal might not necessarily involve Stoudamire. Grunwald would not say what other players he was taking about dealing.

"He likes Toronto," Grunwald said of Stoudamire. "I would like to find a way to get him to stay here."

The Lakers' offer for Stoudamire was said to include Nick Van Exel and Elden Campbell. The Knicks offered Chris Mills, Chris Childs and-or Charlie Ward, along with the Raptors' own lottery-protected pick in 1998. New York also offered to pay most of the salaries for the players it would send to Toronto.

The Grizzlies were offering rookie point guard Antonio Daniels and the Trail Blazers were offering a package including Kenny Anderson.

Nets general manager John Nash said New Jersey had dropped out of contention in its bid to acquire Stoudamire. He denied that Sam Cassell and a draft pick had been offered, but acknowledged talking to the Raptors about obtaining Marcus Camby.

The Trail Blazers' chances were enhanced by the fact that Stoudamire is from Portland — and team owner Paul Allen is a billionaire who could afford to pay Stoudamire's highest asking price after he becomes a free agent next summer.

Finkes comes through in clutch to help lead K-State's victory

The three-point play was not Finkes' only big play of the night. She connected for the Cats' first shot from the field with a turnaround jumper at the 15:45 mark in the first half when they were behind 9-1.

Finkes then pulled the Cats within one with six minutes to go in the first half with a jump shot from the free-throw line.

The Cats led 26-23 at halftime, but Colorado started the second half with a spurt and tied the game 34-34 by the 16-minute mark. Finkes struck again at the 15:15 mark with a turnaround shot from the block, making the score 36-34.

Although Finkes led all scorers and came up with some big shots, K-State coach Deb Patterson said her game had its highs and lows.

"Angie tonight played in spurts," Patterson said. "She would step up in big situations and take big shots, and then five minutes later she would make a poor decision on the offensive end or be a beat slow on the defensive end."

Finkes accounted for five of the team's 17 turnovers, which is something Patterson pointed out as something that needs to change.

"I liked her offensive production, but we need to work on cutting down her turnovers," Patterson said.

If Finkes' game had its highs and lows, she ended on a high note. With the Cats leading by 10 points and 42 seconds left on the clock, Finkes launched a pass over the Colorado defense to senior guard Brit Jacobson. She made the layup to put an exclamation point on the 64-52 victory.

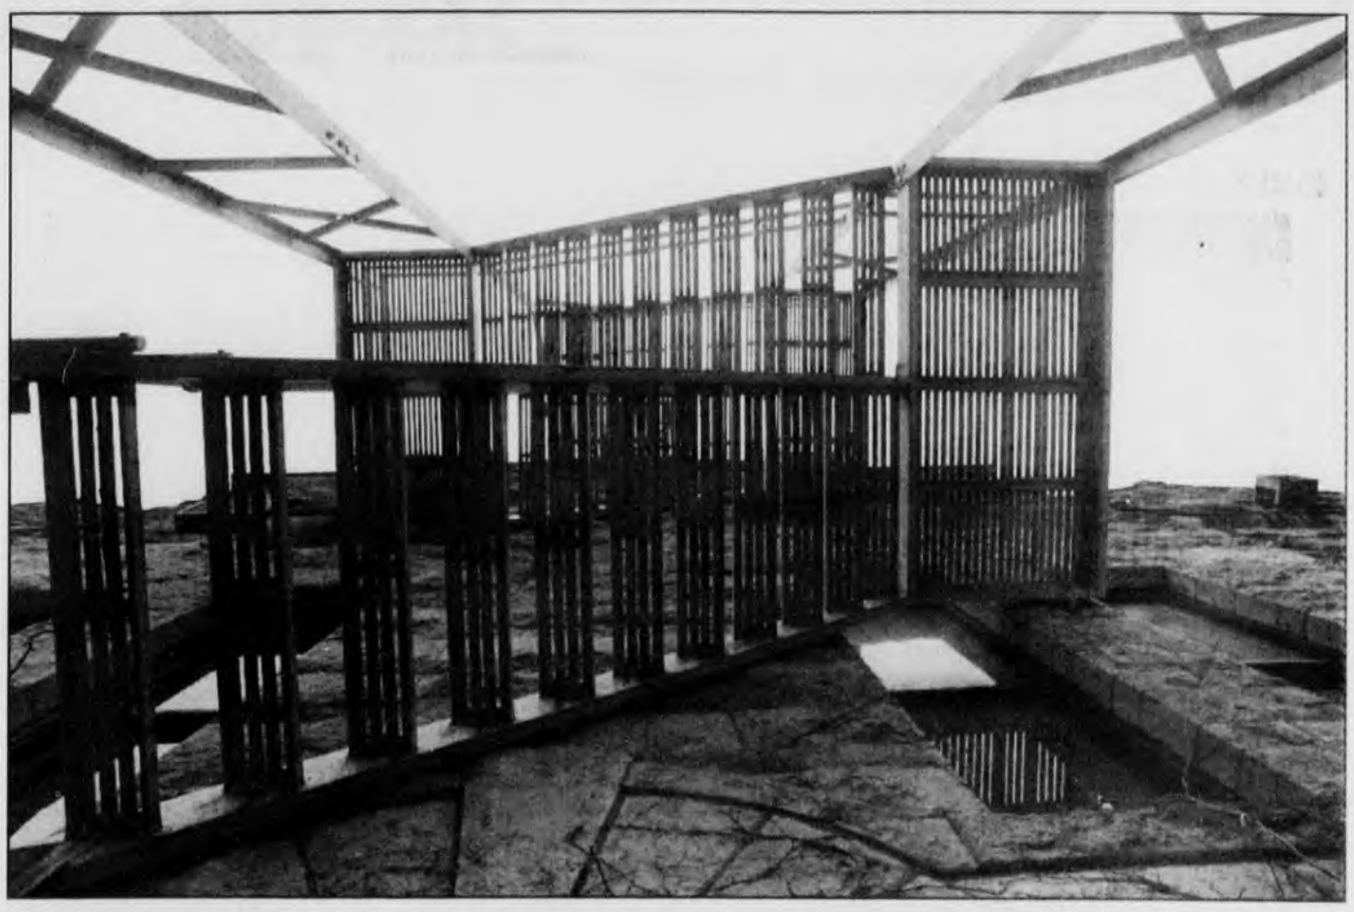
Humans aren't built with eyes on the top of their heads.

Every day, we walk across campus watching where we are going.

Left, right, left.

Watching in front, but never really looking at our environment.

The Collegian photo staff spent one hour Wednesday shooting pictures readers wouldn't normally see in the paper.



For the photographers, it's a chance to get something different in the paper.

For the readers, it's a chance to see some element of life at K-State in a new perspective.

This time, the new perspective is what's overhead. Each photographer's camera was pointed skyward. There is order in places one might never guess, simply because it would cause a stiff neck to look.

The photo staff would like to invite readers of the Collegian to investigate their environment every day. We offer these photo pages periodically as an inspiration for your own vision.

Artist puzzles Manhattan art scene

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Margo Kren's paintings, which she painted during a 1997 sabbatical, will be on display at the Union art gallery until Friday.

IVAN KOZAR
Collegian

The painter Margo Kren has always been somewhat of a puzzle in the local arts scene.

At one time she can be discussing her work or that of another artist and then almost immediately change course and talk about something deeper or surprisingly extraordinary. If you've had a conversation with Kren, you can see in her fabulous expressions, her way of thinking visually, how she develops her thoughts into statements — sometimes profound and other times mysteriously personal.

Some of this puzzle becomes a bit more concrete and discernible in her recent paintings, now on view in the Union art gallery until Friday. If anything, you'll walk away thinking the past two weeks haven't been enough time to really know these complex paintings the artist, a professor of art, developed during a 1997 sabbatical.

The majority of the paintings draw from Kren's travels throughout the islands of Greece. It was there she discovered chapel boxes, small architectural constructions housing memories and personal belongings of dead people. This basis allows the artist to explore both time and memory.

"One minute you could see ruins of the past and then chapel boxes," Kren said, describing her experiences in Greece. "After a while, they start merging. They are meant to be enigmatic."

A painting like "Chapel Box — Korinthos" is representative of Kren's approach: a constantly changing perspective, juxtapositions of both contemporary and ancient art and crafts, a wild use of acidic colors and an underlying texture. Kren likes to shift colors, as she says, meaning to slightly knock them off from their truer tone. She then plays against this with other colors, causing a tense color play in each work.

The texture — sometimes simply dots, other times a geometry of circular forms — owes to the old paintings the artist has painted over.

"It disrupts what you are seeing," Kren said. "It becomes irritating. I wanted the past and the present to come together, though they are not totally coming together. They are struggling."

Also merging in her work are the realms of abstraction and realism. There's a brutality and raw humanity to these works that recall the best of realism, but it's swirled up into an almost kinetic abstraction, a slight reduction of forms to mere areas of color.

This is found in "Chapel Box — Kalamata," a painting with such rich patches of ripe color blanketing the canvas behind a triptych chapel box that comparisons to a Tahitian landscape by Gauguin are no stretch.

It's no wonder the artist has quoted Van Gogh and Cezanne in a recent artist's statement, for her love of Impressionist perspective, color and line are evident.

There is also a spirituality underpinning Kren's work, although she says she is not a member of any organized religion. But how does an artist tackle the subject of life and death without believing in something more than the earthbound?

"I look at my work, and it tells me what it wants to be," Kren said. "It's like life. It's always being adjusted. Now that I'm 58, I'm working for the end of my life, and I'm working toward a final glorious finish. Life is traumatic and dramatic, at least I make it.

"Death is like snow. One minute it's there, and then it's gone. That's the most frightening aspect of it. All of a sudden, all of the great requiems make sense."

Kren is not a gloomy person and neither are her paintings. Even the somewhat harrowing cycle of four paintings depicting a bird going through the stages of life isn't gloomy. Although the final installment, "In the End," can be painful to face.

But as Kren has matured, so has her schedule. She's had a recent show in Kunming, Yunnan, in China and a 1995 show in South Africa, as well as countless regional shows in places such as Missouri, Nebraska, South Carolina and Oregon. She occasionally shows locally at Strecker Gallery.

It's understandable that an artist who is herself somewhat of an enigma would naturally be drawn to painting on screens. "Vestment," a finely crafted screen with a rounded top, seems to take Kren's abstraction to its highest level with atmospheric color incorporating the underlying wood.

"I think it's the sense of something behind them," Kren said. "The sense of secrets or something hidden. It lends itself to fields of fantasy for me."

For Kren, this recent work represents a departure from her earlier approach. The scale is larger, color is grander and she's attempted three-dimensional work, at least in taking paintings off the wall and onto a screen.

"Before I played very safe, one could feel very comfortable — too comfortable," Kren said. "I went beyond what I already knew. I needed to reach beyond."

Sometimes, especially in Kren's case, you have to go beyond what you know to reach a new point of discovery, to reveal what you've always suspected but never had nerve enough to realize. And sometimes it can be a brilliant thing.

▶ Schedule:
A show of paintings by Margo Kren will be in the Union art gallery until Friday. Gallery hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday. Admission is free.

Bands to play in Union Courtyard during noon hour

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

The Union Program Council is planning to bring local bands to play during the noon hour in the Union Courtyard to entertain those passing through the K-State Student Union.

"It's a thing that UPC started to give students something to do when they're here getting lunch or whatever. It's free. You just show up and sit in the courtyard and watch the bands," UPC program adviser Paul Donovan said.

The UPC Special Events committee has booked the bands, while the Eclectic Entertainment committee is setting up talent shows for days when bands aren't playing, Donovan said.

He said Union Director Bernard Pitts requested UPC do something to liven up the lunch hour in the Union. This is also the first time UPC has done an organized program of bands playing during the day.

"Every now and then, we've had bands and stuff down there, but this is the first time we're trying to do an organized program," Donovan said.

He said that after Pitts requested UPC's help, each committee contributed ideas with what they could provide.

"Each committee just decided whatever they could do, and bands are something that's easy to do and that the Special Events committee has done before, so they decided to do that, and then Eclectic came up with the talent show idea also," he said.

Each band will play from noon to 1 p.m. on Wednesdays and Thursdays through at least mid-April.

Most of the bands scheduled to perform are bands that have played for UPC before, Donovan said.

"Some gave us a demo, and we did all of our judging on whether or not they would be a good band to play in the Courtyard off their tapes," UPC President Mike Hodgson said.

Many different genres of music will be touched upon during the performances, Hodgson said.

"We're going to have a variety of different bands. We have R&B, country, pop and alternative covers. We try and hit all the major genres. It just varies by the week, really," he said.

Donovan said he hopes for a bigger turnout during the day than UPC would expect for an evening performance in Union Station or Forum Hall.

"The Courtyard is good to catch people that don't know about it. It's not nearly as formal as some of our evening performances, which is what we wanted for the semester, is to do something informal, spur-of-the-moment," he said.

Plans are for the bands to remain in the Courtyard all semester and not move outside once the weather improves.

Lunchtime music

The Union Program Council is bringing free entertainment to the Union Courtyard from noon to 1 p.m. on Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Odd family tradition surprises new roommate

CASSANDRA DUVERAUX
Kansas State Collegian

Dear Cassie,

I can remember a time in semesters long ago when you would give advice to students in outrageous situations. It seemed there was no problem too strange or deviant for you to address. So when I found myself in a crazy situation this semester, I knew you were the only person to whom I could turn.

You see, I just had a new roommate move in for the spring semester. He is a nice guy and would be very easy to live with if it weren't for one particular habit: He likes to cook in the nude.

You can imagine my surprise when I awoke for class on the first day and found my new roomie preparing fluffy pancakes and freshly squeezed orange juice completely naked. I confronted him about this, and he said it is just something his family has always done. You can imagine my concern when he added his family will be coming up this weekend with a new outdoor grill for my Super Bowl party.

Please, Cassie, tell me what to do about this. I need your help!

Signed,
Them Buns are Gettin' Stale

Dear Stale Buns,

Thanks for your undying faith in my abilities. I am excited about climbing back into the saddle and am looking forward to the semester.

My congratulations on finding a roommate whose only peculiarity is nudity. Cassie has heard of much worse problems with roomies involving bodily fluids and socks. But I digress, if the guy is a good cook, who cares if he wears a frilly apron, cowboy hat or his birthday suit? Freshly squeezed orange juice is hard to come by in these parts during the winter months. Do, however, as a matter of kindness, suggest to him that he not fry bacon naked.

On the bright side, maybe he has sisters with similar habits. As for the rest of his family, don't be too quick to judge. I'm sure your family has some unusual habits as well. Maybe this is his family's way of celebrating the satisfying experience of eating. Besides, it's free food. If they're bringing the meat and the grill, put on a well-placed oven mitt and feast away.

Media racism discussed

Abdulhaqq said.

"Media don't always take minorities seriously," Kelley said, adding that the situation might have gone differently if Brawley were a different race. Kelley continued to say the public's perception is that all black males are dangerous and the media play upon that.

The panel also discussed the effect media have on public consciousness.

"A trend that I see within journalism is to pay less attention to the first African-American to do something. Barriers are coming down," Johnson said.

The group talked about how journalists need to be more aware of how a story looks through readers' eyes.

Journalists should look at a story as more than news, to view it the way different audience members will, Johnson said. Sensitivity might be lost in the rush to get the news, he said.

"Everyone wants to get the story out. We have lost a lot as far as accuracy is concerned and real news," Tippin said.

Kelley said he agreed. "As journalists we have to be really responsible and present just the facts. A lot of time we don't do that."

Panel members suggested ways to change how journalists view stories, to make them see the personal side.

"It is important to have a diverse newsroom so that you don't upset any certain group," Kelley said. A required class for journalism majors at Missouri is a cross-cultural journalism course, to prepare journalists to be more sensitive to other cultures when covering stories, he said.

Although change is occurring in the media, the group discussed how much improvement, if any, is taking place.

Kelley said newsrooms are making a conscious effort — they're talking. But they still run into stereotypical problems. Journalists might be missing a frame of reference into culture, he said.

"The more coverage devoted to a subject there is more risk of a mistake. They're going to be accused of ignorance. I hope that we're making progress," Johnson said.

Regents to decide on expansion more than $17 million. With interest, he estimated payments could be about $1.6 million per year, depending on the final interest rate.

Ratzloff said the lack of a student fee as part of the project's funding could cause a slightly higher interest rate on the bond. The fee provided a stable source of funds to pay off the loan, while seat license sales aren't quite as reliable. The difference, though, should be between 0.2 and 0.5 percent, he said.

"It puts them in a little bit worse situation in terms of security, but I don't think it puts anything out of reach," Ratzloff said. "I don't think it's enough to affect our bond rating at all, and that's what's really going to determine our interest rate."

Though KSU Stadium's capacity might be on the rise, students won't see any change in the number of seats they're guaranteed for each home game.

Students are guaranteed 7,500 tickets for home games. Had students approved the creation of a stadium expansion privilege fee in the November referendum vote, that number could have risen to 9,000 or 10,000.

In recent seasons, the department has sold more than 9,000 season tickets to students — more than 1,500 above the guaranteed rate.

But Urick said the referendum results indicated that students didn't want to be involved in the expansion process.

"The vote was simply to indicate whether students would participate in stadium expansion and to what degree they would," Urick said.

Krause said students shouldn't worry that seats will be cut.

"In my conversations with Max (Urick), there is every intent to try to accommodate as many students in the future as have been in the past," he said.

Urick said no decisions about student ticket numbers had been made.

Kaczynski admits he is Unabomber, gets life in prison

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Theodore Kaczynski admitted Thursday he is the anti-technology terrorist known as the Unabomber, pleading guilty in a deal with the government that will send him to prison for life.

The 55-year-old mathematics professor turned woodland hermit entered the plea in a mid-afternoon hearing, on the day a jury was to be sworn in and opening statements were to begin.

The agreement avoids the possibility of his execution. Had the jury convicted Kaczynski, he could have faced death by injection.

His motivations and that of the government were oddly aligned. Judged by a prison psychiatrist to be paranoid schizophrenic, Kaczynski did not want to be portrayed in court as mentally ill. Prosecutors, meanwhile, clearly did not want to be perceived as trying to execute a mentally ill man.

A senior federal official in Washington, D.C., said a report submitted only days ago by a federal Bureau of Prisons psychiatrist was the decisive factor.

Dr. Sally Johnson concluded that Kaczynski was competent to stand trial but suffered from paranoid schizophrenia, an illness marked by delusions and a potential for violence.

The agreement resolves all federal charges against Kaczynski growing out of the 17-year string of bombings that killed three people — two in the Sacramento area and one in New Jersey — and injured 29.

A plea bargain had been discussed for months, but was repeatedly turned down by the government because Kaczynski insisted on certain conditions. At the last minute, his lawyers dropped all demands.

As Kaczynski entered his plea, details of his crimes were revealed for the first time. In a journal entry discussing the first fatal attack — that of Sacramento computer store owner Hugh Scrutton in 1985 — Kaczynski wrote: "Excellent. A humane way of eliminating somebody. He probably didn't feel a thing."

Noting that a $25,000 reward had been placed on his head after that attack, Kaczynski called it "flattering."

After admitting to all of the charged offenses, Kaczynski then admitted his role in Unabomber attacks in which he had not been charged.

Kaczynski was arrested in April 1996 outside Lincoln, Mont., where he lived in a 13-by-13-foot cabin crammed with journals, diaries and a completed bomb ready to be sent out.

When he was brought in from the wilderness, a wild-haired, unkempt recluse, he bore little resemblance to the clean-shaven mathematics professor at the University of California at Berkeley.

A profile soon emerged of a boy genius sent to Harvard at the age of 16, who succeeded at math but failed to socialize with his classmates or function within society.

He walked away from Berkeley in 1969, quitting a tenure-track position to build his cabin, where he lived without running water or electricity for more than 20 years.

At one point, the Unabomber was able to force newspapers to print his 35,000-word manifesto, a creed denouncing the rise of technology and destruction of the environment.

Regents approve KSU Stadium expansion plan

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents approved the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' proposal for a $12.8 million expansion of KSU Stadium on Thursday, after assurances from Athletic Director Max Urick that K-State students won't lose seats as part of the project.

Regents approved the architectural program, which will add 7,000 seats to the stadium and expand the Dev Nelson Press Box in time for the 1999 season. The expansion will create a total of 46,074 permanent seats.

URICK

Thursday's approval set the expansion plan in motion. According to athletic department documents, an architect should be selected by April, and construction should begin after the 1998 football season.

After a short presentation from Urick, board members' questions focused on student ticket numbers.

Last fall, students rejected an athletic department proposal that would have created a student privilege fee to pay for about one-third of the expansion. The privilege fee would have boosted the number of guaranteed student seats from the current 7,500 to 9,000 or 10,000.

After the privilege fee referendum failed, Urick said the students' vote indicated 7,500 seats was enough.

"Evidently, the students believe that 7,500 seats are adequate, so based on that, we'll plan accordingly," he said.

In recent seasons, students have purchased more than 9,000 season tickets — at least 1,500 more than the guaranteed amount. But after the referendum, Urick said it was a possibility the department would only sell the 7,500 guaranteed student seats.

"We'll always meet our 7,500-seat guarantee to students, but after that we'll respond to public demand," he said.

Regents heard a different story. Urick said the department

Clinton denies allegations of sexual misconduct

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Facing the public for the first time since beginning an investigation of an alleged presidential affair and cover-up, Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr pledged Thursday to move as swiftly as possible and said he was not motivated by politics.

"Our job is to gather facts and to evaluate those facts and to get at the truth," Starr said, pointedly dismissing the suggestion he was a Republican out to hurt President Clinton.

Clinton huddled with his legal advisers Thurday to discuss Starr's subpoena demanding documents about the alleged affair.

During a subsequent photo session with reporters, he emphatically denied he had an affair with 24-year-old White House intern Monica Lewinsky and later asked her to lie about it. He also promised a fuller accounting of his relationship with the young woman.

"There are a lot of other questions that are, I think, very legitimate," Clinton said. "You have a right to ask them, and you and the American people have a right to get answers.

"We will give you as many answers as we can, as soon as we can, at the appropriate time, consistent with our obligation to also cooperate with the investigation."

Sources said that in a subpoena delivered to the White House on Wednesday, Starr sought documents showing when Lewinsky entered and departed the White House.

"There's not a room in the White House that's called 'the Truth Room' where you can go unlock the door and it's all sitting there," McCurry said. "Everybody is working hard to answer these questions."

Officials told the Associated Press that there were records of several visits by Lewinsky to the Oval Office after she had left her White House job for a position at the Pentagon last year. Most times she checked in to see Clinton's personal secretary, Betty Currie, who was a friend, they said.

CLINTON

Individuals also said that in his sworn deposition on the Jones case last weekend, Clinton denied a sexual relationship with the woman but acknowledged giving her some gifts.

Officials also said longtime presidential confidant Vernon Jordan arranged a job offer for the intern and U.N. Ambassador Bill Richardson, at the request of the White House, offered Lewinsky a job around the time she was being asked to testify in the Jones case.

Cosmetic company Revlon disclosed that Jordan, who is a member of the company's board, referred Lewinsky for a public affairs job at a Revlon affiliate.

She was interviewed over the past two months and offered a job. That offer was rescinded Wednesday.

K-State students reflect on work in Washington

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

National media have focused this week on allegations that 24-year-old Monica Lewinsky, who worked as an unpaid White House intern with then-Chief of Staff Leon Panetta until getting a permanent job in the White House legislative affairs office, might have had an affair with President Clinton in the White House.

These allegations bring publicity to the small business of political internships.

Newsweek magazine, in a rare Internet-exclusive report, published that Lewinsky engaged in the affair and then began to tell everything about her relationship with Clinton to co-worker Linda Tripp. The report also alleges Clinton, working through a lawyer, tried to pressure Lewinsky to keep quiet about the affair.

In summer 1993, Steffany Carrel, now a senior in public relations and an account executive at NorthStar Marketing Group in Kansas City, Mo., worked as an unpaid White House intern in the office of presidential correspondence for then-Chief of Staff Thomas "Mack" McLarty.

Carrel said her job provided only minimal security clearances and that she worked next door to the White House in the Old Executive Office Building.

"It's possible policy might have changed, but not many interns worked in the White House itself," Carrel said. "The majority are in the Old Executive Office Building."

Union targets late April for start of renovations

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State Student Union renovations originally scheduled to begin by last summer won't start until at least the end of April, Union Director Bernard Pitts said Thursday.

During a speech to Manhattan Chamber of Commerce members, Pitts said a general contractor for the project should be found by the end of March.

According to a September 1996 Collegian article, a contractor was originally scheduled to be found by early 1997.

"We are hoping to have a contractor by the end of March or first of April," Pitts said. "And we should be actually seeing construction around the Union at the end of April or first of May."

Pitts told Chamber members construction should last about two years.

Work will begin with the Union Food Court, Pitts said, which will replace the current Union Stateroom's design. Other improvements part of the $11.5 million renovation project include changes to the K-State Union Bookstore, Copy Center, Commerce Bank and improvements in Forum Hall.

The large scale of the project will mean setting up temporary locations for many services while their area of the Union is completed.

"We're going to need to play musical chairs with the general contractor to still provide services to campus," Pitts said.

The Union has also ended its search for a nationally recognized hamburger chain for the Union Food Court. Pitts said Burger King should move in as part of the expansion.

"We're currently negotiating the finer points with Burger King to be our national hamburger concept," he said.

An assistant in Pitts' office said earlier this week that more details about the construction process and a rough time line could be available after a Feb. 6 meeting with potential contractors.

Pitts' speech was part of a monthly Chamber of Commerce breakfast meeting at Manhattan Town Center. He told those in attendance that Union renovations will help it remain the center of the K-State campus.

"When we're finished, we hope to have one of the premier unions in the country," he said, "and we will certainly be able to provide for campus needs going into the year 2000."

Microsoft reaches settlement on Windows 95, avoids contempt charge, $1 million-a-day fine

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Seeking to avoid contempt of court charges, Microsoft Corp. agreed Thursday to let computer makers temporarily offer its latest version of Windows 95 without easy access to its Internet Explorer software.

By entering into the settlement with the Justice Department, Microsoft avoided the possibility of being hit with a $1 million-a-day fine by the court. The settlement represented only a temporary victory for the Justice Department, as the broader dispute in its antitrust case remains pending in court.

The government lawsuit, filed in October, seeks to prevent Microsoft from requiring computer makers to preinstall Internet Explorer as a condition of licensing Windows 95, the software that handles basic operations on personal computers and enjoys more than an 80-percent share of the market.

The government contends Microsoft is using its near monopoly in Windows to muscle into the Internet browser market, thereby damaging rival Netscape Communications Corp. Browsers enable people to view and download information from the Internet.

Under the agreement, Microsoft agreed to let computer makers install Windows 95 but delete the Internet Explorer icons — the pictures that launch a program with a click of a computer mouse — from the computer's desktop or opening screen.

Pope has misgivings on Cuba's abortion access, lack of support for quality Catholic education

SANTA CLARA, Cuba — On his first full day in Cuba, Pope John Paul II went straight to the hearts and home life of the Cuban people, despairing about the island's easy access to abortion and scolding the Castro government for closing the doors to Catholic education.

When it comes to schools, parents should be able to choose, the pope declared, to applause from tens of thousands assembled for Mass in the dust and sweltering heat of an athletic field in this provincial city.

In just two addresses in less than 24 hours, on the first papal visit ever to this Caribbean nation, the pontiff has been blunt in listing what he considers failings — along with accomplishments — of Cuba's communist system.

What the curious saw Thursday was an outpouring of deep emotion and affection for the 77-year-old pontiff after he flew in for a half-day in this heartland city.

"We feel it! We feel it! The pope is here among us!" the crowd chanted as the "popemobile," a white pickup truck topped by a bulletproof-glass compartment, wended its way toward the open-air altar.

Ex-Christian Coalition finance official receives 6-year suspended sentence for embezzlement

CHESAPEAKE, Va. — The former top finance official at the Christian Coalition, who admitted embezzling more than $40,000, was given a suspended six-year prison sentence Thursday and ordered to repay the money.

Circuit Court Judge S. Bernard Goodwyn also placed Jeanne DelliCarpini under supervised probation.

"I don't have an excuse," a tearful DelliCarpini said to the judge before she was sentenced. "What I did was wrong."

She pleaded guilty in September to one count of embezzlement. She testified Thursday that she took the money because she was in an abusive marriage and her husband pressured her to pay off their credit card debt.

DelliCarpini, 43, said she wrote eight checks totaling $40,346.27 from coalition accounts between Nov. 29, 1996, and March 31, 1997.

In April 1997, she said she told coalition officials about the checks and that she intended to repay the money.

Both sides of abortion debate find diverse ways to mark anniversary of Supreme Court ruling

TOPEKA — Silver keys, plastic models of fetuses and lively news conferences were part of the Statehouse hubbub that marked the 25th anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion.

The first two floors of the Statehouse swarmed with children — some of them in strollers — who were part of a field trip by a home-school group. Later, the children were to take part in a "Rally for Life" at the Statehouse.

Displays were plentiful and, besides abortion, covered subjects ranging from organic farms to sex education.

Silver-colored keys were worn by members of the Kansas Choice Alliance, while nametags worn by pro-life activists carried the stamp of tiny feet. One explained that the feet, about half an inch long, were the size of a fetus' at 10 weeks.

Lawmakers on both sides of the issues told news conferences the pro-life movement was chipping away at women's right to abortion.

"People say we're taking half measures and baby steps, and that's true," Rep. Tim Carmody, R-Overland Park, said. "That's all we can take."

Salina murder trial moved to Shawnee County; Justice cites public's awareness of the killings

TOPEKA — The capital murder trial of a man accused of killing a boy, his grandmother and great-grandmother in Saline County last year will be in Shawnee County.

The state Supreme Court made public Thursday the order by Justice Edward Larson, who oversees state courts in the 28th Judicial District, which includes Saline County. Larson issued the order Wednesday.

Alan Eugene White, 27, is charged in the bludgeoning deaths of Dolores McKim, 80, of Salina; her daughter, Carol Abercrombie, 56, of Soddy-Daisy, Tenn.; and Abercrombie's grandson, Christopher Abercrombie, 5, who was visiting from Greenville, N.C.

Saline County District Judge Dan Boyer granted the change of venue in December. The trial is scheduled to start in April.

Boyer ruled that the public's awareness of the killings, as well as subsequent proceedings against White, jeopardized his right to a fair trial in Saline County.

White could be sentenced to death by lethal injection. He will be represented by the state's Death Penalty Defense Unit.

One of the murder counts stems from the rape of Abercrombie, and White is also charged with burglary and theft as well as rape.

White had been a member, along with McKim's late husband, of the Central Kansas Amateur Radio Club of Salina.

The slayings at the McKim home in east Salina neighborhood attracted considerable attention, including that of Gov. Bill Graves, whose parents live across the street. The governor offered state reward money for information leading to a conviction.

White was arrested in November in a Boston homeless shelter after he was featured on Fox Network's "America's Most Wanted" program.

Senate approves 2nd cut in privilege fees

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

Student senators approved this year's second cut in student privilege fees at their Thursday night meeting.

With a 46-6 vote, Senate approved a $45,077 cut in the Intercollegiate Athletic Council Privilege Fee, funding it at $453,774 for the next two fiscal years. That means a net loss of $63,000 for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Sports Club Council, which also receives its funding through the athletic fee, will keep its annual $48,079 from fees.

The K-State Marching Band, which has also been funded with money from the athletic fee, was deleted from the new fee agreement. Legislation pending in Senate could create a separate fee for the band and increase its funding to $102,138 per year — an $18,000 increase from previous years.

The $18,000 increase was funded with part of the $63,000 athletics cut.

As a provision of the bill, the athletic department can no longer use student fee money for football or men's basketball. Citing increased football and basketball successes, senators said student fee money should be used to pay for sports that can't support themselves instead of those that generate their own revenue.

Athletic Department Business Manager Bob Cavello said any cut in the department's budget would be detrimental.

"Being that we run solely and primarily on self-generated revenue, any sources of funds that are reduced are a step back for the athletic department," Cavello said.

The $63,000 cut in athletic fee revenues was small compared to others proposed by senators during the meeting.

One amendment contained a $263,000 loss for the athletic department.

Education Senator Jamie Wetig, who sponsored the amendment, said it was time for the athletic department to fund its own operation without student fees.

"Athletics should be run by themselves," Wetig said. "I didn't come to Kansas because of the football team or basketball team. I came because I wanted an education. This is a place for higher education, not for sports.

"I believe it's time for Student Senate to make a bold statement about athletic fees."

Other senators who argued for the amendment said the athletic department would make up the loss with revenue from football and basketball.

Arts and Sciences Senator Mandy Reese, who debated against the amendment, said that wouldn't happen.

"I think you've got a pretty great idea of the people up there in high power if you think that they're going to just keep that cost," she said. "That's not how it works."

Governmental Relations Chair Patrick Carney said he thought the department could trim costs in other areas in order to fund the non-revenue sports at their current level.

"This is an area where I believe a certain amount of fat can be trimmed and reallocated to an area that's just living off pure bone," he said.

The amendment failed 9-40.

K-State home page to undergo reconstruction

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State World Wide Web page is undergoing renovation.

Neil Erdwien, application support specialist for Computing and Network Services, said that every two years the design of the K-State home page has changed.

"The home page receives 140,000 hits a day and the reason for change is to make things easier to find," Erdwien said.

Vice Provost for K-State and for Academic Services Beth Unger formed the Webmaster Committee to work on a new design for the home page. Unger said committee members were appointed based on their interest in the Web and their talent.

The home page now has 12 information categories. Erdwien said it can be difficult to find specific information because the user can't tell what subcategories are under them.

"The new page will lead the user to information directly because it has more visible categories," Erdwien said.

The proposed Web page will have eight categories with 32 subcategories, a quick search, four directories and the date.

Erdwien said if users wanted to find information about the K-State Student Union on the current page, they would have to spend time searching for it. On the proposed page, users could see the subcategory "student union," under "service and support," the main category.

Jeff Dougan, Student Senate chair and Webmaster Committee member, said he spends too much time looking for specific topics, and with the proposed page it will only take a few seconds.

"We looked at access statistics, and the popular features deserve to be promoted to the home page," Erdwien said.

Erdwien said other features on the proposed page are directories that list subjects in alphabetical order. CNS statistics show the people directory is accessed the most.

"The people directory on the page is like the white pages of a phonebook. The user types in a name and the information comes up," Erdwien said.

He said the Webmaster committee proposed changes based on Big 12 universities' Web sites.

"We looked at all Big 12 schools, and there is an amazing diversity," Erdwien said. "All the structures are entirely different."

Erdwien presented the proposal at a Senate meeting and didn't receive any responses. He said he thinks there is nothing wrong with the proposed Web page and maybe that is why students have not made comments.

Dougan said he didn't see any problems with the proposed page.

"I think that it is a much better-organized Web page," Dougan said.

Webmaster Committee members include Unger, Erdwien, Dougan, Janelle Esau, a computer information specialist for CNS; George Brandsberg, editor and information technologies in the department of agriculture communications; Elizabeth Edwards, assistant specialist for CNS; Sharon Morrow, director of university publications; and Pat Bosco, associate vice president of institutional advancement and dean of student life.

The only cost for the proposed Web page is time.

"There are no out-of-pocket costs for the students. We are just spending the time to do it," Erdwien said.

Unger said the proposed page is to be in effect soon. She said the committee is shooting for spring break because installation needs to be at a time where the change will not interrupt university business.

"We want the new Web page as soon as possible, but we want to make sure everyone agrees this will be a positive change," Unger said.

Erdwien said there is still work to be done. He said CNS still has to create the information for the subcategories.

"This is definitely work in progress and nothing is concrete yet," Erdwien said.

Speech team moves closer to tournament

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

As time ticks closer and closer to the national speech tournament in April, the K-State speech squad has won three tournaments in the past two weekends.

On Jan. 13, the team beat George Mason University by 49 points, taking home the first-place trophy from the Cornhusker Invitational at the University of Nebraska.

On Jan. 17 and 18, the team went to Moorhead State University and Concordia College in Moorhead, S.D., and Fargo, S.D., for a swing tournament where the Cats defeated the University of Wisconsin-Eau Claire in both tourneys.

Intercollegiate Speech Instructor Craig Brown said he was pleased to have done that well especially in back-to-back weekends.

"Before the Nebraska tournament we had gone to some that were pretty tough, and we did OK, but not super," he said. "At Nebraska we had a lot of people out and a lot of different people broke (into final rounds), and it was against some good competition. George Mason is on the East Coast and were in the top 10 at nationals last year, and Hastings College, which got third, is usually pretty tough as well."

Defeating George Mason, a college in Washington, D.C., was similar to the K-State team defeating itself, Brown said.

He said that three of the coaches at the East Coast school are from K-State. George Mason's head coach Jim Kimball received his master's degree from K-State and assistants Tim Schultz and Sara Hessenflow both competed on Brown's team during their undergraduate years at K-State.

"Jim likes to call them the K-State of the east, but I think they came to the Midwest to take a shot at some of the better teams in the nation. That includes us as well as Hastings and even Nebraska Wesleyan," Brown said.

Leading the way for the K-State team at the swing tournament were sophomore Chris Piatt and senior Christina Foust. Piatt medaled in six events in the two tournaments.

"Chris is just a sophomore, and he really stepped up against some tough competition," Brown said.

Foust also did well and became the person to qualify fastest for six events at national competition in the history of K-State. She placed in the top six in 10 events during the weekend.

"The past two weeks have been pretty good to us," Foust said. "We didn't lose concentration after break, and we have freshmen who are breaking finals for us and we just are really coming together."

The team goes back on the road this weekend for a smaller tournament at Concordia College in Seward, Neb.

Stadium plan example of administration priorities

It's impressive to see what President Jon Wefald and Department of Intercollegiate Athletics Director Max Urick can accomplish when they make one project a priority.

Less than three months after the athletic department asked students to fund one-third of the expansion cost of KSU Stadium through the creation of a privilege fee, Wefald and Urick submitted a trimmed-down proposal to the Kansas Board of Regents.

Wefald, standing in front of the regents Thursday, even used the word "conservative" and expressed a concern for an expansion K-State "could afford."

Urick should be commended for returning to the drawing board. He not only cut the project by $2 million but found a way to keep the 7,000 proposed new seats without a student privilege fee or increase in ticket prices.

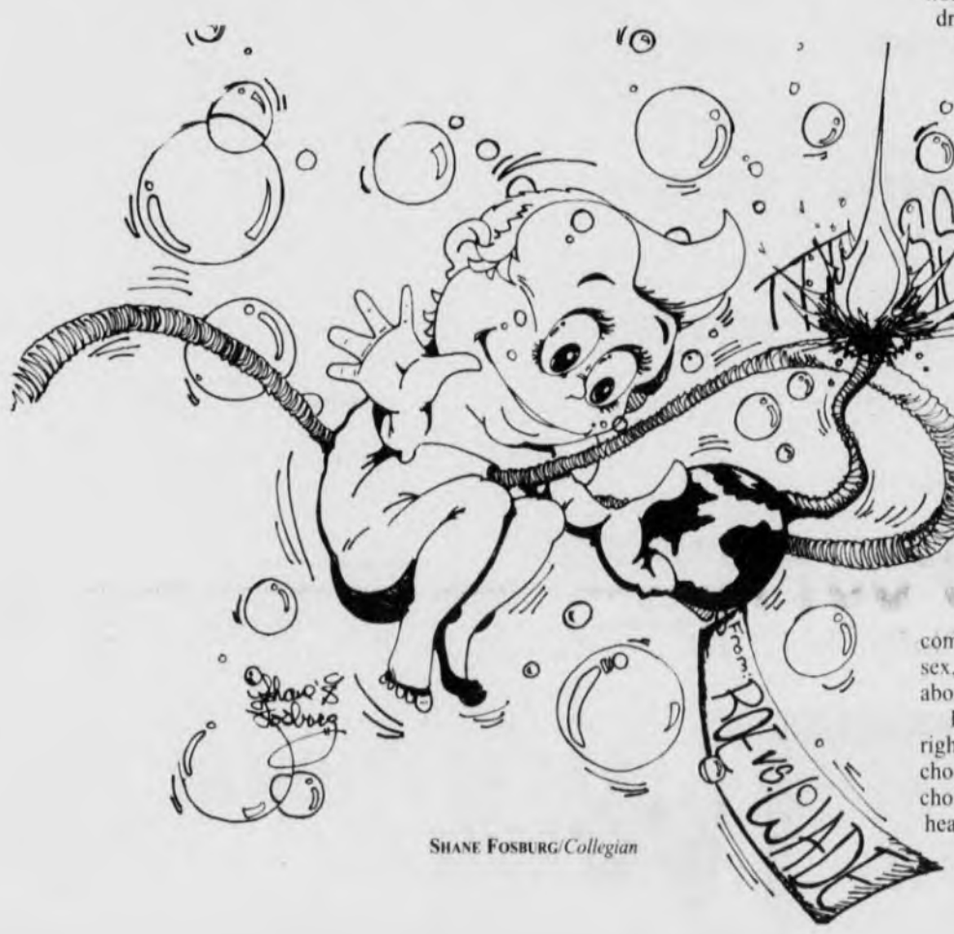
These revisions make the expansion more marketable for the regents. Why wasn't Urick this cost-effective when the money was coming out of student pockets?

Urick's commitment to use athletic revenue, primarily from luxury seating sold on five-year contracts, to pay off the expansion project is a great idea. Wasn't this the very thing he said he could not do?

Students have heard several stories about student seats. We hope this is the last one.

Thursday, Urick said the 7,500 guaranteed student seats will not be cut and went a step further to say he would try to accommodate additional ticket requests from students. Contrary to the strong-arm tactics that left the number of guaranteed student seats in flux during the referendum, this shows the athletic department's commitment to the student fans (and future alumni).

The proposal approved by the regents was smarter, leaner and still meets the needs of a thriving and successful football program.



Stadium expansion is not only speeding forward, but contrary to the vague framework for the K-State Student Union enhancement project and pleas for student support of a library fee to replace cut periodicals, a well-executed plan of action is under way.

remembering the PRECIOUS NATURE OF LIFE

SHANE FOSBURG/Collegian

January 22, 1973. Yesterday was the 25th anniversary of Roe vs. Wade. You've heard several sides of the argument. Here's mine.

Remember Betsy Ross, Daniel Boone, Benjamin Franklin, George "Babe" Ruth, Amelia Earhart, Neil Armstrong, Red Adair and Martin Luther King Jr.? We have a rich history with some incredibly gifted men and women who dared not to give up on their dreams and aspirations.

These are the people who make me proud to be an American. Overcoming the impossible. Doing what no one had ever done. Staring adversity in its face and never giving up. They are now our heroes because they were given a chance.

I'm glad their mothers chose life.

Twenty-five years. And now, 38-million legally murdered babies later, we stick out our chests and say, "Thank God for women's rights." Thirty-eight million. It makes me proud.

Yes, we as Americans have come a long way with our rights. We can have sex, make babies, and if they aren't convenient, abort them. Legally.

It makes me proud to know women have the right to do with their own bodies what they choose. However, I am not as brilliant as pro-choice supporters who define two separate heartbeats, possibly two separate blood types and sexes, two very distinct brain waves, different organs and even different fingerprints as being one person. Pardon my ignorance, but I thought a doctor determines a patient dead when brain waves halt?

You know the problem, don't you? Abortion is OK as long as it is not a life. But the moment it is established that we are dealing with a human being, the argument ceases to be arguable. I believe women have the right to do with their own bodies what they want, that is until it infringes upon the rights of another. It remains in my mind a brutality to kill the defenseless unborn — but maybe I'm old-fashioned.

SAM SACKETT

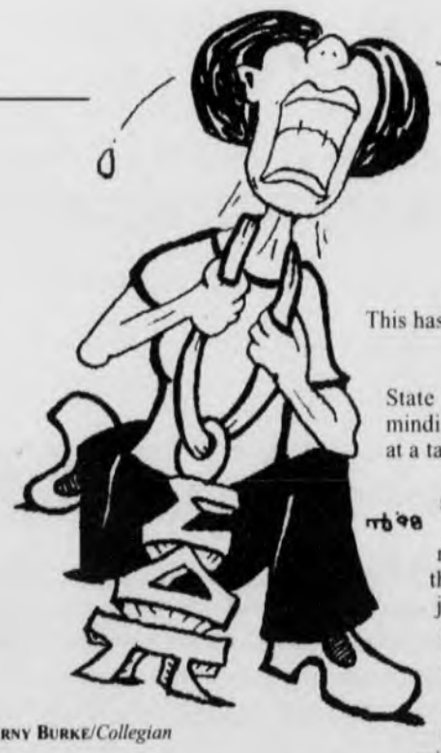
Sam is a sophomore in public relations. You can send e-mail to Sam at sjs8645@ksu.edu.

Have you ever seen those disgusting pictures pro-lifer's hold up on signs? Or have you seen the photos of the dismembered legs and tiny hands and detached heads and burned bodies of aborted babies in a trash can? If you don't know what I am talking about and if you haven't ever really seen and taken a good look at an aborted child, then be cautious. I wouldn't want you to see the evidence. You might become educated. Cold proof has a powerful way of refuting a false opinion.

I cannot get over how double-minded we have become. We have gone to great lengths to save a single life. Remember baby Jessica, the child who fell down the pipe? Remember the ribbons? The entire world waited in expectation as rescuers attempted to save her. We hear about incredible and rare births on television (the McCaughey septuplets). We celebrate when a child is born to parents who have waited so long to have a baby. We marvel at the gift of life.

Why do we marvel? Why are we amazed at the mystery of life? Because life is a gift so complex and beautiful that we cannot understand it. Doctors and physicians can delay death. They can lessen the pains of a woman on her deathbed. They can revive a man's beatless heart. They can detect signs of life. They can attempt to understand life. They can even take life (Dr. Jack Kevorkian).

But as much as we try, we cannot seem to appreciate this incredible gift.



This entire week we celebrated Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday. We were even excused from classes on Monday in honor of him. I think it is ironic that we celebrated his birth, yet more than 4,000 births were terminated Monday in the United States alone (one every 20 seconds).

In 1992, President Clinton lifted the ban on federally funded research for such things as fetal tissue transplantation — to say it gently, the removal of the fetal liquid, pancreas, brain substance. More recently, President Clinton has permitted partial birth abortions to remain legal. Will there ever be an end to this cruelty?

We have been given a divine gift. While we didn't choose to be born, we were given the chance.

Let us not withhold from another the gift of life we ourselves have not been denied the right to possess. Rather, let us do what we can to help those who have gone through the trauma of abortion, and let us work to bring back the sanctity of life.

This is dedicated to the 11 babies aborted in the few minutes it took you to read this article.

Lack of communal living skills would not add to idea of sisterhood

This has never happened to me before.

Never.

I'm walking through the K-State Student Union on Tuesday, minding my own business, when a girl at a table stops me.

"Hi. Are you in a sorority?" she asks.

At the same time, she hands me a piece of paper, telling of all the fun I would have if I would just join Sigma Sigma Sigma. I must offer my apologies to the girl for what I said.

"Uh, I don't think you'd really want me in your sorority," I said, then continued to mind my own business.

Apologies aside, it really is the truth. I have never considered myself a friend of the greek system, although my general disdain for the organization has abated somewhat since I've been at K-State. And my lack of communal-living skills and overall lack of tact would certainly not add to the "sisterhood."

Before those of you who call places with Greek letters home come at me with a can of hair spray and various Revlon products, let's set a few things straight. I will readily admit I had assumed everyone in the greek system figured they were decidedly better than the rest of their classmates. Then a friend of mine joined a sorority at the University of Kansas, something she didn't tell me until well into our freshman year. I realized that if Carrie liked it, I was going to have to accept it.

As I made friends here, I'd occasionally find out one of them lived in a fraternity or sorority, and they didn't fit the stereotype I had made for them at all. So, I quickly learned that not everyone in a greek house has the same hairstyle or holier-than-thou attitude. I also learned greek houses do charity work, too, which seemed to add an actual purpose to the organization.

That is the extent of any positive interaction I've had with the greek system. The rest of it I will never understand.

I've heard, from actual sorority members, Rush Week described as "hell," and as a time when you get really dressed up, go to various parties and act nice to everyone. Then, if a house likes you and you like them, you'll go back again.

Some sisterhood. I don't recall being told that pretending to be something you're not helps accrue quality comrades. Now, I realize this differs between houses, and each house attracts different types of people, but the process strikes me as a little Victorian. All that's missing are the corsets.

The reason many people join a house is to make friends. I suppose that's a legitimate reason, but think about it. Living in close quarters with several people necessitates the forging of friendships, whether or not a particular person is the right friend for you. That doesn't make for good relationships — it just makes living bearable for the time being. This isn't to say lasting friendships can't be built under the neon glow of Greek letters — who am I to dispute that?

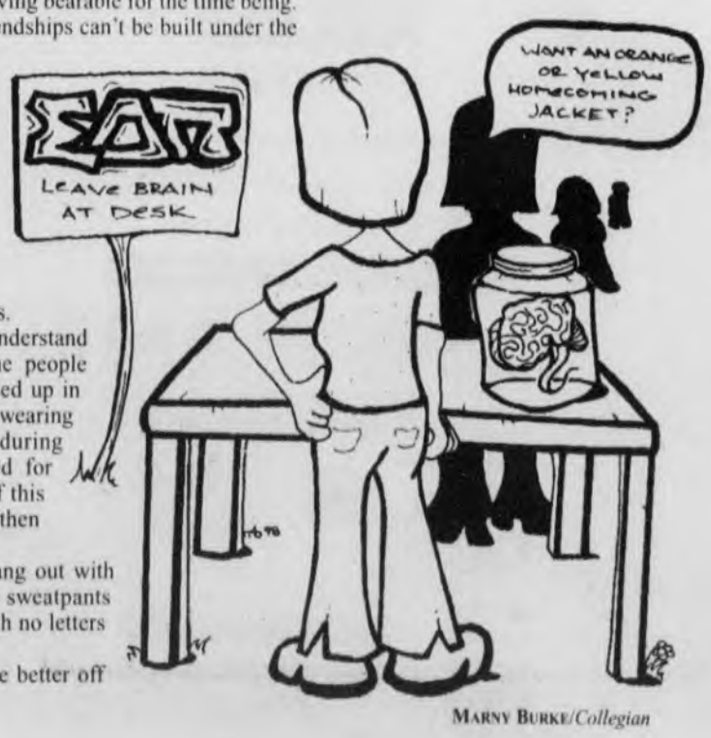
Then there's the whole Three Musketeer-ish mentality, the all-for-one thing. To the outsider, it seems as though when people join a house, they give up part of themselves in exchange for three letters.

Again, I certainly can understand that this is the route some people want to take. Getting dressed up in the middle of the week, wearing matching jackets during Homecoming, getting fined for not going to functions — if this is what some people want, then hooray for them.

As for me, I'd rather hang out with my roommate and wear sweatpants every Wednesday night, with no letters hanging over my head.



I think Tri Sigma will be better off without me.

Decision to move Macs a good one

Editor,

I would have to agree that the decision by Computing and Network Services to remove the Apple computers from the college computing labs is a smart choice. CNS has to spend its resources keeping hardware and software updated and running smoothly. It would be extremely difficult to justify the support of an expensive platform in a public lab for a group that is obviously a tiny minority. I could foresee continued public access to Macintosh computers resulting in additional lab-access fees.

I currently support a sizable group of Mac users in the College of Architecture's faculty. I know firsthand all the arguments Apple users present to keep the presence of Macs in our organization. However, design-based and photo-manipulation programs that were originally designed to work on Macs run perfectly on the PC platform at less cost. Of all our students who are learning computer-aided design, I know of only one who has purchased a Mac. For us, that equals less than 1 °percent of users. From my experience in the private industry, that percentage would also apply for the Manhattan business community.

In contrast to Peter Knupfer's comments in the Collegian, I don't believe CNS has given up on Macs, the public has. The majority wins in this country, and Mac users are not the majority. The market reflects this, and our student use reflects this. I would never say one platform is better than the other, but you have to spend your resources supporting public demand. If there is a need to vote on the issue, then I feel the outcome would support CNS. Apple is suffering from poor upper management, continual loss of market share, a habit of making its own technology obsolete and a long history of running its books way into the red. These problems and others spell doom for the Apple platform, with or without a handout from Bill Gates.

Former K-State standout discusses progress of black athletes

JENNIFER PAYTON
Kansas State Collegian

Veryl Switzer spoke of the opportunities to open the doors for others during his presentation Thursday at Derby Dining Center.

Switzer, associate director of Bramlage Coliseum and former K-State football standout, spoke on the progress of black athletes as part of Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

"I had a mission. I had to help open some of the doors," Switzer said of his collegiate and professional football career.

Switzer was one of the first black athletes allowed to play on scholarship at K-State. He was one of the only black men on the team in 1949.

The challenge he and his teammates faced was discrimination that would affect the whole team. He described instances where the whole team was refused service at a restaurant because black people were on the team.

"We came and went as a team," Switzer said.

He said there were other instances of discrimination, such as when he was not allowed to stay with the team in an all-white hotel.

"I couldn't ride on the public elevator," Switzer said.

Switzer explained that his mother had told him long ago what discrimination meant and what he would have to do to fight it.

"She said that I had to be five times better than my white counterpart," Switzer said of competing in athletics.

Switzer said he admired Martin Luther King Jr. and said he thought he could play a role in the equal rights movement not on the streets, but on the playing field.

"Dr. King was very significant in my life," Switzer said. "He played a role in leveling the playing field by making sure everyone had an opportunity."

Switzer said he believes athletics played a significant role in integration in the United States.

After his years at K-State, Switzer was drafted by the Green Bay Packers.

"I was the only black man in Green Bay," Switzer said. "But I enjoyed my time there."

Switzer stressed that no color lines were drawn in the huddle. He said teammates were like brothers to him.

His playing career drew Frances Vitali, a multicultural intern at K-State Libraries, to the discussion.

She said she read some background information on Switzer and was impressed not only with his ability as an athlete, but also with his staying power.

"He paved the way for our equity. And he's still here at KSU, paving the way," Vitali said.

Joel Groninga, sophomore undeclared, said Switzer played an important role in shaping the sports world.

"Switzer was one of the first black athletes. He is a good role model for all athletes, black or white," Groninga said.

Manhattan officials get public input on safety issues of city bicycle plan

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Panelists involved in government, education and business informed the nearly 50 people in attendance about safety issues and the Bicycle Master Plan on Thursday during "Manhattan and the Bicycle," a public forum at the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

Because of public interest, the Manhattan City Commission adopted the master plan at its meeting in December. According to a recent poll conducted by the city of Manhattan, 81 percent of bicyclists would ride more with safer conditions available.

"The more public support, the more likely the commission may respond and raise it in priority," Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead said.

He said plans to expand the current Linear Bike Trail into the northern part of the city will take several years to complete, but will provide bicyclists with more accessibility to bike paths.

Many paths will run parallel with city streets and be incorporated through typical maintenance, involving striping the lanes and adding lanes when the streets are resurfaced. The addition of bike paths will increase the city's infrastructure to accommodate more bicyclists.

"Bikes and automobiles, given our current street system and traffic, just are not compatible," said Debbie Nuss, chairwoman of the Manhattan Parks and Recreational Board.

There are also plans to increase the number of locations for bicyclists to park. Steve Martini, Manhattan resident, said the Bicycle Master Plan would give more options to bicyclists and is a safer alternative than the city's current bicycle structure.

"To get from point A to B, you have to travel the roads," he said.

"You are kind of at the mercy of the driver."

K-Staters discuss White House experiences

Carrel said it struck her as odd that an intern would have much access to the White House.

"We had minimal security clearances and could only come over if cleared by someone higher up, like my big boss Mack McLarty," she said.

She said she was only invited to one White House event. It was a social function in the Rose Garden for White House interns.

Carrel said there is the potential for political interns to be overwhelmed from working so close to international policymakers and to lapse in judgment.

"It's hard to say. I don't know. I was never asked to do anything improper," she said. "It's all speculation."

Aaron Otto, senior in political science and Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee chair, worked last summer as an unpaid intern in the office of political affairs.

Otto, like Carrel, worked in the Old Executive Office Building. He said he would do it again without thinking twice, regardless of what recent reports allege.

"It leaps off a resume," Otto said. "It's so worthwhile and so intense. It's the best thing I've been involved in."

Urick pledges not to cut student season tickets

wouldn't cut the number of student tickets from what it had sold in recent seasons, and that, if more students requested tickets, those requests could be filled as well.

Board member Sylvia Robinson asked Urick about the possibility of selling more student tickets.

"So if you had 10,000 student's requests, you would fill those?" she asked.

"Oh, yes," Urick said in response. "I need the students there. The team needs the students there. They're terrific."

When introducing Urick to the regents, President Jon Wefald stated his support for the expansion plan.

"We want to do what's right for us. We're trying to be conservative, but still build a nice stadium," he said. "We want to build a stadium that we can afford."

Jury deliberations to begin in mauling case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JUNCTION CITY — Closing statements, hampered twice because of a juror's illness, ended Thursday in the trial of a woman whose three Rottweiler dogs fatally mauled an 11-year-old boy.

Jurors briefly retired about 5:20 p.m., but decided to begin deliberations today in the case of Sabine Davidson.

She is charged with unintentional second-degree murder in the April 24 mauling death of Christopher Wilson. The dogs attacked the boy while he waited for his school bus in rural Milford.

Closing statements were to begin Thursday morning, but were delayed because the juror was ill; later, during the proceedings, the woman again became ill, and they were stopped briefly.

The panel retired for a short time before deciding not to begin deliberations Thursday night.

Geary County District Judge George Scott ordered the jurors to begin deliberations at 8:30 a.m.

Davidson testified in her defense Wednesday that no one had complained about the dogs, but that she knew one of the dogs was able to open the gate of the dog pen in the family's backyard.

Davidson and her husband, Jeffrey Davidson, both were charged in the death. He will be tried separately in March.

Davidson's attorney, Ronald L. Hodgson, introduced a home videotape Davidson had made around Christmas 1996, showing the now-dead Rottweilers interacting peacefully with one another and with the Davidsons' three children inside the home.

County Attorney Christopher Biggs had twice blocked the evidence earlier.

Davidson described how she developed an interest in Schutzhund training — a working-dog sport that involves trials of dog obedience, tracking and protection — and started with German shepherds.

She also worked on teaching them obedience, and enlisted neighbor Rebecca Davis, an experienced dog handler, to help her.

She had one animal put to sleep because it was too aggressive toward children, and she gave up Schutzhund clubs after the birth of her third child in November 1996.

She switched to Rottweilers in 1995, eventually acquiring two females and a male. Davidson said she socialized and obedience-trained the animals.

Some area residents testified they complained to authorities about the dogs. One, a highway patrol trooper who lived nearby, said he saw the dogs running loose. The Davidsons were on vacation and their neighbor's husband was caring for the dogs at the time.

But Davidson said no one ever told her the dogs were running loose or that they were chasing anyone. She would have tried to contain the animals, she said. Failing that, "I would've had them put to sleep," she said.

Davidson also denied telling Geary County Sheriff's Detective Carlos Roman and Assistant County Attorney Marc Bennett after the attack that if a child was injured, it must have been one of the Wilson boys because they had been teasing the dogs.

Davidson said she knew of two incidents when children had teased the dogs, but not who was involved.

'American Seen' at Beach

▶ TRAVELING ART EXHIBIT FOCUSES ON SOCIAL REALISM, REGIONALISM

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

"I didn't want to paint the evil in the world. I painted the way I would like to be," — Norman Rockwell.

This sentiment found on the card next to Rockwell's "The County Agricultural Agent" sums up the sentiments for a majority of the artists' exhibits in "America Seen: People and Places."

This traveling exhibition from the Sheldon Memorial Art Gallery and Sculpture Garden at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln will be at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art until March 8. The exhibition is supported by Kansas Farm Bureau and Affiliated Services.

"America Seen" is comprised of more than 80 paintings, prints and photographs done by artists from the late 1920s to the early 1950s. The two styles featured in the exhibit are Social Realism and Regionalism.

"These artists tried not to follow the styles of Paris. Their work looks real. They painted what they saw in America at that time," said Katherine Walker Schlageck, education coordinator for the Beach Museum.

Schlageck said some artists expressed optimism for the future despite what America was going through. Others felt they should play the part of a historian and show the effects on the American public of events such as the Great Depression and World War II, Schlageck said. This exhibition features work by Norman Rockwell, Thomas Hart Benton, Grant Wood, John Steuart Curry and Isabel Bishop.

"One unique thing about this exhibit is that it features work done by women and African-Americans," Schlageck said.

One of the reasons for this was that the Realist movement came at a crucial time. Because the art was able to be understood by everyone, people, including the government, started giving American artists something European artists had — patronage.

"Some of these painting were made possible by the Works Progress Administration. This program created jobs for Americans including artists and photographers," Schlageck said.

Reviewers tackle love story, love of pot

▶ 'HALF-BAKED' GARNERS LAUGHS AS NEW-WAVE CHEECH AND CHONG FLICK.

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

Good old-fashioned, toked-out comedy is back, for better or worse.

The director of "Billy Madison" joins together with four stand-up comedians for "Half Baked," a new comedy that makes drugs a laughing matter and tells political correctness to smoke up and sit down ... on the ceiling.

After a quick introduction to the four childhood friends and their honored hookah Billy Bong Thornton, the movie sets off in a tailspin of comedic adventures that Cheech and Chong could not have done better.

On a run to a convenience mart for pizza, popcorn, chips, dip, celery, slurpees, Funyuns and a few other things, kindergarten teacher Kenny has a run-in with a diabetic police horse that lands him in jail as a cop killer.

In order to protect their friend's jailhouse purity, the three remaining pothead brothers, along with The Guy on the Couch (Steven Wright with his perfected comatose wit), must come up with $100,000 bail money before Kenny's newly found protectorate, played by a non-stoned Tommy Chong, is released in 11 days.

Their fund-raising efforts lead them into the not-so-underground world of home-delivery dope dealing in New York City and introduces a new generation of moviegoers to a genre of comedy left behind in the early '80s.

This movie includes a who's-who-in-Hollywood guest list including Janeane Garofalo, Willie Nelson, Jon Stewart and Snoop Doggy Dogg among others (seeing Bob Saget confess what he's done for a quick fix is worth the cost of the ticket). Also in the cast is Rachel True of "The Craft" fame playing Mary Jane, pothead brother Thurgood's new girlfriend who, despite her name, sets out to end the team's evil bonging ways.

Movie Review

With a moral you have to see to believe, "Half Baked" is a true comedy that doesn't take anything too seriously.

If you're looking for a feel-good drama, this is not it. If you're looking to feel good, head down to the late showing.

If you're looking for a good laugh, "Half Baked" has the makings for the next "Animal House"-style repeat renter.

▶ '96 'ROMEO AND JULIET' LACKS LUSTER OF ORIGINAL FILM VERSION OF STAGE PLAY

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

In recent years, William Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet," the most well-known love story ever written, has made the transition from stage to screen. This year marks the 30th anniversary of the original "Romeo and Juliet" motion picture.

Released by Paramount Pictures in 1968, "Romeo and Juliet" stars 17-year-old Leonard Whiting as Romeo and 15-year-old Olivia Hussey as Juliet. The story is one high-school students in English classes know well: boy meets girl, boy marries girl, boy kills girl's cousin, girl's parents go berserk, and the next thing you know, boy and girl are pushing up the proverbial daisies.

Italian director Franco Zeffirelli paints a colorful picture of the Renaissance period in which Shakespeare lived, complete with lavish costumes and expensive sets. The film includes well-delivered dialogues by both of the title characters, despite their age and inexperience with acting at that point.

One can't help but note the time the movie was released: 1968. The world was in the midst of war, the assassinations of Martin Luther King Jr. and Sen. Robert Kennedy. America's youth was in an uproar spawning protests and peaceful sit-ins.

"Romeo and Juliet" is the story of hope in a world in which there seems to be none left. The characters of Romeo and Juliet seem to face the struggles which the children of the hippie generation faced. The reckless youth of 1968 could relate to these star-crossed lovers. In fact, the feuding houses of Montague and Capulet symbolize the very society of the 1960s against which America's youth rebelled.

So, in the original "Romeo and Juliet," we find not only superior acting and directing, but also a reflection of the times and some brief nudity you might not have seen when you viewed the film in your high-school Shakespeare class.

Fast forward nearly 30 years later to 1996, when 20th Century Fox released a remake of "Romeo and Juliet." Again, the title characters, played by Leonardo DiCaprio and Claire Danes, are splendidly portrayed. The actors deliver their dialogue just as well as their 1968 counterparts, and their names are already well-known by moviegoers.

The story is the same. The lines are the same. The setting is not.

Movie Review

The backdrop for this modernized tale is a New York-ish city, present day. The film appears as if this story took place on another planet ... one where the society had all the look of 20th-century earth and all the language of the Renaissance period.

The viewer is introduced to such outrageous characters as Lady Capulet, Juliet's mother, clad only in lingerie. Later in the film Mercutio, Romeo's best friend, shows up to the Capulet's masquerade ball in drag.

It seems director Baz Luhrmann took the audience for fools. If Luhrmann assumed he'd get the viewers attention by spicing up a love story written more than 400 years ago by adding guns, car chases, drag queens and even a pill-popping Romeo, he's mistaken. Call me a lover of tradition, but Luhrmann could've kept the setting the same as the 1968 version and I'd be completely satisfied.

There are those, however, who will disagree and point out that the setting of the story has been adapted to appeal to today's youth.

True, the 1968 version appealed to the youth of the decade, but its look and language still held true to a Shakespearean play. The references to the 20th century in the new version, however, are so exaggerated and unnecessary that they can very easily distract the viewer from the focus of the story ... love.

Some good things are better left alone.

McCain to feature passionate Italian operas Friday

CHARLIE SIOUX CHARLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Illicit love and tragic consequences are the common threads that run through two Italian operas featured at McCain Auditorium this Friday night. The Opera Nazionale Italiana promises passion, betrayal and retribution as it presents "Cavalleria rusticana" and "I pagliacci."

McCain Director Richard Martin said it is the first time this opera company has been presented in the McCain Performance Series.

"It is the McCain debut of this particular company. The operas are fully staged, and there will be a 32-piece orchestra in the pit," Martin said. "The orchestra is from Budapest."

Previous opera productions at McCain featured mostly American opera performers, Martin said.

These operas, however, feature an almost exclusively Italian cast and passionate stories.

Both works, melodramas that end tragically, are recognized for compelling storylines, authenticating how primitive and emotion-laden life was in Italy during the 1880s. Don't despair if your Italian is rusty — or nonexistent — the operas are presented with supertitles, Martin said.

Originally "Cavalleria rusticana," which means "Rustic chivalry," was a short story by Giovanni Verga. Pietro Mascagni transformed it into a one-act opera with music described as lyrical, expressive, and at times, violent.

"I pagliacci," which means "The Strolling Players," is an opera in two acts with words and music by Ruggero Leoncavallo.

The operas are presented in part by the Kansas Arts Commission and the National Endowment for the Arts, with additional funding provided by the Kansas Fine Arts Fee.

Former Formula One driving champ busted for speeding on British highway

YEOVIL, England — Former Formula One driving champion Nigel Mansell won't be motoring on the highways and byways of Britain for six months. A court revoked his driving privileges Thursday for speeding at more than 90 mph in his new turbo-charged Bentley.

Mansell, 44, was stopped by police as he drove to his country home in Devon on Dec. 4.

Prosecutor Tony Scofield told magistrates Mansell's average speed was measured at 92 mph over a 1.2-mile stretch of road where the speed limit is 70 mph.

Mansell, who won the Formula One drivers' title with Williams-Renault in 1992 and the Indy car championship in 1993, is a special constable with the Devon and Cornwall police force.

He drew the driving ban because he had nine penalty points on his license for previous speeding offenses.

Mansell was also fined $640.

Boilermaker's long-range shooting keys Purdue's win over Ohio State

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind. — Jaraan Cornell has never been afraid to take a three-point shot, not in high school and certainly not at Purdue.

The 6-foot-3 sophomore, who had seven three-pointers in Wednesday night's 82-71 victory over Ohio State, is the Boilermakers' leading long-range shooter this season. He has 45 this year and 111 in his 38-game career, an average of almost three per game.

"He shot the ball extremely well," Coach Gene Keady said. "When you're shooting the ball like he was, zones are going to be tough to stay in. That was a big difference."

The seven three-pointers tied a Mackey Arena record and was one short of the Purdue record set by Cuonzo Martin against Kansas in 1994. Senior Chad Austin, who two weeks ago broke Martin's career record for three-pointers, hit one against Ohio State to raise his total to 182.

Austin received a special basketball from Keady to commemorate his career record, but at the pace Cornell is going, Keady better get another ball ready to give to Cornell, probably sometime next season.

Cornell missed his only attempt from inside the three-point line against Ohio State, but was 7-of-11 from long range.

Murder involvement charges against Russian hockey official dropped

MOSCOW — Prosecutors have dropped charges against a former Russian hockey official suspected of involvement in the murder of Ice Hockey Federation president Valentin Sych.

Investigators found insufficient evidence to support charges against Robert Cherenkov, president of the now-defunct Inter-nation Ice Hockey League, senior investigator Georgy Chuglazov told the Interfax news agency.

Police had suspected Cherenkov of masterminding the apparent contract hit in April that has shocked the Russian sports world. The specific charges against him were not released.

The Inter-nation Ice Hockey League was formed to organize commercial hockey competition, but disbanded in 1996.

Sych had opposed the establishment of the commercial league. The Ice Hockey Federation remains Russia's central hockey association, organizing amateur competition and forming the country's national team.

Sych was gunned down near his country home April 22 as he and his wife were getting into their car.

Retired 49ers tight end considers run at congressional seat in San Francisco

SAN FRANCISCO — Brent Jones, retiring from the San Francisco 49ers, is looking at a second career on television and is leaning against running for Congress, his agent said.

"I think at this point he's more committed to pursing a career in broadcasting than he is running for Congress," agent Lee Steinberg told the San Francisco Chronicle.

Some Republican leaders want the 34-year-old Jones to run for the GOP nomination to oppose Rep. Ellen Tauscher, a Democrat, in November. The hope is that Jones' familiar name and face might overcome Tauscher's popularity in the predominantly Republican district, which includes portions of Contra Costa and Alameda counties.

Jones announced his retirement before the NFC championship game.

Law Society of Upper Canada suggests disbarment for former NHLPA head

TORONTO — The Law Society of Upper Canada has stripped disgraced hockey lawyer Alan Eagleson of his right to practice law.

The society's board of directors on Thursday agreed with a disciplinary committee recommendation that Eagleson be disbarred for "conduct unbecoming a barrister and solicitor."

Both sides had agreed on the punishment this week at a brief hearing. The society regulates lawyers in Ontario.

Eagleson, former head of the NHL Players Association, is serving an 18-month jail term for fraud.

Eagleson's lawyer, Brian Greenspan, said his client "has not engaged in law for a decade" and the punishment will have "no real impact" on Eagleson's future.

On Jan. 7, Eagleson was convicted of three counts of fraud over the sale of rink-board advertising for Canada Cup international hockey tournaments he organized in 1984, '87 and '91.

A day earlier, Eagleson pleaded guilty in Boston to three counts of mail fraud. Those charges are related to his recovery of personal expenses from union funds and his handling of a disability insurance claim filed by Glen Sharpley, a former NHL player.

Cats ready to tangle with Bears

▸ K-STATE WILL TRY TO FOLLOW UP 64-52 WIN OVER COLORADO AGAINST BAYLOR SATURDAY NIGHT.

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

Winning is a cure-all.

Before Wednesday, K-State's women's basketball team had lost five of six games, and after a 6-2 start, the Wildcats found themselves 7-7 with several tough conference games ahead.

But after a 64-52 win over Colorado on Wednesday night, everything is suddenly cured. The victory pulled the Wildcats to 2-3 in Big 12 play, but more importantly gave the team confidence and success upon which to build.

After a season-high 29 turnovers Saturday night against Nebraska, the Cats reduced that number to 17, K-State's third-lowest showing of the season.

The Cats say the difference was that K-State ran its offensive system well for the first time in a while.

"If we run offense, we're going to make sure we win, and if we don't, we lose," guard Brit Jacobson said.

The Cats haven't been running offense consistently this season. Head coach Deb Patterson said every game was like a blank canvas, just waiting to be painted, and Wednesday's game was a pretty picture to see.

> "IF WE RUN OFFENSE, WE'RE GOING TO MAKE SURE WE WIN."
> BRIT JACOBSON
> K-State guard

"(There were) roses and sunshine and mountains and flowers and lakes and fishies," Patterson said. "(The team is) ripe with possibilities."

The Cats will try to put together another masterpiece at 7 p.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. They will play Baylor, which enters the game fresh off a home win against No. 21 Nebraska — the same team that beat K-State by 22- and 31-point margins this season. Baylor is 10-6 on the season and 4-2 in Big 12 play.

The Lady Bears return four starters from last year's team that finished 15-13 for the program's first winning season since the 1983-84 season. Center Kacy Moffitt and forward Nicole Palmer both averaged double figures in scoring last season and lead a deep, athletic squad.

Also, Baylor has 10 players returning from last year's team. K-State has nine players on the team.

"Baylor is probably the quickest and most athletic team in the league, from one to 12," Patterson said. "We'll be facing ... Lara Webb, who can shoot the three and Kacy Moffitt, who I think is one of the best post players in the game."

Patterson anticipates the Lady Bears will pressure the ball to try to force the Cats to turn it over numerous times again.

"We'll come into the game with the focus on us taking care of who we are, and if we do that, I think we've got a great chance at competing toe-to-toe with Baylor Saturday night," Patterson said. "Nothing short of that will get us the win."

STORIES BY DAN CATALDI • PHOTO BY JILL JARSULIC

Natalia Farmer is not your typical K-State freshman.

For starters, she's in her second semester of college, and she's still only 17 years old. She's also a member of the Wildcat tennis team, which enters the year ranked No. 60 by the Intercollegiate Tennis Association.

And she came all the way from Cheshire, England, to play tennis in Manhattan. Farmer said she has made the adjustment to Manhattan with little trouble.

"You miss home and everything, but then you get busy again and you kind of forget about it," she said. "It's not as bad as I thought it would be."

She isn't having any problems being a year younger than other freshmen, either. Farmer said she has made many friends during the semester. She compares cultural differences between England and the United States to her feeling comfortable despite being younger than her peers.

She said she enjoys attending K-State because she is given the opportunity to both play a sport and concentrate on her education. But she said she is most excited about getting the opportunity to do something different than her friends back in Cheshire.

"Not a lot of people get to do this at home," she said.

England's higher education system works differently than in the United States — after high school, universities are for education only. Athletes in England can either play professionally or go to an American university where athletics are part of the educational experience.

K-State coach Steve Bietau agreed she has done well making the adjustment from Cheshire to the Midwest. However, he is aware she is younger than most freshmen and approaches her conservatively.

Bietau said he believes Farmer has the potential to have a great college career.

"She has the potential to do that," he said. "Whether or not she has an impact is largely up to her."

While most players begin at a young age, Farmer did not pick up a racket until she was 12 years old. She was a quick learner, though, and was soon

Women's tennis team ready to open season on Sunday

The K-State women's tennis team opens the spring season Sunday at 1 p.m. in Ahearn Field House against the Southwest Missouri State Bears.

Last season, the Wildcats finished 7-14, but four of the top six players returned, including the top two players on the team. Yana Dorodnova, a senior from Moscow and Lena Piliptchak, a senior from Kiev, Ukraine, will lead the Cats into battle this year.

They are joined by returning seniors Chris Schulte and Dinah Watson. Redshirt freshman Anna Pampoulova and three true freshmen — Erin DeFeo, Natalia Farmer and Eva Novotna — round out the roster.

This group of freshmen, along with the seniors, will try to improve on last years 2-9 Big 12 Conference record.

The Cats are ranked 60th in the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's rankings. They are led by Dorodnova and Novotna, who form the No. 3 doubles team in the Central Region. Three singles players are ranked in the region led by Dorodnova at No. 11, No. 17 Piliptchak and 18th-ranked Pampoulova.

"We have a fairly deep team. That's one of the strengths of this team," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "We have a lot of good players."

Wildcat hoops, football game make for truly Super Sunday

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

Dan is a senior in computer science. You can send e-mail to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

We've reached the day.

It's the day advertisers look forward to all year, waiting to release their best commercials for our viewing pleasure, while setting new records for the longest non-overtime game in NFL history.

This Sunday is "Super Sunday."

And this year, it's for more reasons than one.

Depending on how you look at it, Sunday has the potential to be a fine day for sports fans at K-State.

If you ask me, whoever is in charge of making the men's basketball schedule really screwed up by making Sunday's game between the Wildcats and Colorado end about 10 minutes before kickoff of the largest sporting event in the country, if not the world.

That would be fine if not for the already lackluster home attendance of the men's basketball team, but I severely doubt many people, if given a choice, would watch the Cats instead of every football fan's reason to live. We all know the Little Apple is football country.

Plus, many fans travel quite a distance to get to K-State's games. I would bet — even though betting on Super Sunday is illegal in Kansas — that many fans will not make the journey to Bramlage Coliseum on Sunday because of the big game.

On the bright side, the Chiefs are not in it — surprise, surprise — so many people won't be swayed by loyalties.

Here's what I figure I'll do.

I'll wake up around noon or so, like any normal Sunday.

Out of pure necessity, I will set up for my party early, leaving everything that is not perishable sitting out during the Cats' game. This isn't really different from any other Super Bowl because all the food just sits out while the 11-hour pregame show is on anyway.

The beverages of choice will stay on ice until after the Cats play. This is best for all parties involved. They will stay cold and probably last longer if the pregame party is eliminated. Remember, many people's beverages of choice will not be available for purchase on game day. Plan.

I will leave home at about 2:30 p.m. for the 3 p.m. game. This gives plenty of time to get parked and situated before tipoff.

College basketball games last about two hours, leaving about 15 minutes of time between the final buzzer and kickoff of Super Bowl XXXII. This means running up the Bramlage stairs to get to the car before everybody else. I'll have no regard for anybody else's safety — we're talking the Super Bowl. People will heal eventually.

Driving fast is a must to get home in time. Fortunately, traffic cops will direct traffic, making the necessity of running stop signs perfectly legal. No other police will be out — they'll be watching the game — so pushing the speed limit a little should be no problem.

This gets me home just in time for the coin toss. I think the odds are 6-5 for heads.

I usually wouldn't care about missing the Super Bowl, especially for a live sporting event, but this year's game appears to be different. I normally refer to the NFC Championship Game as the Super Bowl because it's a foregone conclusion that the AFC representative will not show up for the game.

This year should be different, though.

For the first time in recent memory, the best two teams in the game are playing each other.

Although neither had home-field advantage for the playoffs, the Packers and Broncos were the best teams in football. They proved this by winning big games on the road in the playoffs.

The teams are so even, it's a difficult game to predict, but the Packers have three things on their side. Most importantly, they're the defending champs until somebody proves otherwise. Second, they're from the NFC, which gives them a psychological edge going into the game. Third, the Broncos are trying to avoid the "choker" label along with the Buffalo Bills and Minnesota Vikings.

I believe these small factors will be the difference in the game, but that it will be the finest Super Bowl since the Giants beat the Bills 20-19 in 1991. For a change, the fourth quarter will be worth watching for something other than the newest Pepsi commercials.

My prediction: Packers 31, Broncos 27.

Happy watching, football fans.

Track team looks to improve individual performances

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Legendary Green Bay Packer coach Vince Lombardi once said, "Winning is not a sometime thing. It's an all-the-time thing."

While that philosophy won Lombardi two Super Bowls, it doesn't always apply to track and field, K-State track coach Cliff Rovelto said.

Rovelto said early season meets are used for individual performances instead of finishing first in team standings. He said final standings are only important in the conference and national meets.

"I don't put a whole lot of stock in these early meets," Rovelto said. "That's because we may have someone who gets third or fourth all season long because they weren't in their best event. Then when that person gets to the conference meet and they place second, people always ask what happened."

At this Saturday's Iowa State University Open, Rovelto said individual performances are the most important.

"We're looking at performance first and our placing third or maybe even fourth on the list," he said.

Many track team members will not be competing in their best event at the ISU Open. The best example is all-America triple jumper Vanitta Kinard.

Kinard, who has the nation's best collegiate triple jump this year at 43 feet 3-3/4 inches, will not be competing in the triple jump at the ISU Open. She will compete in the long jump, 55-meter hurdles and 4x400 relay.

"If you are training hard, which Vanitta is, you can't go out and jump as far as you would like to week after week," Rovelto said. "We also want to try to run a fast 4x400, so she is going to run it."

Freshman multi-event competitor Carmen Wright will be competing in the same three events as Kinard because there is no pentathlon in the ISU Open.

"I'm just competing in those events to improve my skills for the pentathlon," Wright said.

Wright scored 3,562 points in the Jan. 16 Wildcat Pentathlon, placing her fifth on K-State's all-time list for that event.

BLACK

At least two of the Wildcat track team's athletes will be in their strongest events. Senior sprinter Keith Black will run the 400 and sophomore Renetta Seiler will compete in the weight throw at the ISU Open.

Black was an indoor All-American in the 400 last season, but his training has been set back because he is also a member of K-State's football team.

"He hasn't had a series of consistent work-outs," Rovelto said. "He's still a long way away from being where he is capable of being."

Black's personal record in the indoor 400 is 45.80 seconds, and Rovelto said he has not yet reached his potential.

"As far as how fast he will be able to run, I don't want to know right now," Rovelto said.

Like Black, Seiler is one of the nation's best at her event, and she is set to prove it again at the ISU Open. Seiler has the nation's second-best collegiate weight throw this season at 67 feet 9 inches. Because Seiler is from Algona, Iowa, the ISU Open is a homecoming of sorts, she said.

"It will be my first meet this year that my parents get to watch," Seiler said. "I throw really well when my parents are watching, so hopefully that will continue."

Seiler has set a personal record in each of her first two meets this season, which has been her goal, she said.

"Hopefully I'll be able to throw another PR in Iowa, which is my goal for every meet," she said.

competing in high level tournaments in England.

When she was 13, she won the Volkswagen Nationals in Division III, which she considers the greatest achievement in her tennis career. Farmer also won many other tournaments and participated in the prequalifying rounds for Junior Wimbledon.

Bietau heard of Farmer through a network of people he knows in England — a former K-State player who now coaches in England told him about her. Also, Dinah Watson, a senior on the team also from England, helped Bietau recruit Farmer.

Farmer had offers from schools in Florida, Texas, Montana and Utah, but selected the Cats.

"The whole schedule just seemed better," Farmer said.

Farmer said she hopes to improve her game while in Manhattan, something Bietau thinks is possible. He said she has a powerful serve and forehand, two weapons that should help her contend for a lot of playing time as a freshman.

Farmer sees the same strengths in her game, but said she needs work on her backhand, as well as the timing of her approaches to the net.

Bietau would also like to see her work on her footwork.

"She's got the ability to force a player to hit some weak shots, so she needs to be up there (at the net) putting pressure on them," he said.

Kansas coach believes Earl being treated unfairly

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — Lester Earl, accused of receiving $6,600 cash and other illegal inducements to sign at LSU, has never requested or received anything improper since enrolling at Kansas, Jayhawks' coach Roy Williams said Thursday.

Earl, a 6-foot-8 forward, transferred to Kansas after playing 11 games as a freshman for LSU.

He sat out one calendar year before becoming eligible for the Jayhawks last month.

LSU announced earlier this week that the NCAA was alleging a series of improper actions on the part of the school's former coaching staff, including providing free meals and legal advice for Earl's family. The allegations go back to when Earl was still in high school in Baton Rouge, La.

"We recruited Lester Earl when he was in high school. Lester never asked for nor implied that he wanted anything improper from KU," Williams said. "We recruited him honestly and legally and had no information that any other institution was doing anything but that."

Williams said Earl contacted him after his first semester at LSU and "neither asked for nor implied that he wanted anything but, quote, 'a second chance to come to KU,' unquote."

Williams said he had no idea LSU might be under NCAA scrutiny until after Earl came to Kansas.

"The NCAA called and wanted to visit with Lester. I instructed him to do one thing ... to tell the truth and tell the truth in every possible instance. Lester has cooperated fully with the NCAA. He's done very well academically here at KU, and he's never asked for anything improper. Yet I read that he's a bad guy, and I know he hasn't been the bad guy with us."

"I READ THAT HE'S A BAD GUY, AND I KNOW HE HASN'T BEEN THE BAD GUY WITH US."
ROY WILLIAMS
Kansas basketball coach

Insisting this would be the last time he ever addressed the subject, Williams said he had told Earl and the rest of the third-ranked Jayhawks never to talk about it either.

"What we do know now is that the kid left a situation that he didn't like to go to a place he had stated he wanted initially anyway. He has been absolutely no problem on or off the court. And now in some circles he's being somewhat criticized for telling the truth. I just wish we wouldn't all be quite so quick to judge people."

Since becoming eligible, Earl has averaged almost 10 points for the Jayhawks and shown signs of star potential. He has been criticized publicly for taking money from LSU and then being eligible at Kansas.

"I told him don't read the papers, don't listen to people. I'm hoping he'll gain some strength from our team," Williams said.

Williams declined to answer when asked if he would have accepted Earl had he known of all the "baggage" from LSU.

"I didn't know," he said. "I'm not going to speculate on what I would have done.

"Here's a kid who told the truth and I'm reading the headlines that say let's not give him credit for that. That doesn't appear to me to be the message we should be saying."

Williams answered sharply, "Yes," when asked if he resented the fact the allegations and Earl's link to them had been made public in Louisiana.

"That's probably something I shouldn't address. I better leave it at that," he said.

place where people must come and be quiet throughout the matches.

"We encourage people to come to the matches and have a good time," he said. "We want to develop a following here so that the crowd has some kind of an impact on the match that makes this a hard place for teams to come in and play."

The dual meets will be played with six singles matches followed by three doubles matches. The singles are best of three sets and the doubles are played as an eight-game pro-set.

Tentatively, all the matches are scheduled in Ahearn Field House through spring break. After spring break, the matches will move outside to the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex near the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. In the event of inclement weather, the outdoor matches will be moved inside to Ahearn Field House.

Despite beating the Bears 7-2 last year, Sunday's match could be a good early season test for the Cats.

"I think it will be a good match. When we played them last year, they were pretty strong at one and their depth was questionable," Bietau said. "I know their depth is better now."

The Cats have had only two weeks of practice this semester to prepare for this matchup, but Bietau said he is confident the team will be ready to play.

Commission OKs master plan for Northeast Community Park

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan City Commission approved the master plan for the Northeast Community Park at its meeting Tuesday. The development will cost about $3.2 million.

"I think the park will be a good addition to the Manhattan park system. It will fill a void for the parks and recreational department in the northeast section of town," Richard Allen, park planner, said.

Terry DeWeese, director of the Department of Parks and Recreation, said there has been interest to get more parks in the Northview area since he arrived in 1985.

"There are lots of families and kids in that area, and there has been a lot of interest from them to get a park in that area," DeWeese said.

The park will be on an 80-acre plot of land in the Northview area, east of the Dix addition, purchased in 1997 by the city. The property is being leased to a farmer who splits the profits with the city.

"The property earns about $7,000 a year, and those earnings go into a profit account that will be used for construction and development of the park," Allen said.

A special feature of the park is an arboretum and prairie land.

"There was a group of individuals whose main emphasis was on establishing a nature park," he said. "They wanted the restored prairie and arboretum."

Allen said when construction starts, it could take up to two years before the park could be in use. However, the timing of the construction depends on funding.

"We have no specific funding for the park as of now," he said.

Allen said the city administrators are looking at funding alternatives. Funding could come from three areas: donations, grants or a Capital Improvement Plan.

"I think the commission and the community will keep pushing until we get funding," he said. "I don't think they are going to wait 20 years for something to happen."

A consultant hired by the city recommended a park in the northeast section of Manhattan in 1991.

Engineering society recognizes professor

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Gary Clark said he came to K-State because it offered him the perfect mix of opportunities to teach and research.

Clark, professor of biological and agricultural engineering, has been rewarded for his efforts as an engineer and teacher.

He has been named the Young Engineer of the Year for his work. Clark received the award from the Society for Engineering in Agricultural, Food and Biological Systems for the state of Kansas.

"It is an honor to receive this," he said, "because as an individual, you put a lot of work into things, and this is a way that people let you know your work is worthwhile and necessary."

Clark, an 18-year member of the national engineering society, has served in numerous offices and committee chair positions.

He is an associate editor of the Applied Engineering Journal and has served as the program chair of the Fifth International Microirrigation Congress.

"The people who win these types of awards on the national level do a lot for the society and bring publicity and recognition to the engineering industry," Clark said.

Clark came to K-State from Florida to teach and apply his field work to his courses.

He teaches five different courses within the colleges of Engineering and Agriculture. He also advises about 25 students and is an adviser for the John Deere Mentor Program.

Clark has also been honored for his teaching efforts by the students in the College of Agriculture, when he was named faculty member of the semester in fall 1997.

Though he works for the College of Engineering, Clark said he recognizes that his teaching reaches many more students than those in one college.

Justin Stahlman, junior in agricultural technology management, said he had firsthand experience with Clark's teaching.

"Dr. Clark is an effective teacher, especially in the way he applies his irrigation work and knowledge to the class topics," he said.

While he reaches many students through teaching, research is the other area of Clark's engineering success. His research specialty is irrigation, and he currently has two large projects in progress, he said.

One project, based at the K-State Sandyland Experiment Field in St. John, Kan., works with center pivot irrigation scheduling for commercial crop production.

Victor Martin, agronomist-in-charge at the agricultural experiment field, works closely with Clark on the project.

"He's innovative in the research we do out here. He's adept and good in the academic area as well as being comfortable in the field work necessary for this research," Martin said.

Clark said he enjoys his work both as an engineer and as a teacher because he can make a difference in the lives of students as well as society as a whole.

"I really like the challenge of solving problems and the idea that what I do can make a contribution to society," he said. "If our research works, it makes it exciting to be an engineer."

4 schools team up for aviation award

AMY BICKEL
Kansas State Collegian

Students from four Kansas universities teamed up to win the "Design It, Build It, Fly It" award in the National General Aviation Design Competition.

K-State, the University of Kansas, Pittsburg State University and Wichita State University students worked together to design the winning airplane. In the past, the competition didn't require students to build the planes. This is the first year the students get the chance to design, build and fly the airplanes. The Kansas team won the spot to create two quarter-scale models of the airplane for flight demonstrations in April and August.

A $10,000 award was given to the team. Grants were also given for additional support from the four universities.

The competition was created four years ago for students at engineering and aeronautical universities in an effort to revitalize the U.S. general aviation aircraft industry.

"Since 1978, general aviation has been declining steadily," said Omar Mohsen, graduate student in mechanical engineering and leader of K-State's project team. "Most four- to six-passenger planes were designed in the '60s and '70s. We are bringing them up to today's technology."

Mohsen first got involved with the program last year. This year he helped organize and communicate among participating universities. He also led the K-State team of about 30 students in addition to taking a 15-hour class load and working two jobs.

"People on my team rely on me. They tell me what they need," he said. "I delegate responsibility. I have to trust other people to do things, but when they don't get things done, you have to do it yourself."

The proposal offered by the four Kansas teams was for two advanced radio-control models of a jet-powered, general aviation aircraft. The jet-propelled engine will allow the aircraft to move faster.

Each university focused on a different aspect of the plane. K-State's team developed an advanced flight control system to make operating the plane easier and more efficient, allowing the pilot to concentrate more on safety, Mohsen said.

In April, the team will fly the two models. The first model will be flown as a regular remote-control model. The second will have high-dollar electronics and computer instruments, including five Global Positioning Systems. The GPS, in addition to information from other flight instruments, will navigate the plane and also provide information on the airplane's attitude.

Mohsen said the team should spend an estimated $60,000 on the two models and a ground-control station.

Mohsen said the project made his semester hectic, but it was a great learning experience.

"This is as close as you can get as a student to working on a complete engineering project — a lot of research and design and real time, budget and personal constraints," he said.

Peter Gorder, associate professor of mechanical engineering, said Mohsen did a great job with his responsibilities on the project.

"He's taken this as far as we've gone. He got us to where we are now," Gorder said.

Gorder said in past years, the Kansas team has taken first for its design two times. That track record has helped the team this year.

▸SUPER BOWL SUNDAY SHOWCASES SEVERAL RAGS-TO-RICHES STORIES.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN DIEGO — Not everyone can be as lucky as John Elway when it comes to finding a job in the NFL.

Elway, of course, led the celebrated quarterback class of 1983, going as the top pick in the draft that year. By comparison, two other star players in Sunday's Super Bowl didn't have as lofty a draft status. Terrell Davis was surprised to even be drafted, and Brett Favre was taken behind two quarterback busts, Dan McGwire and Todd Marinovich.

And there are more players who've taken the rags-to-riches route to Sunday's title game between the Green Bay Packers and Denver Broncos.

Davis, Denver's stellar running back, still can't believe that his roundabout career has taken him to the Super Bowl. In his hometown, no less.

"I'm probably one of the few players who knows what it feels like to not be a star player, a person who has been stepped on his entire life," Davis said Wednesday. "I really never had that superstar status in high school or college. That's helped me get mentally prepared for what I'm taking on now."

A sixth-round draft pick in 1995, Davis is a star now. In just three NFL seasons, he's rushed for 4,377 yards. That's a pretty good accomplishment for a guy who was a nose guard as a high school junior, a fullback as a senior and whose college, Long Beach State, dropped football. He finished up at Georgia.

Favre didn't bounce around that much, but didn't have it easy either. He got a scholarship offer from Southern Mississippi two days before the signing date. He was drafted by Atlanta but didn't play until he was traded to Green Bay in 1992.

He just picked up his third consecutive MVP award and is trying to get the Packers a second-straight Super Bowl title.

"When you go through the ranks the hard way, it makes you appreciate it," Favre said. "I know how hard it was to get here, what I had to do to get here and what our team had to go through. ... It was never easy and it still is not easy. It makes you appreciate every little thing you get and achieve."

Favre said he'd be happy with his career even if he hadn't won a Super Bowl.

"I'd have to be," he said. "In high school I wanted to win a state championship and didn't even come close. But I'm OK with it. In college I wanted to be the national champion, but I played at Southern Miss. We went to the Independence Bowl. But I'm OK with it. I can only do so much."

Favre has one more Super Bowl win than the entire QB Class of '83 combined — Elway, Dan Marino, Jim Kelly and Tony Eason.

"They've had great careers," Favre said. "They should never say, 'Just because I didn't win a Super Bowl, it was a waste,' because it was not. I'm very fortunate to have won a Super Bowl at an early stage of my career, but I've accomplished a lot of other things, too, that I'm pretty content with."

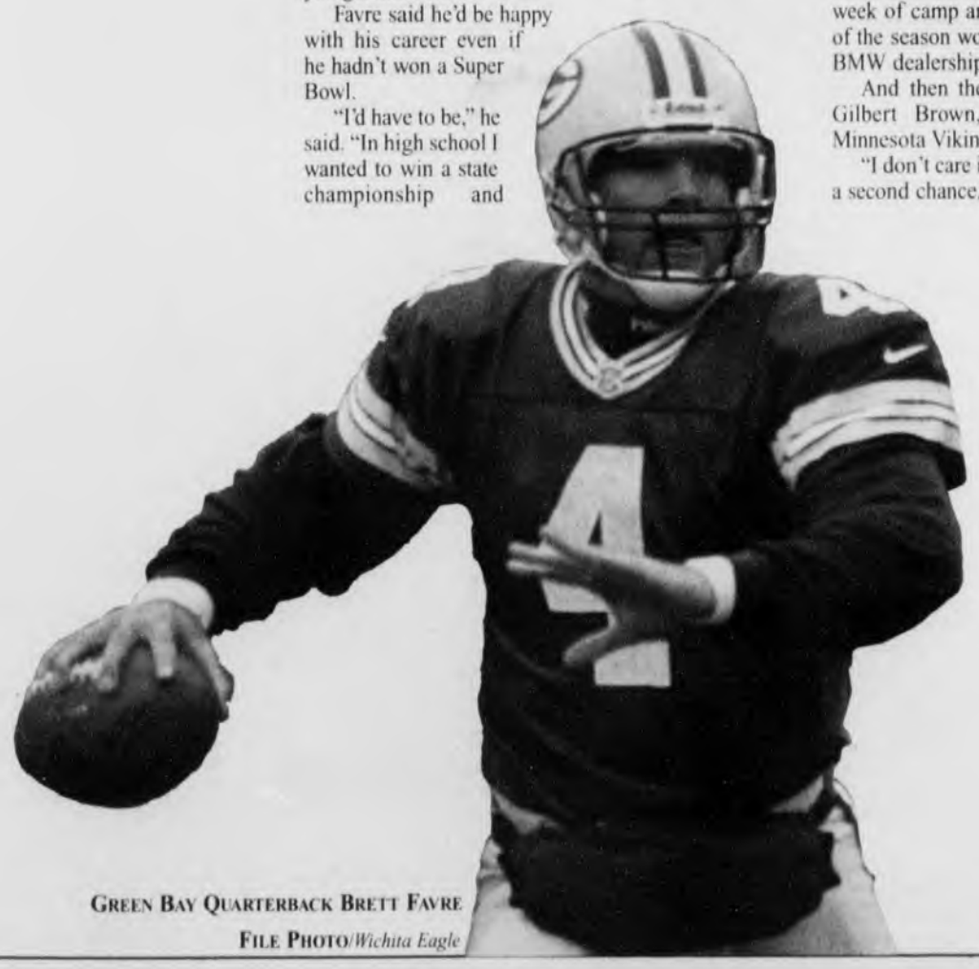
Among the Broncos who've taken the less-glamorous route is safety Tyrone Braxton. He was the next-to-last player taken in the 1987 draft, when there were 12 rounds. The draft now lasts only seven rounds.

When asked about Denver's underdog role, Braxton got in a tongue-in-cheek dig at Elway, who has lost three previous Super Bowls with the Broncos.

"I've been an underdog my whole career," Braxton said. "Maybe John can't handle being an underdog. He has been a first-rounder, with a silver spoon all his life."

When Braxton was in high school, he had a job as a gravedigger. Now he's in his third Super Bowl and trying for his first win.

Broncos backup offensive lineman David Diaz-Infante is believed to be the oldest player to make his first NFL start, doing so at age 32 in 1996. It took him nine years to break into the NFL. He played in the World League, the Canadian Football League, was in three replacement games for the San Diego Chargers in 1987, was out of football for three seasons and spent 1995 on Denver's practice squad.



Backup defensive end Harald Hasselbach grew up playing soccer, cricket, rugby and field hockey, as well as swimming. He didn't start playing football until his final two years of high school in Canada. Born in Holland, he also lived in Suriname, Indonesia and Kenya.

Packers defensive tackle Santana Dotson went through four losing seasons in Tampa Bay before signing with the Packers and winning the Super Bowl.

Green Bay linebacker Bernardo Harris signed with the Kansas City Chiefs as an undrafted free agent in 1994, but suffered a knee injury in practice the first week of camp and was waived. He spent the remainder of the season working in the auto parts department of a BMW dealership in Chapel Hill, N.C.

And then there's massive Packers defensive tackle Gilbert Brown, picked up off waivers from the Minnesota Vikings for $100 in 1993.

"I don't care if I was picked up for $2, as long as I get a second chance," Brown said of the Super Bowl title.

▶ DENVER DEFENSIVE PLAYER DEALS WITH LOSS OF MOTHER ON JAN. 2.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN DIEGO — The tears are gone now, swept away by Denver's drive to the Super Bowl, dried by the excitement, the accomplishment and the drama of the moment.

Defensive tackle Keith Traylor thinks they will return when this odyssey finally ends Sunday. That's because the loss of his mother still weighs heavily on his heart.

He cried that day three weeks ago when Vernistine Traylor died. And he will cry again after the season, when he returns to Malvern, Ark., and reflects on the emotional final weeks of his season.

"After all this is over, it will hit me and my brothers," Traylor said Wednesday. "It will be back to reality when this is over."

The reality is that on Jan. 2, at age 45, Vernistine Traylor finally lost a long, hard battle with failing health. That was the Friday before Denver played the AFC divisional playoff game against the Chiefs.

Traylor flew with the Broncos to Kansas City, Mo., and owner Pat Bowlen then chartered a plane for him to fly to Arkansas. He spent 3 1/2 hours with his family, then flew back to Kansas City and played the next day.

"I did my crying on my own," Traylor said. "She was on my mind the whole day. I would do what I had to do and then, there it was again. I'd see something in the stands that would remind me of her. I thought about her the whole game."

He made three tackles that day, two behind the line of scrimmage. After the Broncos won, they presented him with the game ball. He thought about burying it with his mother, but decided not to, keeping it instead to remind him of that difficult day.

Traylor said he made it through that game with the help of his family and his teammates. "They gave me a hand whenever I needed one," he said. "There was a little relief in knowing that I was not in that situation by myself. I dedicated the rest of the season to her.

"Lose or win, I did my best. She'll know I did my best."

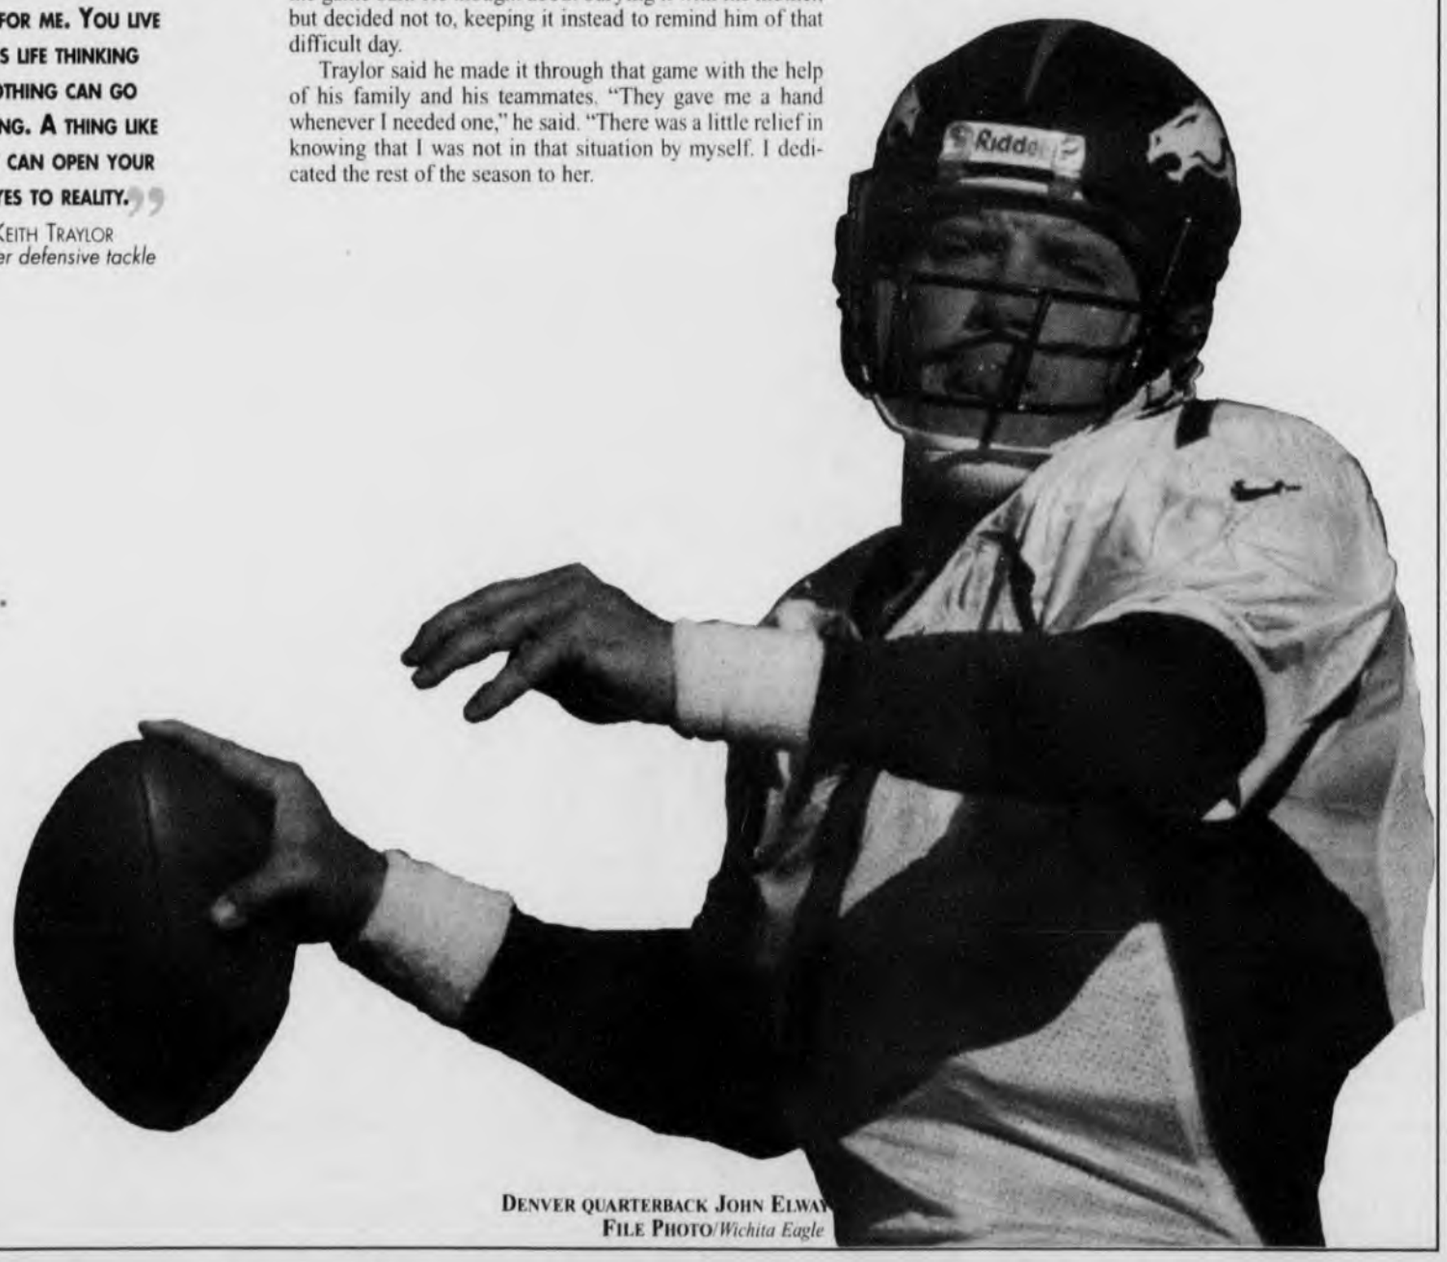
Vernistine Traylor had always faced life that way. In 1990, doctors gave her no more than 18 months to live. She went far past that.

"You've got to live life the best way you can," Traylor said. "My mom lived a happy life. She enjoyed her life. We had what we needed, not always what we wanted. It was rough. It was a survival type of thing. Get through it and maybe it will get better."

Traylor's football career has been like that, too. There have been an abundance of detours and dead ends, with pit stops all over the map, from Denver to Kansas City, from Green Bay to Los Angeles, from the NFL to the World League. He sat out 1994, out of a job and out of luck.

"I sat around, worked out, stayed in shape, hoped somebody would call," Traylor said. "It was very depressing. It was hard to watch games. You need to be out there. It was a wake-up call for me. You live this life thinking nothing can go wrong. A thing like that can open your eyes to reality."

"It did me some good. Until then, I didn't realize what it took. The NFL was a new world. I had a lot to learn. In college, you just put on a helmet and play. Here, there are schemes to learn."



Finally, Kansas City called. Traylor played two seasons there and then signed with Denver for a second term there. The first stay was difficult.

"I had the problem, not Denver," Traylor said. "I had to grow up. It was a question of knowing when to go home and when not to. It got out of hand there for a minute."

Through it all, Vernistine Traylor kept faith in her son.

"She always said if we go to the Super Bowl, she's coming," Traylor said.

"I'm sure she's here."

TCI debuts Digital Cable

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Digital Cable, which offers subscribers more channel choices, became available in Manhattan on Thursday through TCI of Kansas.

"It will allow us to offer another optional level of service," said Richard Cofer, general manager of TCI of Kansas.

The service costs between $10 and $13.30 per month.

With Digital Cable, TCI customers can view an additional 36 video channels. Eighteen are special-interest channels that include Discovery Kids, the History Channel, Fox Sports World and Outdoor Life. Subscribers to the premium movie channels will receive two additional HBO channels, three Encore channels, the Starz! channel and a Showtime channel. Nine channels will be pay-per-view, Cofer said.

Digital Cable also offers an on-screen program navigator, which will give viewers a guide to times of shows and channels.

"The navigator is quite a sophisticated part of the service," Cofer said.

The guide also lists when special events are broadcast. A special icon allows viewers to find out information about any TV show and most movies, Cofer said.

"I don't even look at the TV Guide anymore," Cofer said.

Other features of the navigator include a "block." This feature allows parents to block out a channel, all shows with a certain rating or just one show.

A message feature allows TCI to send messages to its customers through the television. Customers can also program their favorite channels and use a button on the TV remote to go to that channel directly, Cofer said.

Besides the 36 additional video channels, Digital Cable also offers 10 digital music channels that are compact-disc quality and commercial-free, Cofer said.

Cofer said Digital Cable does require a phone-line connection but no separate phone number. He said this should not interfere with any phone uses.

Ty Burson, general manager of Heartland Wireless of Manhattan, said the TCI's Digital Cable won't affect his company a great deal.

"We don't have a huge presence in Manhattan, so it won't decimate us. We're going to work on our strength and add channels that people request," Burson said.

Residence halls mull alternative to cable

SARA MARTIN
Kansas State Collegian

By the fall 1998 semester, K-State residence hall students will have a possibly less expensive option when subscribing for cable television.

A project is in the works to begin operation of a campus cable system offering student-requested channels and prices competitive with TCI.

"This is dealing with the educational resources of the university for requests from professors of being able to provide class lectures at the dorms at alternate times," said Spencer Smith, network administrator of KSU Telecommunications. "Another reason is complaints from students that the channel line-up at TCI wasn't all that great."

To improve the selections, Telecommunications will offer a three-tier system for subscriptions consisting of basic, expanded and specialty selections of HBO, Cinemax, Showtime and pay-per-view.

Channels provided will be based on a student survey done on the Telecommunications Internet site. Beginning in early February, students can cast their votes for their favorite programming. Channel selection will be based on responses from the survey.

Jerry Marrow, cable TV administrator at Telecommunications, said he thinks the channel selection could be more in tune with students and the cost might be as well.

"We hope to be able to beat TCI by at least 25 percent for all program packages," said Marrow, a 1986 K-State graduate and designer of the new system.

The cable system is in the State Purchasing Office for the state of Kansas to accept bids from contractors and give cost projections for the project.

Smith said that until the bids come in, Telecommunications will not have ballpark figures for the total cost of the new system. He added, however, that all money will come from Telecommunications funds.

In order to lessen the startup hassles, TCI is negotiating with KSU to stay involved in the campus cable operations.

TCI General Manager Richard Cofer said the company hopes to have the campus cable system programming through TCI. He explained that the campus cable system would still have its own billing and offices, but TCI would pay the cable channels themselves for the signals.

Smith said using TCI's signal would be cheaper for Telecommunications than receiving the same signals separately.

Univision adds Spanish flair to lineup

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students in Spanish classes will have another resource for classes and extra credit beginning March 1.

For five years, the Hispanic American Leadership Organization petitioned for Univision, a Spanish cable network, to be added to the TCI of Kansas cable system. It wasn't until last semester that members took big steps to bring Univision to Manhattan, said Leo Prieto, HALO president.

"We wrote letters to faculty, students, superintendents of Manhattan schools, President Wefald and the mayor to get support," Prieto said. "Thanks to the Collegian, The Manhattan Mercury and even The Topeka Capital-Journal, we gained a lot of momentum."

HALO reached part of its goal because TCI will air Univision in part with Knowledge TV on channel 19 from midnight to noon starting March 1, Richard Cofer, general manager of TCI, said.

Prieto said it is disappointing Manhattan doesn't have Univision already.

"It's sad. It's a prime-time network, and we don't have it in the Little Apple. It's an amazing resource for students, faculty and the community. When you have over a thousand students in Spanish classes, they need to be exposed to Spanish besides just in class."

HALO will continue to campaign to add the 24-hour Univision channel to TCI's listings.

Cofer said he understands HALO's request.

"I respect that they want it full-time, but there isn't a channel that we feel we can remove at this time. In my opinion, we would upset more than we would please," Cofer said.

"What we lose on Knowledge TV is minimal to what we gain in Univision. When additional analog space becomes available, we will do our best to get Univision on full time," he said.

Prieto said he is pleased with the compromise.

"It's a big step. I think it wouldn't have been possible if it wasn't for the students, faculty and community," he said.

Douglas Benson, associate professor of modern languages and faculty adviser for HALO, said he appreciates what TCI has done but still wants more.

"Who's going to watch it after midnight and in the morning?" Benson said. "Manhattan and KSU are quickly becoming more representative of the diversity and multicultural perspective of the rest of the United States.

"We can't learn about each other and ourselves if we don't have access to authentic forms of expression."

Erosion study nets professors recognition by Russian group

ANDREW DAVID WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State professors are being recognized for their research in land erosion caused by the flood of 1993.

Wayne Geyer, professor of agroforestry, and Ken Brooks, who teaches landscape architecture, studied the erosion of the Kansas River from Fort Riley to Wamego, Kan.

Geyer and Brooks were assisted with their research by Tom Neppl, a recent K-State graduate. Their research was funded by the U.S. Forestry Service.

Geyer and Brooks, along with 30 other Kansans, took their study to Russia for a worldwide ecology council in September 1996. Their study has since been published in the Russian Academy of Science's publication.

Geyer's research area at Tuttle Creek State Park lost $250,000 because of the 1993 flood.

"We took a negative — losing the valuable vegetation research area to the flood — and turned it into a positive," he said.

In their study, they used aerial photographic images to compare pre- and post-flood conditions. The 40-mile stretch they surveyed consisted of tree-covered acreage, grassland and cropland. Geyer and Brooks found that the banks of the river with a buffer zone of trees planted held on to the soil and prevented erosion. Riverbanks that were surrounded by grasslands lost about 80 lateral feet. Riverbanks surrounded by crops lost about 150 lateral feet.

> "WE TOOK A NEGATIVE... AND TURNED IT INTO A POSITIVE."
> WAYNE GEYER
> professor of agroforestry

"This proves what scientists have known for a long time — that trees protect stream banks from erosion," Geyer said. "This study puts hard numbers with these facts."

In their study area, Geyer estimates there were 1,800 acres lost.

"At $2,000 an acre, we are talking about $360,000, and that is a conservative figure," Geyer said.

Geyer and Brooks' research proved buffer strips near riverbeds caught sand and silt lost from upstream.

Ecologists and environmentalists, including Vice President Al Gore, now advocate the planting of buffer zones near flood plains.

"Every 500 years there is a great flood, like 1993, but every 30 years there is a smaller flood," Geyer said. "What we are concerned with is the 10-year flood. With buffer strips, we can effectively save acres of farmland from erosion."

CLIF PALMBERG Collegian

Wayne Geyer, left, professor of agroforestry, and Ken Brooks, who teaches landscape architecture, recently completed research on agricultural and landscape changes that were caused by the 1993 Kansas flood.

4 Kansas schools join to win aviation award

"We knew when we sent the proposal we had a good shot at it," Mohsen said. "Historically, we've done great in competition, and we haven't done any less this year."

Because of an internship Mohsen will begin later this year, he won't be able to help with the last phases of the project. William Thompson, graduate student in mechanical engineering, will take over as team leader.

"I just started grad school and don't know a whole lot about the project, but I'm looking forward to working on it," Thompson said.

Tackling a lot of high-demand technical areas and the students' seriousness helped put the team in position to win, Mohsen said.

"I thought it was great. I thought we deserved it. What we did wasn't a piece of cake," he said. "I knew we could do it with all the resources we had."

Commission gives approval to create new public park

The park's plan was developed through a series of 12 meetings where the community worked in groups to design, plan, prioritize development and brainstorm funding sources. Theme ideas from the community included neighborhood natural, sports and community parks.

"The theme was established by taking all elements suggested and creating a compromise," Allen said.

Allen said during the earlier critical meetings for the park, 30 to 40 members from the community attended.

"I think the community pursuit of the park and their persistence helped get the commission to pass the park plan and to buy the park property," he said.

Allen said summer intern Scott Stoddard, senior in landscape architecture, contributed a lot to the plan's development.

"Scott helped with a lot of the drawings and plans of the park," he said.

Stoddard said he helped with the initial planning stages of the park — design, layout of the facilities and the drawings for the commission. He said the park was the main project he worked on this summer.

"The park will give residents on the east side a park that is closer, one that they can call their own park," Stoddard said.

DeWeese said the planning of the park has been a great effort by the community in cooperation with the city.

"I think the success of this project is mainly due to the community becoming deeply involved," he said.

Increasing public awareness tops list of Hispanic group's objectives

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

The Hispanic American Leadership Organization begins this semester with a goal to increase the community's awareness of Hispanic culture.

Leo Prieto, HALO president, said HALO will sponsor three projects this semester. One project will promote Univision, the Spanish TV channel, by showing tapes of the channel.

"We want to have a Univisionathon on a big screen in the Union and maybe in the mall," Prieto said.

The second project HALO plans to do this semester is a Hispanic Youth and Empowerment Conference. HALO will bring in a speaker to talk about problems teen-agers face.

"We want to encourage high school students to continue their education. I couldn't think of a better way to help out the community than with the youth," Prieto said. "We want kids to think about their future. Many kids don't have a lot of direction."

HALO plans to end the semester with Cinco de Mayo. The members will celebrate the Spanish holiday in a park with food, a band, dancing and games, Prieto said.

Besides the big projects, HALO wants to work with Sigma Delta Pi to organize dance lessons and other activities in the Manhattan community, Prieto said.

HALO wants everyone to participate or help with its activities, Prieto said.

"The more people we get at these activities, the more successful we will be," he said. "The misconception that most people have is that it is specifically geared toward Hispanic students, but we welcome all cultures. Some people may not realize it, but there's a lot of culture here."

WILSON

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

A Geary County woman whose dogs killed an 11-year-old boy last April near Milford, Kan., was found guilty of unintentional second-degree murder Friday.

Sabine Davidson was also found guilty of endangering a child, Tramell Wilson, 9, who witnessed his older brother, Christopher, being mauled by three Rottweilers at their school bus stop.

Chris Biggs, Geary County district attorney and prosecutor for the case, said the verdict means Davidson could be sentenced to 11 to 50 years in prison, plus one more for the second charge.

Sentencing is scheduled for March 2. Davidson's husband, Jeffrey, will be tried March 23.

Biggs said the idea of being held liable for homicide committed by one's dogs isn't unusual. He said he recalled a 1984 case in Georgia involving a boy killed by three pit bulls in which the owner was convicted of involuntary manslaughter.

The original charge against the Davidsons was involuntary manslaughter, but an investigation into the case prompted Biggs' office to change it to unintentional second-degree murder. Biggs said the new charge could be called aggravated involuntary manslaughter, according to Kansas law.

"This is a relatively new statute, and a novel fact pattern," Biggs said of the charge and the case.

The investigation revealed that the Davidsons had trained their dogs to be vicious in defense of their owners without first training them to be obedient. Witnesses, including two dog trainers, told the court the dogs were out of control.

Christopher Wilson had climbed a tree with his brother to escape the Davidsons' dogs, on the morning of April 24, 1997. Wilson climbed out of the tree, when he was attacked and mauled while a busload of children watched.

Sabine Davidson was remanded to jail pending a $50,000 appeal bond. Biggs said he was pleased with the outcome of the trial.

"We got the best possible vote," he said.

Hale adopts computerized index system

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

Several periodical indexes in Hale Library have been canceled this semester.

Nelda Elder, chairwoman of collection management for the library, said the purchase of Expanded Academic Index has taken the place of eight index subscriptions.

"We're trying to provide a better service for students and staff by giving them more periodical titles, abstracts and text," Elder said. "Expanded Academic Index can be easily accessed from remote locations all over campus."

What do we think? The Collegian editorial board discusses the periodical shortcomings on Page 4.

Last March, Elder said the library went through the electronic indexes and compared them to see what articles they covered. The library only kept the indexes that didn't overlap.

"The goal of the whole project was to make the indexes economical while still containing access to all of the articles," she said.

The Expanded Academic Index costs $38,178 annually, and the total of the canceled indexes is $9,573 per year, Elder said.

"We are not saving any money, but we are adding valuable information students and staff can access all over campus," Elder said. "We also canceled many indexes to use the money for better information the undergraduate students can use."

Daniel Liestman, chairman of social sciences and humanities libraries, said the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature subscription has been canceled, but all of the copies since the turn of the century will remain in the library. He said the Readers' Guide is an index to a variety of popular magazines.

"Now the Expanded Academic Index, a computerized database found on the Web, includes most of the Readers' Guide articles plus many others," Liestman said.

The Expanded Academic Index can only be accessed on computers using K-State as its Internet service provider, said Jeneen LaSee-Willemssen, education librarian and electronic resource coordinator.

"Computers on campus, including dorms, can access Expanded Academic Index," LaSee-Willemssen said. "The program checks the Internet protocol address to see if the user has a K-State Internet service provider address, and if it doesn't, Expanded Academic Index can't be accessed."

Josh Ratliff, senior in marketing, said he could see where students might have trouble finding specific magazine articles, but said he does like some parts of the database.

"One thing I like about the database is that the abstracts are right there," Ratliff said. "It gives me a glimpse of what the article is about to see if it even has the information I need before I go to the hassle of looking it up."

In addition to the Readers' Guide, the Applied Social Sciences Index and abstracts, General Science Index, Humanities Index and Social Sciences Index have been canceled because they can be found on Expanded Academic Index.

Liestman said this computerized index has more than 450 magazine titles and more options.

"The Readers' Guide only lists the name of the articles, and a student might waste time looking it up if it doesn't apply to their specific subject," Liestman said.

Another change is the periodicals are now updated on a daily basis instead of a monthly basis.

"The Expanded Academic Index is like one-stop shopping," Liestman said. "Not only can students find citations on speacific topics — in some cases, they can find the full article itself even with the pictures."

Kansas high schoolers compete in battle of the brains

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

High school students from across Kansas were on the campus Friday and Saturday for a competition of the mind.

The eighth-annual Kansas Academic Decathlon brought more than 180 students to K-State for a chance to show off what they have learned about the global economy.

Students of varying academic levels competed as a team from 18 Kansas high schools. The participants are divided into three brackets, based on the students' grade point average. This allows all students to compete in the learning competition, said Carla Jones, associate dean of Student Life and Academic Decathlon administrator.

"It's neat to see students participate in all academic levels," she said. "The A students only compete against other A students, and the C students get to compete against other C students, allowing for success at all levels. Students gain a lot from personal motivation that way."

The contest participants are tested in 11 different areas, ranging from math and science to speeches and interviews. Each competition centers around the decathlon theme, the global economy.

The theme changes annually, letting students vary their learning opportunities, Jones said. Past decathlon themes include the United Nations, biotechnology and space exploration.

One decathlon participant has competed for three years and found it rewarding to learn about the global economy this year.

"You learn a lot, since the tests and themes are different every year. I like this year's theme more than some of past one's," said Scott Benolkin, senior at Shawnee Mission West

Volunteers make Academic Decathlon possible

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

When the Kansas Academic Decathlon rolls into Manhattan every year, volunteers come out of the woodwork to facilitate the competition.

More than 60 K-State students, faculty and alumni donated their time to serve as judges, proctors and graders for the event. It is coordinated and hosted by K-State's Mortar Board, a senior honorary.

Carla Jones, associate dean of Student Life and Mortar Board adviser, has helped coordinate the competition for four years.

"It is all based on volunteers, with 60 to 100 volunteers yearly. Mortar Board has maintained its commitment to the event, and that takes a lot of dedication from each group of students," Jones said.

The decathlon is Mortar Board's service project each year, with the work beginning the spring prior to the competition.

Because Mortar Board members serve for one year, the tasks change hands often and much has to be done to keep things in order, Jones said.

"We work hard all year to handle details with the decathlon and make it a success. Besides serving as the

Lewinsky's attorney eager to deal with Starr; reports of witness to White House affair arise

WASHINGTON D.C. — Anxious to cut a deal for immunity, the lawyer for Monica Lewinsky said Sunday his 24-year-old client will tell all she knows to Whitewater prosecutors. "The chips will fall as they may," he said.

Attorney William Ginsburg said he has verbally indicated to investigators what Lewinsky will tell them in exchange for immunity from prosecution.

"I will remain in Washington as long as it takes to see that the truth in every detail, wherever it may fall, comes out," Ginsburg said.

Negotiations of such a sensitive nature could take weeks.

President Clinton talked this weekend with heavyweight advisers brought back to Washington to help him through the crisis brought on by the allegations of a sexual relationship with Lewinsky and attempts at a cover-up.

In the first hint of an eye witness, ABC reported that the president and Lewinsky were caught in an intimate encounter in a private area of the White House in spring 1996, shortly before the White House intern was moved to a job at the Pentagon. ABC cited several unidentified sources for its information.

The office of prosecutor Kenneth Starr declined comment on the ABC report. If true, such a witness would provide important corroborating evidence for Lewinsky's account if she reverses her current denial of an affair with the president. In secretly recorded conversations, Lewinsky had said she believed "nobody saw anything happen between us."

Senior administration officials and longtime Clinton friends, including two who talked to him this weekend, said the president was shocked and depressed in the first hours of the controversy but has bounced back defiant.

"One thing that isn't going on and that's discussions about any resignation," said Rahm Emanuel, a top White House adviser.

Clinton loyalists attacked Starr for having former White House staffer Linda Tripp wired so she could secretly record a conversation with Lewinsky.

"I don't approve of some of their tactics," Ginsburg said of Starr and his staff, but "I have nothing but the highest praise for their professionalism and their attitude."

Pope John Paul II concludes 5-day Cuba visit, calls on its bishops to strengthen Catholic church

Havana, Cuba — Pope John Paul II, ending a spiritual journey to a dispirited land, summoned Cubans at home and Cubans in exile to new paths of reconciliation Sunday and called this country's bishops to the task of helping lead them there.

With his carefully chosen words, the ailing, 77-year-old pope put himself and his churchmen squarely in the middle of the four-decade-long Cuban showdown.

It was the climax of a difficult five-day pilgrimage during which the Roman Catholic pontiff had to balance criticism of Cuba's communist system with the need to bolster and foster the Cuban church.

The leader of that system, President Fidel Castro, saw him off at Havana's airport, declared Cuba had nothing to hide from the world and congratulated the pope for visiting what some choose to call communism's last bulwark.

"For every word you have said — even those I might disagree with — on behalf of all the Cuban people, Holy Father, I thank you!" Castro declared.

Earlier Sunday, Castro sat front and center for an open-air Mass in Havana's vast Plaza of the Revolution, and heard a sharp attack by the pope on one of the Cuban leader's own favorite targets, neoliberal capitalism.

The pontiff warned Cubans against embracing the blind market forces of global capitalism. "The wealthy grow ever wealthier, while the poor grow ever poorer," John Paul declared to explosive applause.

But he also had pointed words for Castro, who had urged his people to pack the final Mass, repeating appeals for respect for freedom of conscience, for greater religious freedom and on behalf of political prisoners.

"The pope, in his heart and with his words of encouragement, embraces all who suffer injustice," John Paul said to applause and waving flags — and to silence from government officials.

The Vatican entourage said, meanwhile, that Cuban authorities had promised a quick response to its appeal to Castro earlier this week for release of about 200 prisoners.

The Mass unfolded in an epic setting of color, faith and history-in-the-making, in a vast square dominated by towering portraits of revolutionary martyr Ernesto "Che" Guevara and — temporarily — Jesus Christ.

The faithful, the curious and those simply heeding Castro's call had set out from outlying towns by bus as early as 2 a.m. They were joined by pilgrims from around the world, including anti-Castro exiles.

No,
I don't need money

Call home just to say "hi."

Wanna really surprise your parents? Why not flip your Wildcat Card over and follow the easy calling card instructions and call home just for the fun of it? And when they hear your sweet voice NOT asking for money, maybe they'll finally realize you're not the "irresponsible teenager" they once thought you were.

What a concept. Why worry about carrying cash or checks when there's an easier, safer way to make purchases. The Wildcat Card is the one card to carry for nearly all of your everyday needs. Use it to access your Wildcat checking account for books and supplies, for food and beverages, as a library card and in many campus vending machines. This card also allows access to your financial aid surplus. Transactions are debited directly from your account and detailed on one simple monthly statement.

That's not all. The Wildcat Card also works at many participating merchants off-campus and acts as a universal ATM card, giving you 24-hour access to your account in Manhattan and around the world. (And be sure to let your parents know that, with the Wildcat Card, they can deposit money directly into your account from their hometown bank, free of charge.)

It's that easy. So take the hassle-free way to get things done on- and off- campus—take advantage of the Wildcat Card. For more information call Commerce on campus at 532-3500 or the Campus Card Center at 532-6399.

Potential K-Staters get advice at Ag Expo

AMY BICKEL
Kansas State Collegian

High school and transfer students got an idea of what K-State and the College of Agriculture has to offer on Saturday.

The College of Agriculture sponsored an Ag Expo, which demonstrated to about 220 students from across the state the details of different agricultural careers and interests.

"We really want (students) to see what a day of college will be like after they graduate," said Cody Dick, junior in agricultural technology management and coordinator of the event. "It gives them a better understanding of what major they'd like to be in. Get them interested in what they want to do."

The Expo is one of the big spring recruiting events, said Jenny Volk, sophomore in animal science and co-coordinator of the event.

She said it was the first time for the Ag Expo. The Expo took the place of Ag Careers Day, which the college used to sponsor for high school students.

At the Expo, students were able to listen to and ask questions of K-State alumni who have careers in agriculture. The alumni gave students advice about choosing a career or major in an area the student was interested in.

"It's exciting to have alumni come back and show how they are successful now," Volk said.

Also, to get an idea of the majors in agriculture, students were able to visit nine departments and talk with professors.

"I'm really interested in agriculture, and especially animal sciences, so I decided to come," said Amy Brown, a high school student from Girard, Kan.

Dick said attendance at the Expo was good compared to other recruiting events.

"Our numbers in the College of Agriculture have gone up every year. If we really get students started thinking about majors earlier, the better chance of getting them to come to K-State," he said.

NATIONAL GUARD SOLDIER OF THE YEAR

Student advances to nationals

AMANDA DAVIDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Every year, the National Guard chooses one soldier to receive the Soldier of the Year award. The National Guard bases the decision on knowledge of its program and appearance of uniform, Lt. Col. Robert Bloomquist said.

> "I DECIDED TO COMPETE FOR THE SOLDIER OF THE YEAR AWARD BECAUSE I WANTED AN OPPORTUNITY TO SHOW MYSELF AS A STAND-OUT SOLDIER, NOT JUST ANOTHER GUY."
> TODD LOUGHNEY
> sophomore in animal sciences and industry

"The Soldier of the Year award is given to the best of the best in the National Guard," he said.

This year, Todd Loughney, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, is that soldier for Kansas this year.

The competition for this award starts at a local company level with about 80 participants, Loughney explained.

Each participant must be knowledgeable of the National Guard commands, programs and regulations. Appearance of uniform and soldiers' actions are also graded by the board. The board is made up of five to six command sergeant majors who act as judges. Each board member asks one question from a different topic and gives points for the participant's appearance.

The topic areas consist of military leadership, military weapons for combat survivability, general knowledge of combat survivability and other basic soldier skills.

"I decided to compete for the Soldier of the Year award because I wanted an opportunity to show myself as a stand-out soldier, not just another guy," Loughney said.

Loughney has won at four different competition levels to earn the honor of being the Soldier of the Year for Kansas. At each level of competition, he met with a new board.

"Boards are feared by most soldiers, and even though I get nervous every time, once I'm in there I relax and can feel at ease," Loughney said.

In addition to being a member of the National Guard and ROTC program, Loughney also is a student at K-State.

Loughney graduated from Pullman High School in Pullman, Wash., in May 1993. In August 1993, Loughney enlisted in the United States Army. He attended One Stop Unit Training in Fort Knox, Ky., and was selected top honor graduate. In January 1994, Loughney was stationed at Fort Riley.

Loughney left the army in summer 1996 and quickly joined the National Guard. Loughney is a member of the First Battalion 635th Armor in Junction City. He is receiving a four-year National Guard Scholarship to K-State and will participate in the ROTC program for four years and plans to apply for pre-veterinary school after graduation.

The next step for Loughney is going on to his fifth level of competition — nationals. Nationals will be in April in Albuquerque, N.M. Sgt. Maj. Warren Smith has attended many national competitions and will be accompanying Loughney. Smith was also on the last board that judged Loughney and awarded him the honor of Soldier of the Year.

"Todd possesses high physical and mental appearance, which seemed to make him stand out as a cool and confident soldier," Smith said.

Loughney will compete against men and women who are Soldiers of the Year from the 21 states west of the Mississippi.

"I feel confident I have as good as chance as anybody. I have studied just as hard, I'm sure," he said.

Regents reject plan to ease satellite competition with universities

ALECIA TERRELL
Kansas State Collegian

Wamego is not in Highland County.

Junction City is not near Cloud County.

But those counties' community colleges have established branches there, spelling trouble for K-State.

The popularity of community colleges near Manhattan is on the rise, resulting in a loss of K-State students and money.

Other Kansas universities face similar competition. K-State administrators recently supported a proposal by the House Select Committee on Higher Education to prevent these satellite campuses from teaching courses within a 20-mile radius of four-year universities.

Sue Peterson, assistant to the president for governmental relations, said administrators were disappointed when the plan was rejected by the Kansas Board of Regents. The issue, however, isn't dead.

"This is an issue that has been long-standing," Peterson said. "I have been to four meetings already, and they are supposed to come up with some sort of plan. For now, there won't be anymore plans to stop community colleges from competing locally. Everything is on hold."

Ronald Downey, associate provost for planning and analysis, said 150 to 175 students attend classes each semester at the Highland County branch in Wamego or the new Cloud County branch in Junction City.

This number has already torn into the enrollment at K-State and continues to increase each semester, he said.

"Highland Community College recently did a survey that showed several statistics from their college," Downey said. "From this survey we found that there are usually three main factors that influence students to take classes from these nearby colleges."

Cost and ease topped students' lists of reasons, he said.

"The first factor was convenience, usually because the class fits in with students' schedules. Also, students have mentioned the (community college) classes being a lot easier than university classes," Downey said. "The third reason was that the courses are cheaper."

After taking courses at these satellite campuses, students transfer credit hours back to four-year schools for full credit, and universities lose money, Downey said.

Leadership needed in library funding options

Instead of complaining about what Hale Library lacks, in terms of journal subscriptions and the acquisition of books, perhaps students should start asking the important questions.

Such as, where is the support for the library, and why hasn't the administration made it a priority?

The contents of the library, the very center of academia, has never been a No. 1 fund-raising priority. Now, long after President Jon Wefald told the Collegian that a formal request for library funds would be made to the KSU Foundation, this step has not been taken.

Yes, there was a high priority on building our beautiful building, but apparently, a low priority on journals and books to fill it. In the same semester, students and faculty watched space in the library increase and future acquisitions being cut significantly.

Be heard. Voice your opinion on library funding to Jon Wefald at 532-6221 or Tim Riemann at 532-6541.

If the administration was aware of increasing inflation and the predatory nature of periodical publishers 10 years ago, why didn't they establish a fund or prioritize acquisitions before the library contents became a crisis?

The lack of advance planning has left the library in a situation that we can no longer afford to ignore. If the university has any hope for growth and improvement, it cannot have a library which continues to lag further and further behind.

The Task Force to Plan Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century made three suggestions to boost library budget levels, the most important being a request for state funds.

If Wefald does not make this an issue at the Statehouse, who will?

Thankfully, Gov. Bill Graves proposed a 0.5-percent increase in the Other Operating Expenses of the library, but if approved by the Kansas Legislature, this would only add $160,000 and take effect in July.

The third suggestion in the task force concerns the proposed creation of a student fee. The administration and Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, have repeatedly urged students to take the initiative of funding the library with a privilege fee.

The University Library Committee members, including Hobrock, should attend tonight's privilege fee meeting to further explain the financial needs of the library.

The idea of a grass-roots student movement is great, but this is another example of this campus waiting for some person or group to stop talking and start acting.

With the library facing a crisis in funding, Wefald or Student Body President Tim Riemann should step forward and offer the leadership this situation desperately needs.

Strip away political labels best way to make quality decision

VIEWPOINT

Greetings and welcome back from the Fiesta Bowl-winning semester break. I am your host, and I hope everyone is well-rested and prepared to conquer another semester. Writing for the Collegian has always been a goal of mine, and I finally accomplish this goal during my hopefully last undergraduate semester. The brain is not quite yet back in academic mode, so I must address something that has been bothering me since November. It is time to vent, so enjoy the ride.

Enthusiasm is the best disease to catch. Try to infect people with it on a daily basis. I look for the positive and inspirational in people. As I was taught, automatically assuming malice toward someone never gets anywhere.

However, some aspects about the human spirit bother me. Yes, I know I am contradicting myself, but fortunately, I am not perfect. Instead of whining and complaining about pet peeves, think really hard how to eliminate the whines and complaints. I am sure people get annoyed with me. My co-workers probably get tired of my constant rambling of politics and that I write everything down in my planner. Hopefully they have learned to accept me with my faults. Anyway, here is one of my pet peeves.

I do not care for labels. I do not mean the ones that are difficult to peel off because I have no fingernails. I'm talking about the kind of labels that are placed on people to determine what they will do. True, some labels are necessary, like saying I am a female and a student senator (but please continue to read). But two labels I do not care for, even though I do use them, are liberal and conservative. The curse of these labels is that once one is attached to a politician, the politician is expected to always act in that way.

Well folks, to make good decisions, that behavior pattern might occasionally be broken. Just because a person is labeled a liberal, usually a Democrat, does not guarantee a vote to raise taxes and increase government spending. A conservative, the label of most Republicans, cannot be counted on to cut taxes and reduce social programs. It drives me crazy when, once the label has been attached, decisions that are inconsistent with the label are deemed as bad behavior.

People then want to painfully peel the label off and attach a new one.

For example, in the world of student government last semester, I voted for a fee increase and, not only did I vote, I also authored the amendment for the increase.

Now being the registered Republican that I am, this decision caused quite a stir within Student Senate. It was and still is amazing to me to receive phone calls and e-mails calling me a traitor. Well, my response to that is good decisions should never be predetermined.

A competent decision-maker will judge each issue based on the facts and figures presented — not on what traditionally the label has obligated that person to do. Maybe, the 60 people in Student Senate who represent the population of K-State can accomplish that goal.

Conservatives have been taught not to associate with the liberals and vice versa. Ideas from opposite sides of the aisle are bogus and will never work. However, if liberals and conservatives would actually listen — not just hear — what was said, then maybe progress could be made.

Instead, politicians assume poor decisions from people with different labels and always and without a doubt believe people with similar labels will agree with each other. The political system would be more efficient if people spent less time trying to second-guess each other and more time making decisions with their hearts and minds based on what is the best for everyone at that particular time. So, peel off the political label every now and then.

Better decisions will be made, and it is easier on the skin.

Grieving fosters growth through turmoil

I tried to sleep last night, but all I could do was think about writing my first column. It's the first time in a long time that I actually stopped looking ahead and came to the conclusion that I must live life one day at a time. Recent life experiences shook me up and made me realize how little time we have with our loved ones.

I was excited when I received a phone call from a good friend who had asked my girlfriend and I to ring in the New Year with him and his soon-to-be fiancee. He called and asked me to be there when he proposed to the woman he has grown to love.

I was somewhat surprised because the thought of marriage has never crossed my mind and there was little, if any, advice I could give him. I knew it would be a special moment, so I thought it would be best if they were by themselves. He insisted my girlfriend and I be there, at least up to the moment before the big question.

Although I am somewhat uneducated on the etiquette of proposing, I knew that a man would be wise to ask her parents for permission first. I mentioned this to him, and we continued to talk for a while. I knew he really loved her.

The time had come for him to propose, but I was here in Manhattan, unable to be there. I was unable to reach them personally to wish them a Happy New Year's and to see how things went. A day later, I received a phone call, and he told me they did not even get to go out, because he had the flu. He heard my message on the answering machine but was not able to get out of bed.

Up to this point in my lif, I lived by planning what I would do the next day or the next week and rarely lived life to the fullest because I was always looking ahead to tomorrow. Sometimes I think we all do that, look ahead and plan ahead, and rarely enjoy life day by day.

I was preparing for the following weekend activities of going back home to Kansas City for my cousin's wedding. My family is big, and I did not get a chance to see everyone over winter break because I knew I would see them at the wedding. I always thought I could see them tomorrow and if tomorrow, did not allow, then the following week or family gathering would. I always seemed to miss those opportunities to see my family, talk to my cousins and let everyone know what's been going on, because I always thought there would be many more chances.

The weekend before I planned to go home to Kansas City, I was awakened several different ways. The first wake-up came the Saturday before I left for home, when my girlfriend called me, crying. I was unable to understand her on the answering machine, but I knew whatever it was, it was bad.

I was able to reach her late in the afternoon, and she told me her brother was in a terrible car wreck. I felt trapped and wanted to leave for Kansas City to be with her and her family, but because I was living for tomorrow I had to stay and finish my winter intersession class.

From this point on, it seemed that when it rained, it really poured. I received a phone call the following day, which was Sunday morning, when my friend who had planned to propose called. I was sadly awakened by the news that he might never get a chance to ask her parents for their daughter's hand in marriage because her father died early that morning. I did not know what to do or say, and could not think things could be much worse.

I left with some friends to get my mind off these tragedies, only to return to another sad phone call. I was informed by my parents that my cousin, who was to be married the following Saturday, had given birth to her baby, and that her baby lived for a short while and then died. I was to leave Manhattan so I could attend the funeral that Tuesday.

Life threw me into several situations I had to experience alone. I am dealing with loss and, at the same time, trying to figure out why I always thought I had tomorrow.

In my 23 years of existence, I cannot remember how many times I told my parents or any other person I care for, "I love you." I have cried to my girlfriend because I know my parents, brother and sister know I love them, but I just cannot tell them. Sometimes I wonder if they really know how much I care.

I have had a hard time telling anyone "I love you" and, up to this point, I realize, it was because I always thought I had tomorrow. I thought I would always have tomorrow to tell Mom and Dad I love them. I would always have tomorrow to tell my grandmother how it feels to attend a university or what I do here.

I would have our next family gathering to see my whole family. I have recently, we're talking days, come to understand that tomorrow is not guaranteed.

I am writing about this because it is part of my grieving process and I think it will help me better understand my life. I would also like for everyone who has felt that there was always tomorrow to tell someone, "I love you," to take a look at what I have written today. I have learned much and will stop planning ahead. I am going start living life to its fullest. I missed many visits with loved ones because I believed I would see them later. I had to find out the hard way about life's limited opportunities.

I am sorry my first column is a sad one, but I can now understand that it is easier for me to express myself by writing than by talking. I understand that we sometimes need to plan ahead but when it routinely interrupts us from telling someone how we feel or from visiting with loved ones, we start to live for tomorrow and forget about the present.

Mac removal quality business decision

Editor,

Donald Crawford's letter concerning the removal of Macs from the CNS labs says it all. The reasons he provides for abandoning the system in the labs will quite easily justify the removal of all central support for Macintosh operating systems and any other equipment that lacks sufficient market share.

Mac users see the handwriting on the wall as CNS retreats from the Mac inch by inch, and campus information technology people reassure themselves that Mac really is just a pain in the byte that they'd rather not have to deal with. By the measures the IT professionals use to assess the worth of an operating system, Mac should have been jettisoned from K-State long ago.

Last I checked, however, this is a university, not a business, and the standards we use to determine whether equipment stays or goes should include the extent to which that equipment promotes the primary objective of higher education: creativity in research and teaching.

If market share and public demand are to be the measures we use for such things, then we should indeed rename ourselves Microsoft University, for Microsoft now dominates the market in desktop operating systems and office software — it outsells everyone on the block and is about to muscle Netscape out of the browser business (CNS take note). If we apply market-driven measures to everything we do here, I suppose a number of programs should get the ax.

Of course, that is absurd. Universities are not businesses, but havens for students, scholars and teachers, many of whom invested thousands of dollars of their own money to create and store their research and teaching materials on Mac operating systems, or who come to us from public schools that use Macs. The question, then, is not whether the public likes the Mac or whether Apple has fumbled its marketing of the system, which is an entirely different issue.

The question is whether the university will abandon this system without an openly debated plan that accommodates the members of this community who have relied, in good faith, on the university's previous support for it. Meanwhile, Mac users who have not declared a major could give Crawford a call to see if they can work in his Mac lab.

Greek friendships forged, not forced

Editor,

Many people, including Brandi Hertig, feel that greek life isn't right for them. That's a decision we all should respect. Her column, however, brutally and entirely cheapens a fundamental issue: many greeks find a brotherhood or sisterhood that is actually true and that they feel very powerfully about.

> "FOR US, FRIENSHIP IS NOT FORGED, IT IS REAL."
> KAREN RUCKERT
> senior in history and political science

It may be hard for an outsider to believe, but millions of men and women across time and place have found genuine, unconditional friendships, receive tenfold what they have contributed, and become better people through fraternity or sorority membership.

Those of us who have found true brotherhood or sisterhood don't have to "pretend to be something we're not," because we are accepted for who we are. For us, friendship is not forged, it is real. We may be closer to some people than others (which is inevitable in any organization with 15 to 150 members) but we feel genuine concern and respect for all of them. We know we can count on them no matter what, just as they can count on us. We don't "give up part of ourselves in exchange for three letters."

We receive so much more than we give through the experiences, challenges and unconditional friendships we have found in a fraternity or sorority.

This is true brotherhood and sisterhood.

Macs remain useful for many students

Editor,

While reading Friday's Collegian, I came across an opinion offered by Donald P. Crawford in regards to the decision of Computing and Network Services to eliminate Macs from the public lab. He agrees that CNS's decision was indeed a good one and goes on to support this opinion with what he believes to be factual information, when in fact it is erroneous. He states that it is hard to justify the support of Macs in the labs because of the expense of the platform.

I would like to point out that if Crawford and CNS would look around a little bit, they might realize that there are now a number of clone manufacturers who are making machines that run the Mac OS at a very reasonable cost. He also states that he can foresee continued public access to Macintosh computers resulting in additional lab-access fees. I say to look around and see what other universities might be doing in this regard. He may very well be right, but there also comes a time when people in the Midwest have to quit looking for freebies and handouts all the time.

Quit whining. We have some of the lowest fees in the nation as well as the Big 12. He states that he "knows all the arguments Apple users present to keep the presence of Macs in our organization." One of these being that design-based programs and whether they run on PCs. Whether they run on PCs isn't really the issue. As a graphic designer, I use a Mac, and I have also worked on PCs in graphic-based programs such as Photoshop, Freehand, Illustrator, QuarkXPress, etc. I can say first hand that the PC is not a graphic machine.

The monitor resolution is not as good, and a lot of Win95 machines are still running 16-bit color. This is unacceptable in the graphic design industry, where we have the access to millions of colors resolution. If he were to look into the prices, he would find that programs such as Adobe Photoshop, Macromedia Freehand, QuarkXPress and Adobe Pagemaker cost the same whether they are for a PC or for a Mac.

> "TEN YEARS AGO, PC USERS SAID THE MAC WAS DEAD. TEN YEARS AGO THEY WERE WRONG, AS THEY ARE TODAY."
> NEAL WOLLENBERG
> MFA candidate, visual communications

He goes on further to state that, within his curriculum (Architecture, Planning and Design,) there is less than 1 percent of computer users who use Macs. He then applied this percentage to the business community. Of course, this denies the educational arena, which Apple still has a very strong customer base because of its ease of use, but he also eliminates any business like mine or S & N Design and many printing companies, such as Educational Publishers, which use the Mac OS and are running Apple machines exclusively.

Crawford also said the majority always wins in this country. Thus providing justification for elimination of the minority. That's a pretty good attitude, Crawford. Why don't we apply that as a blanket generalization to all minorities and see how that works out. Crawford also goes on to state that Apple has consistently run in the red for years. As of last quarter, Apple was back in black so to speak and was looking to further profits based on a larger market share than it has had.

Apple also has plans to do as it did many years ago when it was consistently running in the black, by targeting educational users and providing more accessibility for creation of software. Crawford would do well to research the object before creating an opinion about it. Ten years ago, PC users said the Mac was dead. Ten years ago they were wrong, as they are today.

Student wants end to legalized abortion

Editor,

To acknowledge the 25th anniversary of the infamous Roe vs. Wade decision handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court, I would like to take this opportunity to denounce and condemn abortion as the killing of innocents that it truly is. Too many people today believe that abortion is just another means of birth control. Abortion is birth prevented, not birth control.

Having and raising children is a formidable task that many people are just not ready to commit to, regardless of their age, gender or other category. That is a very normal part of being a human. However, these are considerations a person must make before getting involved in an intimate relationship. Once you have stepped over that line, you have a responsibility to both your partner and to any child that might result from the union.

I hope that in my lifetime, I will see the end of legalized abortion in the American society, but I am not holding my breath. There are too many irresponsible people in our society to make that a certainty. To conclude, I'd like to issue a challenge to all of you to either own up to your decisions and take the responsibility that comes with intercourse, or keep your pants on.

Macs still important in today's world

Editor,

In response to Donald Crawford's opinion that the "tiny minority" of Macs have lost — um, no. I believe they are still very much an important part of today's world. In fact, last quarter they made a profit of $47 million. Looks like they're not in the red, eh?

Let's not try to brainwash everyone any further than Microsoft already has.

And you say, "the majority wins in this country?" Oh, OK. Well, a lot of people drive Ford vehicles. Does that mean everyone should? Are you supporting monopolization of the computer world?

Let's see ... "CNS has to spend its resources keeping hardware and software updated and running smoothly." Is there really any question as to which platform continues to be the leader in ease of use?

Here are some of the things created on Macintosh for the Wintel World: The Win95 logo, Windows95 packaging, Intel's Flying Pentium Ads, Windows Magazine, PC Magazine, PC World magazine, IBM's print advertising and print advertising and materials for Microsoft. Oh, and you know Pepsi's nifty new can design? That was done on a Macintosh.

> "ARE YOU SUPPORTING MONOPOLIZATION OF THE COMPUTER WORLD?"
> SEAN J. RYLAND
> senior in computer engineering

Everyone looks at market-share — how much money is spent on PCs compared to Macs. Well, if you're happy with the machine you're using, why replace it? Mac users simply don't buy a new computer as often.

Anything you need to do can be done on a Mac. Did you know more than half of the Internet's web sites are created on a Macintosh?

Apple is bigger than Dell Computer Corp. or Gateway 2000. Is anybody questioning their future? Contrary to public opinion, the Mac OS market is growing, not shrinking. Apple is not going away in spite of all the irresponsible, unsubstantiated and misguided things written about it almost daily by people who should know better.

One more thing — does the Fortune 500 mean anything? Apple is ranked 150. Microsoft is ranked 172. And Nike is ranked 223.

Gibbs, Williams return to the scene of Super Bowl XXII win over Broncos

SAN DIEGO — No doubt Joe Gibbs and Doug Williams flashed back 10 years when they participated in the coin toss before Sunday's Super Bowl.

On Jan. 31, 1988, in the only other Super Bowl played in San Diego, Gibbs coached the Washington Redskins to a 42-10 triumph over John Elway and the Denver Broncos.

Williams threw four touchdown passes as the Redskins scored a record 35 second-quarter points.

Williams and former Grambling coach Eddie Robinson also participated in the pregame coin toss. Williams will succeed Robinson next fall.

"I remember a real togetherness on that team, great people," Gibbs said. "At the end, we had one of the most focused teams I've ever coached. Everything in San Diego seemed to go right for us."

Gibbs, elected to the Pro Football Hall of Fame two years ago, admitted he misses coaching.

"I remember our last Super Bowl (when the Redskins beat Buffalo 37-24 six years ago), I went out on the field and I was standing there with (former defensive lineman) Charles Mann," Gibbs recalled. "He said, 'Now that it's over with, it's kind of a downer. The thrill is getting here.'

"He's right. It's the wins, the losses, the practices, the funny things that happen in the locker room. Those are the things I miss about coaching"

LOSERS DINE OUT: Los Angeles Clippers owner Donald T. Sterling picked a good game to miss.

While the Clippers were losing 99-81 to the hapless Denver Nuggets some 100 miles to the north on Saturday night, Sterling was having dinner in nearby Del Mar with Oakland Raiders owner Al Davis.

Sterling moved the Clippers from San Diego to Los Angeles in 1984 — two years after Davis moved the Raiders from Oakland to Los Angeles.

Davis moved his team back to Oakland in 1995, but there were reports during Super Bowl week that he might move the Raiders back to LA.

The Raiders had a 4-12 record this season; the Clippers are 10-33. The Nuggets snapped a 23-game losing streak with Saturday night's victory, just their third in 41 games.

"PSST, YOU SELLING?:" Those words have been heard often throughout the week. Three hours before Sunday's game, two fans in the Qualcomm Stadium parking lot wearing Brett Favre jerseys were begging passersby for tickets.

"We've come a long way to see our team," one said.

The man said he'd pay $1,000 for a ticket. The other fan said he'd heard tickets were going for upwards of $2,000. The face value on Super Bowl tickets was $275 for the majority of seats and $350 for the others.

TRAFFIC IN THE SKY: Long before the Super Bowl began, the sky was crowded with aircraft advertising their products or just hanging around.

The Budweiser and Goodyear blimps circled overhead, and at one stage, three airplanes flew in a line with signs trailing behind.

The first said, "Hey, Wisconsin. Here for the cheese?"

The second said, "You betcha!"

And the third said, "Real California Cheese."

FIRST POINTS IMPORTANT: Teams scoring first won 23 of the 31 Super Bowls before Sunday's game. One of the eight that didn't was the Broncos 10 years ago. They took a 10-0 lead over the Redskins before being crushed.

THE NEXT SUPER BOWLS: Next year's Super Bowl will be played in Miami. Atlanta plays host to the game in two years, Tampa in three and San Francisco in five. The game four years from now hasn't been awarded. San Diego officials, bidding against New Orleans later this year, hope to get it.

FOUR TOPS WITHDRAW: Due to a death in the family, The Four Tops withdrew from the halftime show and were replaced by The Temptations, who said before the game they would dedicate and perform the song "Can't Help Myself" to The Four Tops.

TURNOVERS USUALLY THE STORY: The NFC brought a 13-game winning streak over the AFC into Sunday's game. The key factor? Turnovers. AFC teams committed 44 and NFC teams just 10 during that time. The tally was 10-0 in the last three games.

A BEAUTIFUL DAY: The skies were clear, the sun was shining and there was no sign of rain as the Super Bowl started. That's no surprise, considering the fact that the city's average rainfall per year is 9.5 inches.

El Niño and its potentially devastating rain failed to materialize as some had feared.

Elway finally earns elusive Super Bowl ring

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN DIEGO — The old dude finally did it.

John Elway and the Denver Broncos won a Super Bowl for themselves and the AFC by beating the Green Bay Packers 31-24 Sunday in one of the most exciting games ever.

It gave the 37-year-old Elway his first win in four tries and the AFC its first in 14.

Sure, he had help.

He got it from MVP Terrell Davis, who gained 157 yards in 30 carries and scored on three one-yard runs, including the winner with 1:45 left in the game. Davis did it despite a migraine headache that caused him to miss most of the second quarter.

For Elway, carried off the field by his teammates, this was vindication in perhaps his last shot at a title. He rode off as the oldest quarterback ever to win a Super Bowl.

"For all the Broncos fans who never had this feeling, we finally got it done," Elway said.

"You wonder if you're going to win or if you're going to run out of years."

The victory kept Denver from becoming the first team ever to lose five Super Bowls— it lost one in 1978, before Elway arrived.

The win meant vindication for the AFC, which hadn't won since the Raiders, then in Los Angeles, beat Washington 38-9 in 1984, Elway's first season.

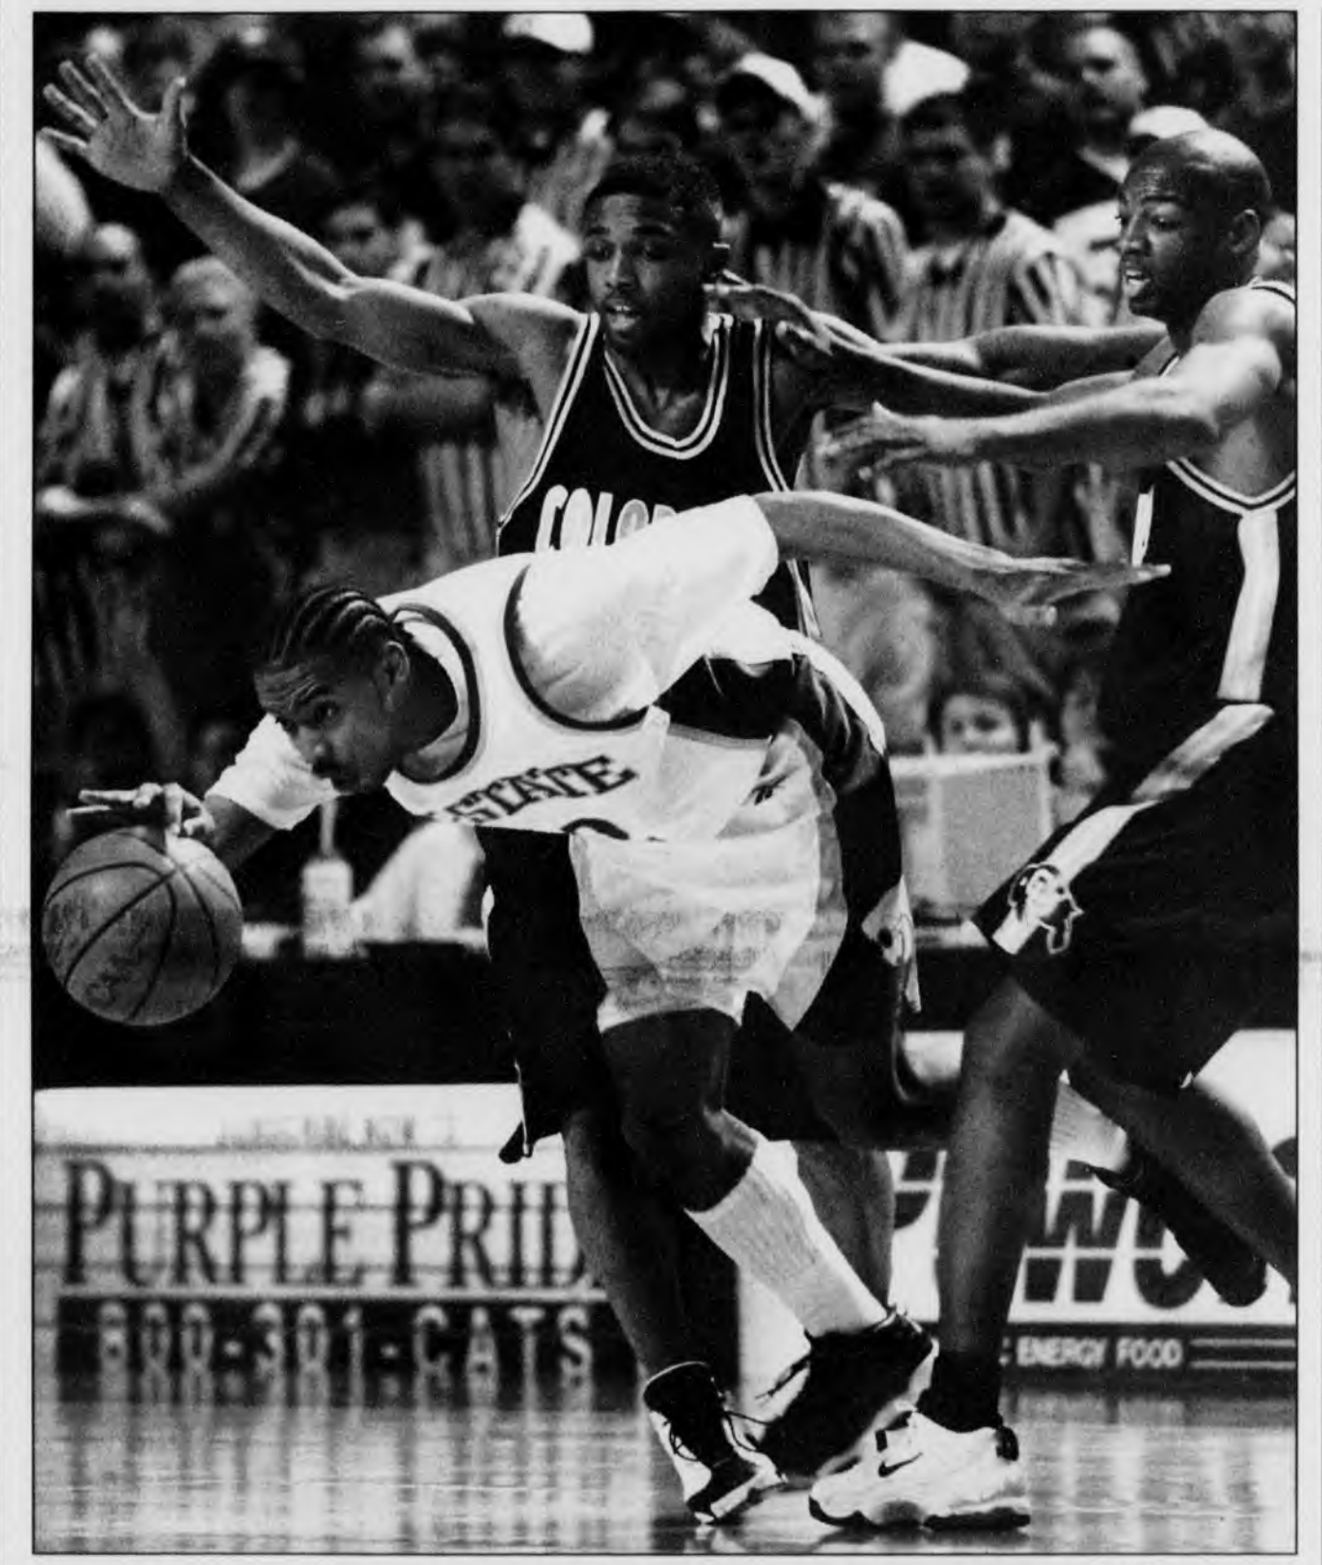
And finally, it was the first win for the quarterback class of 1983 that included Elway, Jim Kelly and Dan Marino.

"I knew it was a long time coming for him," Davis said of his quarterback.

The final chance for the defending champion Packers ended when John Mobley knocked down Brett Favre's pass from the Denver 31 with 28 seconds left. That made the two-touchdown underdog Broncos the second wild-card team to win the Super Bowl.

"They disrespected us all week," Denver tight end Shannon Sharpe said. "Everybody direspected us. They never faced a running game like ours. They never faced a quarterback like ours. They never faced a coach who puts in a game plan like Mike Shanahan."

The Packers hurt themselves with three critical penalties late in the game. They included a holding call and a false start on rookie left tackle Ross Verba that bottled Green Bay deep, and a face mask on Darius Holland that gave the Broncos 15 key yards on their game-winning 49-yard drive.



But nonetheless, it was Elway's game.

"In kind of a strange way — John Elway, I've always enjoyed him," Packers coach Mike Holmgren said. "I just wished he hadn't done it against me."

Elway scrambled eight yards to set up a touchdown and scored on a one-yard run — a lot like the young Elway. He finished 12-of-22 for 122 yards and threw one end-zone interception.

If this wasn't the best Super Bowl ever, it was close to it, despite a lot of sloppiness — 15 penalties and five turnovers by the two teams. Elway's ▶ CATS HOLD COLORADO TO 30-PERCENT SHOOTING FOR THE GAME, BEAT BUFFALOES 78-60.

Horrid shooting on Colorado's part (a mere 30 percent for the game) allowed the K-State Wildcats to remain undefeated at home this season as the Cats defeated the Buffaloes 78-60 on Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Clutching a slim 29-23 halftime lead, K-State used tough interior defense to hold Colorado to one field goal in the first nine minutes of the second half and cruise out to a healthy 48-27 lead with 11 minutes, 42 seconds left in the game.

"We didn't really shoot the ball that well in the first half," point guard Duane Davis said. "We wanted to establish our big men inside. We went from 5 to 20 instantly, and we got up by so much so early and just put it on cruise control."

In that span, forward Manny Dies scored 10 of his career-high 28 points and helped the Cats put a comfortable cushion on their lead. Dies hit his first four shots of the second half, including two three-point plays.

"They just can't stop him," Davis said. "I could just come down and throw the ball in every time. They can't stop him."

The Cats got its biggest lead of the game, 52-30, at the 10:05 mark as they stuffed the Buffs' big men inside.

But instead of folding like a rented pitch-tent, Colorado battled back and trimmed K-State's lead to just 12, 60-48, when Buff guard Kenny Price hit a three-pointer with 6:19 left.

"GOT A BIT TIRED, BUT FOR THE MAJORITY OF THE GAME, I THOUGHT OUR DEFENSE WAS SOLID.."

TOM ASBURY
K-State coach

"We got a bit soft defensively from about the 10-minute mark to the three-minute mark," K-State head coach Tom Asbury said. "We might have got a bit tired, but for the majority of the game, I thought our defense was solid."

Colorado threw several defenses at K-State, including a 1-2-2 half-court trap, but K-State broke the press and earned easy buckets in transition.

"They handled our pressure," Colorado head coach Ricardo Patton said. "I thought that our guys defensively did as good a job as we could do defensively and our guys really got after it, but K-State did a really nice job of handling that pressure."

With 6:05 left in the contest, Colorado big man Charlie Melvin fouled out and took away the Buffs' inside presence, and K-State cruised to a seemingly easy victory, 70-68.

The first half was a mirror image of the second, as poor shooting was once again the downfall of Colorado. The Buffs missed their first seven shots from the field and were held scoreless until the 14:41 mark in the first half.

K-State began the first half on fire as it jumped out to an early 11-3 lead, but at times during the first half appeared rattled and allowed the Buffaloes to inch their way back into the game.

"I thought our effort was good in the first half," Asbury said. "I thought we had some great looks. We were taking all those shots and getting inside position."

The Buffs eased their way back into the game before the half via a 7-2 run to close out the period and trailed the Cats 29-23.

As aforementioned, Dies finished with a career-high 28 points and also a career-high five blocks. He also grabbed 13 rebounds. Forward Shawn Rhodes chipped in 11 for the Cats and guard Ayome May added 10.

With the win, K-State improved its record to 12-5 overall and 3-4 in the Big 12. K-State plays Nebraska at 7:05 p.m. Wednesday in Bramlage.

The win marked the 100th game in Asbury's career. Asbury holds a 51-49 record in his four years at K-State.

Elways wins ring thanks to strong supporting cast

When John Elway wakes up this morning and looks at his unshaven face in the mirror, he'll know he has only one person to thank for the Denver Bronco's first Super Bowl victory — Terrell Davis.

Elway passed for a meager 27 yards in the first half. In fact, he stunk it up. But thanks to one possessed running back, he had a smile on his face in the end. Davis, on the other hand, didn't even play in the second quarter, but he dominated the first half — and the game.

VIEWPOINT

It's true. Elway just didn't show up to play in the Super Bowl — again. His defense was there. They bent, but they didn't break.

Elway's special teams were suspect, but they weren't ineffective like the Denver quarterback.

But it didn't matter. When the clock ran down to zero, Elway's team had finally won a Super Bowl. His teammates ran over to John — the old man, the old warrior, the regular season messiah, the king of the comeback and Super Bowl-choking quarterback himself.

They handed him the ball. John smiled. The wrinkles that cover the face of the 15-year NFL veteran were almost hidden by the smile plastered to his face.

John Elway finally escaped the stigma associated with losing three Super Bowls.

Davis was there running over, through and around the Green Bay Packers. Davis ran for 157 yards on 30 carries and, I'll say it again, the man didn't even play in the second quarter.

When Denver got the ball inside the 50-yard line late in the fourth quarter, who did they go to?

Simple.

Davis. Davis to the right. Davis to the left. And finally, Davis up the middle through a hole that I could have slowly pushed a Yugo through for a touchdown.

Say it with me — MVP.

While Davis was running for MVP honors, Mr. Comeback, Elway, was nowhere to be found in the fourth quarter.

Indeed, Elway should be down on his knees thanking Davis for dominating the Super Bowl like Michael Jordan dominates the NBA finals. Davis was big time. Elway was nothing more than a spectator watching, albeit with a great seat. Only this spectator got to lift the Lombardi Trophy above his head when it was all said and done.

Elway just didn't make the plays when it counted. Davis did, though. It seems to be a recurring trend. Elway plays Super Bowls as well as Scott Norwood.

You remember Norwood? He was the Buffalo Bills kicker who choked up his lungs, stomach and heart and missed the field goal that cost the Bills their first of four Super Bowl flops.

Before this game, the debate raged in sports bars, sports talk shows, the city dump, Brett Favre's rehab center in Topeka and everywhere else sports are discussed in this world. The question being, is John Elway so great he was able to carry mediocre teams to all those Super Bowls, or is John Elway one of the game's biggest chokers when it truly matters?

Right now, it's fashionable to love Elway. The man is old for an NFL player — 37 years old. He's been marvelous these 15 years, but he could never win the big one until yesterday. Everyone loves an underdog and that's exactly what Elway had become.

He's older. He's slower. His arm isn't as powerful. Yes, you read correct. His arm is not as powerful. Don't believe the hype about Elway's arm being stronger than ever.

Elway used to zip the ball like he was God.

He was able to roll to his left, stop, get hit by 10 guys, spin and fling the ball across the football field as far and as hard as he wanted.

Indeed, Elway's arm used to be like Michael Bishop's. The only difference is Elway was always accurate.

Now he hands the ball to Davis. Now he throws swing passes, tight end pop passes and post patterns. All the classic routes of the West Coast Offense. Yes, he's accurate, but his arm is not what it was.

This season, Elway threw for 27 touchdowns — more than he ever has at any point in his career. He has Shannon Sharpe, Ed McCaffrey, Davis and Mike Shanahan to thank. If Dan Reeves still coached the Broncos, Elway would be playing like Jim Kelly played this season.

So the answer to the old debate can be found in Elway's Super Bowl performance.

Was John dominating?

Absolutely not — 12-of-22 for 122 yards with an interception in the end zone is suspect, at best.

Who did the Broncos turn to late in the game when they needed a play? Not Elway.

Late in the fourth quarter, the Broncos found themselves facing first and goal with 20 yards to go. They handed the ball to Davis, and he was money — so money he didn't even know it. Earlier in the game, after the Broncos went up 24-17, Elway tried his best to give the game back to the Packers. When Antonio Freeman coughed up the ball on the ensuing kick off, Elway and the Bronco offense got the ball back inside the 10 with four downs to score. And old-man Elway choked.

Any other time, Elway would have thrown a touchdown. But this was the Super Bowl, and Elway doesn't know Super Bowls.

Elway closed his eyes and threw an interception into Eugene Robinson's outstretched hands.

Elway might have won a Super Bowl, but that doesn't mean he didn't choke.

Thank goodness for Terrell Davis.

Cats pick up 2nd-straight Big 12 win

▸ CATS PULL OUT CLOSE GAME AND IMPROVE TO 3-3 IN CONFERENCE PLAY.

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

There's an old saying about sports that goes, "The games aren't played on paper."

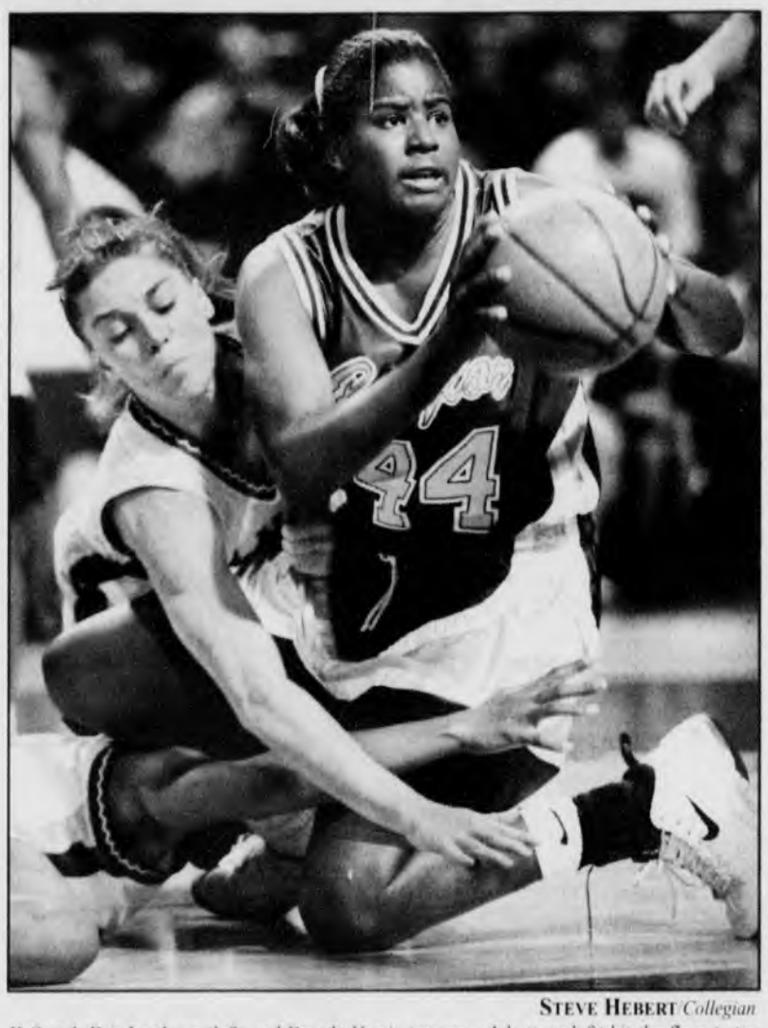
It's a good thing for the K-State women's basketball team that this is the case.

The Wildcats lost twice to Nebraska this season by margins of 22 and 31 points. Baylor's previous game was a 76-71 win over those same Huskers on Wednesday night. On paper, it looked like the Cats were in trouble.

K-State beat the Bears on the court, though, 62-59 Saturday night. The win evens the Cats' conference record at 3-3 and brings them to 9-7 overall. K-State has won two consecutive games for the first time since Dec. 5.

The Cats fell behind early. After guard Kim Woodlee buried a three-pointer to put K-State ahead 5-4, the Bears went on a 12-1 run to take an early 10-point lead.

The Cats recovered to pull closer before halftime. Led by Woodlee's eight first-half points, including two three-pointers, and seven by guard Brit Jacobson, K-State was only down by five at the half. The Cats were fortunate to only be trailing by five at the break, because they shot a season-low 25.7 percent in the first half.



"We felt real positive going into the locker room," K-State coach Deb Patterson said. "We knew that in spite of a lot of mistakes and a lot of lost opportunities in the first half, we were right there."

They took advantage of 10 steals and 13 Bear turnovers to stay in the game.

K-State used the momentum from the end of the first half to take a lead early in the second half. Woodlee buried her third triple of the game to pull the Cats within two.

After picking up her third foul just one minute and 33 seconds into the second half, center Angie Finkes put back a Brandy Harris miss to tie the game. The Cats extended their lead to 37-32 after a 14-4 early run in the second half in which they kept Baylor to one field goal in the first 7:50.

The five-point lead was K-State's biggest of the game and was matched when the Cats led 53-48 with 4:54 left.

K-State's Brit Jacobson (left) and Brandy Harris (on ground, bottom left) hit the floor to try and gain possession of the basketball from Baylor's Deronica Robinson (right) during Saturday night's game in Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats won the game 64-52.

Bears' center Kacy Moffitt, who shot 10-of-13 from the field to lead all players with 24 points, hit a jumper to pull Baylor within three. After a made free throw, forward Tasia Wright made a short field goal to tie the game at 53.

The teams traded baskets and were tied at 57 with less than two minutes left. Finkes hit a shot over the 6-foot-4 Moffitt to give the Cats the lead with 1:33 left. Amanda Mooney hit a shot inside to tie the game at 59.

With less than a minute remaining and the game tied, Moffitt tried to pass the ball inside, but it went through everyone and the Cats had the ball with 36 seconds remaining.

The Bears put on full-court pressure to try to force the Cats to turn the ball over, but K-State broke the press, and Jacobson hit a layup with 30 seconds remaining to put the Cats up 61-59.

With the shot clock off, Baylor decided to hold the ball for the last shot. With time running down, guard Lara Webb, who finished the game with 12 points and seven assists, put up a leaning three-point prayer that came up short. Finkes pulled down the rebound and was fouled with one-tenth of a second left and hit one of two free throws to seal the 62-59 win.

Patterson said Webb's shot was just a desperate hope for a foul call.

"That's a hope and a prayer," Patterson said. "She was almost at a 45-degree angle trying to get that shot off."

The Cats tied a season high with 20 offensive boards, leading to 20 more field-goal attempts than the Bears. Jacobson set a career high with half of K-State's 14 steals.

Broncos finally end 13-year AFC Super Bowl losing skid mistake came at the Green Bay 22 when the Broncos had a chance to go ahead by more than a touchdown late in the third quarter.

But otherwise, it was two heavyweights going punch for punch — Favre threw for three TDs, two to Antonio Freeman, and Davis ran for three.

"We got behind 17-7 and battled back. We used so much energy. It was like a basketball game," Holmgren said. "They got us at the end."

Each team scored a touchdown on its first possession — the first time that's ever happened in a Super Bowl.

Then Denver jumped to a 17-7 lead before a 17-play, 95-yard drive by the Packers, second longest in Super Bowl history. That cut it to 17-14 at halftime and Green Bay seemed to have momentum.

But Elway engineered a 92-yard drive of his own to give the Broncos a 24-17 lead. Then, after Elway threw the interception, the Packers went 85 yards in just four plays to tie it.

The third quarter did not start well for Denver. Davis fumbled on his first carry of the second half, and Brian Williams recovered at the Denver 26.

That led to Ryan Longwell's 27-yard field goal that tied it at 17. An offside penalty on a successful 39-yard kick had given the Packers a second chance at a TD, but they couldn't take advantage.

Late in the third quarter, the Broncos moved nearly the length of the field on 13 plays for a touchdown on Davis' one-yard run. Elway combined with Ed McCaffrey on a 36-yard play and helped set up the score with an eight-yard scramble that ended when he was sandwiched by tacklers and spun around in the air at the Green Bay four.

Why not try contact lenses?
Contact lenses may often be a simple, comfortable, clear vision solution for today's active person. Contact lenses will not slide down your nose in the summer heat, and won't fog up in winter's chill. If you were once told that you could not wear contact lenses because you need bifocals, have astigmatism or dry eyes, that may no longer be true. Contact lens technology is improving all the time, and Dr. Klopfenstein stays informed of all the latest developments. Contact lenses can give crisp, clear, comfortable vision, and even change the color of your eyes! Why not give contact lenses a try?

2-day Lawrence standoff ends as 2nd man surrenders

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — A man and woman held hostage in their rural home expressed sympathy for the wrong decision of their captors after the incident ended peacefully early Saturday.

Ralph Leary, 59, was set free about 5 a.m., walking out unharmed when a second gunman surrendered after nearly two days of negotiations with authorities.

Leary was reunited at his brother's nearby home with his wife, Leila, 49. She had been released, also without injury, on Thursday night when the first man, David Cox, 35, of Kansas City, Kan., came out with his hands up.

Her husband remained in the house with Kipling L. Johnson, 32, of Lawrence, whom the sheriff said had at least two weapons. Johnson's brother and an attorney came to the police command post on Friday, and both were in contact with him as a team of police negotiators tried to get him to give up.

Power to the home was cut off Friday afternoon, and the periodic telephone discussions with Johnson ended at about 6 p.m. The sheriff said officials had planned to wait until morning before attempting to contact him again, but that Johnson reinitiated the talks shortly after 1 a.m. He and Leary walked out of the house together about four hours later.

"It took a long time, longer than we wanted," the sheriff said. "But we were able to end it without injury to the hostage or the suspect."

The incident began Thursday morning after what the sheriff said was an apparent botched robbery attempt at another rural home south of Lawrence. Leila Leary was held for more than 12 hours before being released.

In the statement, Leila Leary said, "We are grateful we were not harmed in any way by David and Kip. Unfortunately, Thursday morning they made a wrong decision in their life."

The statement said the Learys would not be available for comment about the incident at this time." he Learys have been through a very long ordeal and need to rest and start putting this behind them," the statement, read by Black, said.

Johnson was booked into county jail Saturday afternoon on three counts of kidnapping, three counts of aggravated robbery, one count of attempted aggravated robbery and a parole violation, said Sheriff's Deputy Steve Freeman. His bond was set at $250,000. He will appear in court on Monday afternoon.

Cox was booked into the county jail on three counts of kidnapping and one each of aggravated robbery, aggravated burglary, theft, attempt to commit theft and a parole violation, Anderson said.

He had not been formally charged, and a court hearing first scheduled for Friday afternoon was postponed for security reasons until Monday, assistant Douglas County district attorney Jerry Little said.

However, Cox was brought to court briefly and had his bond set at $250,000 by Douglas County District Judge Paula Martin.

The episode began at another house Thursday morning when two men confronted a high school student as she went out to warm up her car. They tied her up with duct tape and then went to the door of the home, but the girl's father slammed the door and called 911.

The young woman was later treated at a hospital for minor injuries, but the men took her car and were pursued by her father. He found his daughter's car at the hostages' house.

Both Cox and Johnson had been paroled last month, the sheriff said. Cox has 14 theft, burglary and forgery convictions in Wyandotte, Leavenworth and Johnson counties, and was convicted of aggravated escape from custody in Wyandotte County in January 1986, according to the Lawrence Journal-World. He has spent almost six years in Kansas prisons and was released Dec. 30.

Public works crews busy maintaining road safety

MATT KREPS
Kansas State Collegian

Warm temperatures forecasted for this week will mean sighs of relief from Manhattan road crews.

Manhattan's public works department has eight trucks for spreading salt and sand to make it easier for Manhattan's residents to go about their daily routines, and department officials said those trucks have been put to good use during this year's winter storm season.

"We start as soon as precipitation starts, as long as we have some advance notice," said Chuck Williams, assistant director of Manhattan public works.

The department has its own satellite system to monitor weather until about 11 p.m., Williams said. The department depends on the Riley County Police Department for late-night notice of bad weather.

When winter storms loom on the horizon, public works will either send the road crews out immediately or call them in to get ready, depending on how much notice is given and how severe the storm looks, Williams said.

The crews' first priorities are main streets such as Juliette, Anderson and Bluemont avenues and Fort Riley Boulevard, Williams said. They also treat school zones and large inclines right away. Residential areas and lower traffic streets are the second priority, he said.

"Our kids think we do everything possible to see to it they have to go to school the next day," Williams said.

He said the first priority areas take as long as four hours to treat. Then crews begin to treat the residential areas.

Treating Manhattan's streets carries a price tag. Williams said Manhattan's first big storm in December cost about $5,000 in materials and labor to fight.

The city of Manhattan gives road crews $15,000 for salt and sand. Expenses for labor and machinery come out of the general funds used for street repairs in the summer.

"The harder the winter, the less road work we do in the summer," Williams said.

Crews' primary weapon against ice and snow is salt treated with a liquid calcium chloride mixture. The calcium chloride makes the salt effective on pavement temperatures down to 30 below zero. It also reduces corrosion on roads because crews don't have to use as much material to treat the roads, Williams said.

Crews are now low on salt, and it is scarce this time of year, he said. To deal with the shortage, the department will spread salt on the first priority areas and use sand for residential streets to conserve the salt stores.

Sand, compared with the salt mixture, is cheap and easy to get right now, Williams said.

With this year's snow and ice, he said any material that keeps roads safe is in high demand.

"We can probably get it hauled in faster than we can haul it out," he said.

Several groups responsible for ice-free sidewalks, streets on campus

MATT KREPS
Kansas State Collegian

City road-crew workers aren't the only ones keeping streets and walkways clear during the winter months.

K-State Facilities workers put in overtime when ice and snow visit Manhattan, too.

Randy Slover, director of facilities maintenance, said his employees are often out late or up early to keep campus streets and sidewalks safe for students and staff.

"We try to get right on it and get the snow removed before the pedestrian traffic gets on the snow and packs it down and makes it a lot harder to get off," Slover said.

Responsibilities for keeping streets and sidewalks cleared are divided among several groups. Facilities handles main streets on campus, while Parking Services clears parking lots. Grounds workers clear sidewalks and custodial staff members are responsible for steps and areas around the buildings.

Workers use a variety of tools to remove snow and ice.

"We have our own supply of ice-removal equipment and supplies," Slover said.

Facilities use dump trucks similar to those of the Kansas Department of Transportation. These small vehicles, known as hustlers, are fitted with snow brooms to clear the sidewalks. Salt, sand and chemicals are also a part of the weather-fighting arsenal, he said.

There is not a separate budget for snow and ice removal on campus.

"It's basically absorbed into the rest of our budget," Slover said. "The biggest cost is overtime."

Overall, Slover said his staff does a good job keeping the campus safe in bad weather.

Carpal tunnel prevention starts in wrist

CORBIN CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

For those living with carpal tunnel syndrome, there are simple and affordable ways to alleviate the pain.

A symptom of carpal tunnel syndrome is persistent and severe pain in the hands and wrists. This pain mainly stems from incorrect positioning of the wrists while sitting at a computer keyboard.

When the wrists are incorrectly positioned at a keyboard, pressure is put on a nerve found in a "tunnel" in the wrists. In that tunnel, as the tendons grow and expand, it can cause inflammation. Symptoms of carpal tunnel syndrome also include a burning sensation in the fingers, or even no feeling at all.

Dr. Guy Smith, medical director of Lafene Health Center, said those who spend a majority of their day sitting at typewriters or computers are most likely to suffer from carpal tunnel syndrome. Also, Smith said, those who use vibratory equipment in their daily jobs, such as jackhammers or other tools associated with construction work, are just as susceptible to the disease.

"The cause of the disease is largely occupational," said Smith, who sees students on a weekly basis to treat carpal tunnel syndrome.

Beth Unger, vice provost and professor of computing and information sciences, agreed with Smith.

"If you use a computer for more than six to seven hours per day, you need to take proper precautions," Unger said.

Smith said those precautions are both inexpensive and effective.

"If you can find the aging factor (of the disease), that's the cheapest treatment," she said.

Smith added that anti-inflammatory creams can take the pressure off the nerve as well.

There are wrist splints th keep the wrist in a neutral position. The cost of these splints usually ranges from $25 to $30, Smith said.

The Department of Computing and Informatio Sciences is also taking the necessary steps to help prevent carpal t nel syndrome. Unger ensures all computers in her department are equipped with wrist rests, and says most computers now come with warning labels when they are sold to consumers. These labels warn the consumer about the dangers of incorrect positioning of the wrists while sitting at the keyboard for extended periods of time.

Smith said he sees the new warning label as a way to educate the public about carpal tunnel syndrome.

These precautions and tips add up to making students more aware of carpal tunnel syndrome, and one of Unger's priorities is to try to protect students from its dangers.

"We educate (students) and try to make available anything to them that would keep them from being susceptible to carpal tunnel syndrome," Unger said.

Proper position prevents carpal tunnel

1. Adjust your chair
- Adjust the height of the chair so your feet are firmly on the floor but not so low that your weight is not evenly distributed over the full seat surface.
- Keep your body in a relaxed, yet upright, position. The backrest of your chair should support the inward curve of your lower back.

2. Adjust your keyboard and mouse
- To prevent having to reach to the front or side, position the keyboard and pointing device (ex: mouse, trackball, etc.) directly in front and close to you.
- Press the keys gently; keep your shoulders, arms, hands and fingers relaxed.

3. Adjust your monitor
- Position whatever you are looking at most of the time (either the monitor or paper material) directly in front of you so that you do not have to turn your head to the side while you are typing.
- Adjust the monitor height so that the top of the screen is at, or slightly below, eye level. Your eyes should look slightly downward when viewing the middle of the screen.

Review Theater

Opera is not commonplace in Manhattan, so the opportunity to experience it at McCain Auditorium was exciting, especially for the inexperienced opera-goer.

Friday night, the Italian National Opera Company presented "Cavalleria rusticana" and "I pagliacci" at McCain as part of the McCain Performance Series.

Some people might be under the mistaken impression one must have prior experience at the opera to enjoy it. This is simply not the case. Take it from someone who had never been before, it can be enjoyable and not terribly difficult to follow.

"Cavalleria rusticana" (Rustic chivalry), an opera in one act by Pietro Mascagni, is a short, intensely emotional story about betrayal and its effects.

The music was amazing and very moving. Similiar to the mood of songs in an American musical, it serves to intensify and heighten emotion. The performers used the power of their voices to blow the audience away. The music also made the plot much easier to follow, even though the words were in Italian.

However, the story never seemed to reach a very high point of emotion. At the end, I felt I should be moved by the turn of events, but simply wasn't.

"I pagliacci" is the story of a play within the opera in which actors on stage suddenly take on real life roles.

The story of this group of actors seemed a bit easier to become involved with, perhaps because the plot didn't seem to make jumps that left the audience lagging behind.

Once again, the music was extraordinary and, on its own, enough reason to be there.

Although, as a first-time opera-goer, I probably took different feelings away from this experience than an old pro, it was still quite enjoyable. It was also an new way to broaden my horizons.

Simply by doing some research prior to attending this event, one can get an idea of what to expect and what the story is about, making the plot much easier to follow.

Since we are fortunate enough to have the opportunity to experience new things through the McCain Performance Series, I think we should take advantage of them.

'Titanic' tops movie charts

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — "Titanic" hit the ranks of all-time top-grossing films and the Spice Girls' first movie opened at No. 2 during the usually slow Super Bowl weekend, according to industry estimates Sunday.

James Cameron's epic, boosted by its four Golden Globe awards, had about $25 million in ticket sales to hold the top spot for a sixth week. It now has made $274.3 million to place No. 10 on the list of all-time domestic moneymakers, according to Exhibitor Relations Co., Inc.

The movie bumped 1975's "Jaws," which had $260 million at the North American box office.

"Spice World," starring the internationally popular singing group, earned an unexpectedly high $11 million. The movie has a built-in Spice Girls fan base and it also appealed to a young audience that was less likely to be glued to the tube for the Super Bowl, experts said.

The only other new film in wide release was "Phantoms." The thriller had a weak opening gross of $3.1 million to tie for eighth place with the comedy "Half-Baked."

"Wag the Dog," a satire about a presidential sex scandal, didn't seem to benefit from its real-life counterpart — allegations that President Clinton had an affair with a former White House intern. Ticket sales rose about 5 percent in the Washington, D.C., area compared to the previous week, said Al Shapiro, president of domestic distribution for New Line Cinema.

But overall, the film placed sixth with $4.7 million, a drop of 27 percent from the previous week.

"Fallen" fell sharply in its second week, along with several other movies. The demonic thriller starring Denzel Washington was in fifth place with $4.9 million, down 53 percent from the previous week. "Hard Rain" was No. 7 with $3.7 million — a 54 percent drop — followed by "Half-Baked," which had a 60 percent drop. However, those percentages compared a three-day total to last weekend's four-day total, which counted the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday.

"Amistad" dropped off of the top 10 list in its seventh week. It was No. 12 with $1.8 million.

Final figures were to be released Tuesday.

NOFX returns, rocks Lawrence fans

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

For the first time in eight years, NOFX returned to Lawrence and gave one incredible show. And the kids were incredibly excited.

I have never seen the Granada as packed as it was on Tuesday night. There was no breathing room down on the floor, and it was tough moving around elsewhere in the club.

Review Music

Local boys, The Gadjits, opened the show by showcasing a lot of material from their forthcoming album on Hellcat Records. I was only able to see their last two tunes due to getting in late, but "Traffic Tickets" and "Beautiful Girl" sounded great.

The crowd wasn't too into them for some reason, but The Gadjits fed off it and played harder and better.

After a way-too-long break, Snuff hit the stage. I'd heard a lot about these wacky Brits, but had never heard them, so I was ready to check them out.

The trio, with the occasional fourth member on trombone, played a high energy mix of pop-punk and hardcore with a couple ska-sounding tunes thrown in for good measure. The weird part was the drummer was the lead singer.

I didn't catch any song titles, but then again, none were given.

Snuff even did a punk rock cover of "Wannabe" by the Spice Girls. It was hysterical. They even educated the crowd on the proper use of British slang, such as how to use the word "bloody" properly.

After Snuff was done, the crowd was more than ready to see NOFX blow the roof off the joint. About a half hour went by, and then the lights illuminated the backdrop of NOFX's new album cover. The screaming kids went insane for that.

Fat Mike and crew strode out on stage, strapped on their gear and started making fun of the crowd. It was priceless.

"What's going on? This is the earliest show of my life!" Fat Mike said.

Then he proceeded to take the microphone and fart into it. Of course, I laughed like a 5-year-old.

NOFX ripped through an hour-long set and played stuff off virtually every album. I was glad they didn't play songs mostly from their newest Epitaph release, "So Long and Thanks For the Shoes."

I couldn't believe how tight the music sounded. It was perfect.

It was great to hear "New Boobs," "Bob" and "Linoleum" live. The floor erupted when "Bob" started. It was nuts.

Fat Mike introduced their ska song, "Kill All The White Man," by saying, "We heard ska was going to be really popular on the radio, so we wrote this song. Of course, we wrote it like five years ago, so it's OK."

They played a lot of requests too, which I thought was cool.

For its encore, the band never left the stage. They just took their instruments off and put them back on. A new song titled "I Wanna Be An Alcoholic" was even played. Twice.

The show was closed with "The Brews." Everyone left happy, sweaty and tired. Just the way they wanted.

Rumor has it that this is NOFX's last tour, so if you missed it, kick yourself repeatedly. It was awesome.

Program highlights alcohol awareness

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

Members of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority participated in the Talking About Alcohol Program this weekend.

The six-hour seminar covered everything from factors that influence impairment — such as body size, gender and stomach content — to analysis of the signs and stages of alcoholism.

But the seminar did a lot more than talk about alcoholism — it also covered all the risks associated with drinking.

"The goal of the program is to raise the awareness of the negative aspects of heavy alcohol use," said Eydie Liebman, coordinator for substance abuse prevention at Bentley College in Boston and Theta alumna.

During the first part of the presentation, Stacy Leming, Theta district president for Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma, said alcohol-related accidents are the leading cause of death for people aged 20 to 25.

Liebman and Leming have been involved in the program for three years and are part of a team of 15 members that visit Theta chapters across the country. The team does 16-20 presentations per year. They visit each chapter about once every four years.

At another university, Liebman said she was discussing the third part of the presentation when one of the participants broke into tears.

"She stood up and said, 'You might not believe this, but my father died when he was 40 because of alcoholism, and I never want to see anybody go through this again, so listen to what they are saying. Believe what they are saying.' She went on and on about how horrible it was to watch her father kill himself because of alcohol abuse," Liebman said. "It was more powerful than anything I could have said."

Leming said she agreed that personal testimony was more effective.

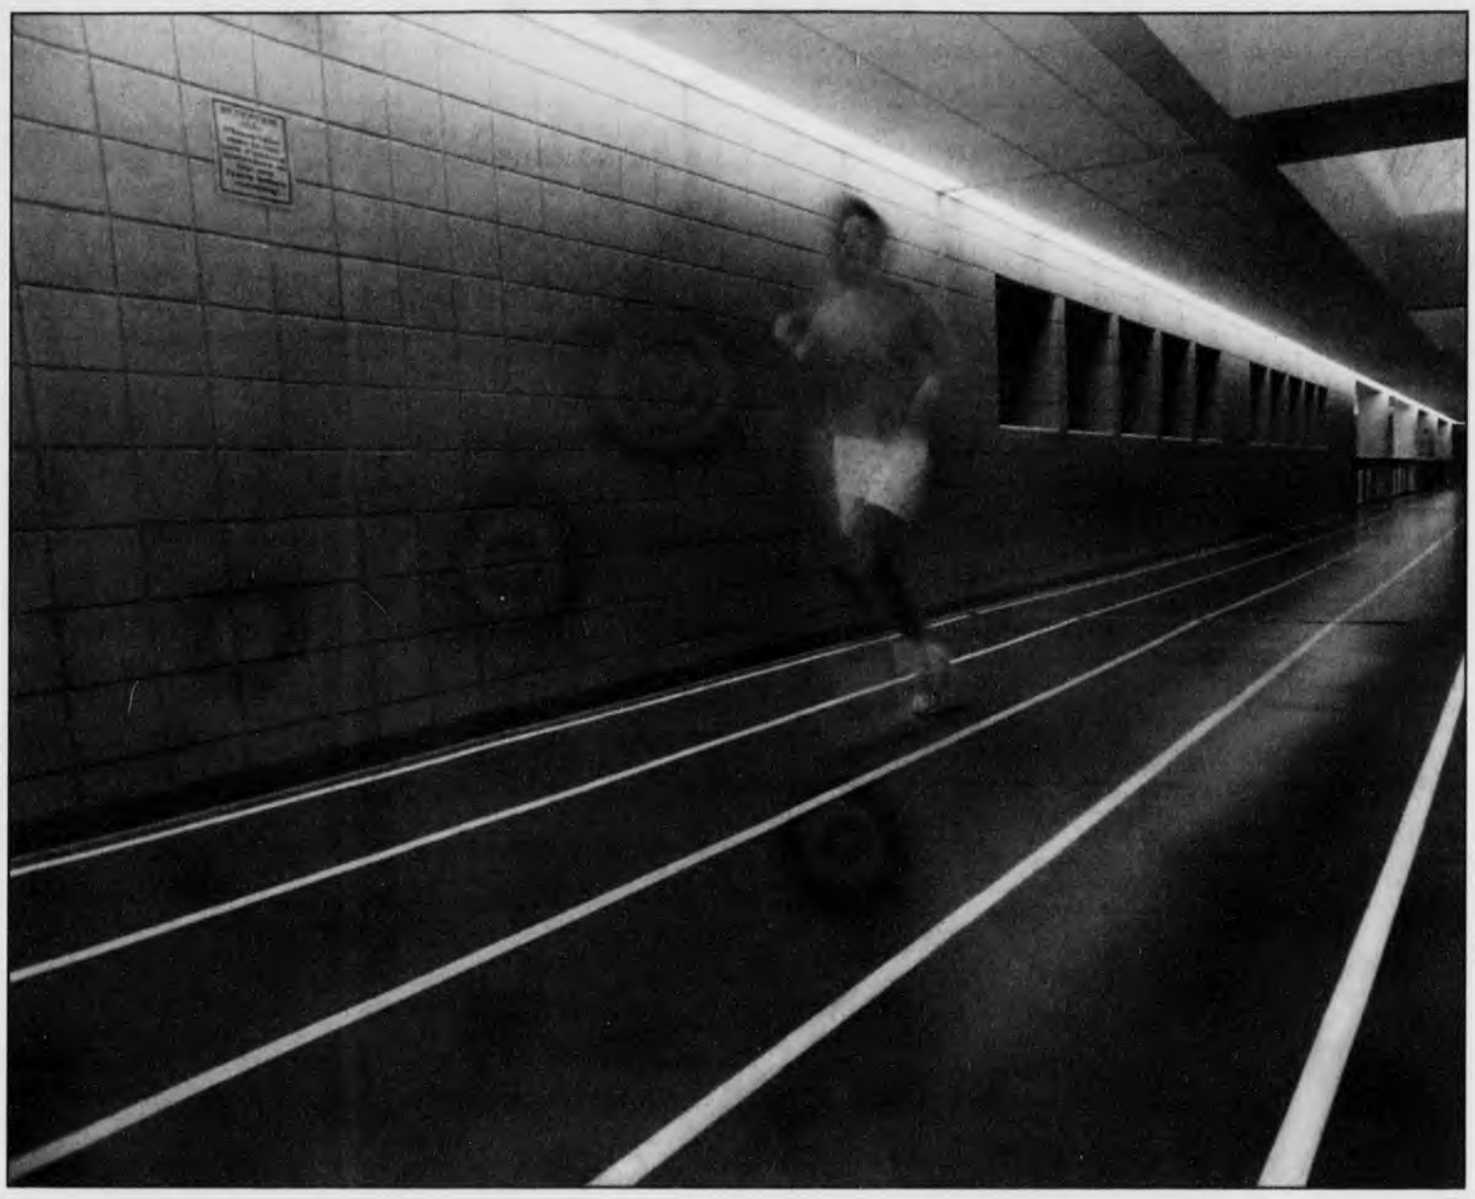
"That really shows that it is true and that it really hits home for a lot of people," she said.

The presentation was divided into three sections. The first part covered basic concepts and explained common views of alcoholism and how they are flawed. This part of the presentation also discussed the view that alcoholism is a lifestyle-related health problem and explained levels of tolerance and how different people have different trigger levels for alcoholism.

The second section explained the five-step risk reduction process, traits that can lead to alcoholism and factors that cause alcoholism. After that, it covered factors influencing the amount of impairment a person has.

The presentation ended by discussing the four phases of alcoholism and the characteristics and results of each stage. Everyone falls into one of four phases.

Pre- and post-test scores indicate the program has been successful in the short term, but they are now looking at long-term effectiveness, Liebman said.



The program will be followed up with an awareness activity once per semester, said Vicky Schoell, junior in landscape architecture and Theta risk manager. There is a five member follow-up committee that will plan activities.

Schoell said she learned a lot about alcoholism from the seminar.

"You hear about it, but you never really know about it."

The program was first created in 1983 by the Prevention Research Institute, a nonprofit organization that specializes in early intervention and treatment of alcohol and drug problems. The program has also been used by other greek organizations such as Alpha Chi Omega and Delta Tau Delta.

Junior Wildcat Club provides opportunity for children to learn from K-State athletes

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

A young boy sat with his mother sat in Bramlage Coliseum as part of a birthday celebration.

Brant Willoughby turns 10 today, and he, with many other children sitting beside him in Section 23 of the arena, were participating in K-State's Junior Wildcat Club on Sunday.

The Junior Wildcat Club is an organization sponsored by the KSU Alumni Association. Junior Wildcats are children who get to participate in events like Sunday's, where club members were invited to meet K-State athletes, learn cheers from the Classy Cats and go to a basketball game, all for a $35 annual fee.

Brant and his mother, Linda Willoughby, traveled from Minneapolis, Kan., to meet K-State athletes, including members of the men's basketball team, who were warming up to play the Colorado Buffaloes.

Brant is a third-year member of the club. He said Sunday he enjoys getting autographs from K-State athletes, and his mother enjoys giving him that experience.

"We met Kevin Lockett last year," Linda Willoughby said. "He stayed and waited until everybody had been signed. He was the last one to leave. He was really, really nice to everybody, and he treated the kids so well."

Ashlee Erickson is a first-year member from Olathe, Kan. She has had the opportunity to meet many of the members of K-State athletics.

"We got the signatures of the Classy Cats, the basketball team, the volleyball team and the football team," she said.

The Ericksons found out about the Junior Wildcats from the radio. Ashlee's father, Jon Erickson, looks forward to upcoming club events.

"When they have the fantasy camp this year, that will be a lot of fun," Erickson said. "They'll have the time to interact a little bit more with each player in their sport."

Ashlee plays softball and participates in drill team, so she will spend some time with the Classy Cats when club members return to K-State for the fantasy camp in May.

Sherry Ward, senior in psychology and Classy Cats member, has been working with children in the club for about three years. She said she feels Junior Wildcats helps participants to give greater support during athletic events.

"It helps and encourages them to do more cheers, and also how to be a more supportive fan for K-State," Ward said.

She said she enjoys working with the children.

"I like it a lot," Ward said. "It's fun to watch kids that actually know the fight

Narrow road proves deadly

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PAOLA, Kan. — A rash of traffic deaths on an eastern Kansas highway has Kansas officials "racking our brains," the state's chief traffic engineer said.

Residents of the area where the deaths have occurred say the solution is simple: Widen part of U.S. Highway 169 from two lanes to four.

Since last April, 10 people have died on a 20-mile stretch of the highway from Spring Hill to just south of Osawatomie. Two of them died Thursday in a head-on car-truck collision.

"It just tears people apart to have these deaths," said Scott Fowle of Paola, whose wife, Jan, died Sept. 6 in a head-on crash that also killed a 16-year-old Paola boy.

Paola Mayor Floyd Grimes is among those who want to see the highway expanded. When he heard about Thursday's deaths, he said, "I felt guilty because I've been unable to convince anybody that we need action on this roadway."

Grimes said traffic has escalated on U.S. 169 as the populations in Paola and Osawatomie have increased.

A Kansas Department of Transportation representative met Friday with a task force in Paola, and a Miami County delegation is scheduled to meet Wednesday with Gov. Bill Graves.

"We are very, very concerned about it, but we want to make sure what we do is the right thing," said Mike Lackey, the state's transportation engineer.

The problem, Lackey said, is the state doesn't have the $75 million to $100 million needed for an expansion.

Also, he said, state research shows human error is to blame for the higher fatality rate along that stretch of U.S. 169.

Lackey said reviews of the accidents indicated that in most cases, drivers either drifted over the center line or passed in no-passing zones.

"You can't do anything about those kinds of accidents from a safety standpoint," he said.

Fowle said something has to be done.

If the highway were four lanes, he said, he doubts if his wife would have died. She was on her way to work at a restaurant in Olathe when a car driven by 16-year-old Freddie Keaton III crossed the center line. Authorities think the youth was asleep at the wheel, Fowle said.

System could lower risk of receiving tainted meat

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The government's new system for preventing contamination in processing plants is known by the acronym HACCP. Some meat and poultry inspectors sardonically say that means: "Have A Cup of Coffee and Pray."

Actually, it means "Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Points," a system beginning today for the 312 largest meat and poultry processing plants that account for 75 percent of livestock slaughtered in the United States. It will be phased in over two years in the remaining 6,100 plants.

"We definitely have our work cut out for us, as there are many disturbing pitfalls and apparent weaknesses," Randy Wurtele, western president of the National Joint Council of Food Inspection Locals, said in a letter on the union council's Internet site.

Under the new regime, plants install their own facilities preventive measures to reduce E. coli and salmonella bacteria and improve sanitation. Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman said the system is a revolutionary improvement over the old approach's reliance on sight, touch and smell.

"Rather than catching problems after they occur, we will now focus on preventing problems in the first place," Glickman said.

HACCP systems involve identifying points in a processing plant where contamination is most likely to occur and finding methods to combat it. Each plant can design its own HACCP system but must meet certain standards.

Some of the 7,500 federal inspectors on the front lines say relying on company workers to keep records on how well the systems operate places too much faith in the honesty of corporations out to make a profit.

For example, companies are required to test for E. coli, a strain of which can cause serious illness or even death in humans. But no federal inspector will oversee the tests, and companies need only make available their own results, which Wurtele said could be fabricated.

Thomas J. Billy, head of USDA's Food Safety and Inspection Service, said federal inspectors will do random E. coli sampling and compare results. The government could order corrective action, Billy said, "if we see an aberration."

Inspectors have voiced other worries, including a bacteria-sampling plan exempting certain kinds of animals and the lack of a requirement that the industry document qualifications of workers who make changes in HACCP systems.

The rules are a public relations ploy aimed mainly at shifting blame for outbreaks of food-borne illness from the government to private industry, Wurtele said.

"We cannot sit still when we see obvious shortcomings," he said.

Glickman insisted the new rules go further to control food-borne pathogens, and inspectors will have greater ability to close plants that show patterns of noncompliance with HACCP systems.

In addition, he said, plant inspectors will continue visual inspections of carcasses and have more freedom to check out overall operations than before.

Glickman said he also will push Congress to allow the department to impose fines on violators and issue mandatory recalls of bad product. An administration bill to do that has been stuck in committee since last fall.

"We really have no regulatory tools except for a shutdown," Glickman said. "We can fine circuses for mistreating elephants .... but we can't fine companies that violate food-safety standards."

Decathlon quizzes minds

High School.

Patrick Carney, chairman for the Kansas Academic Decathlon, said the events are generic tests, including speech, history and fine arts, with the final event being a super quiz.

"The final event is a 'Jeopardy!'-style super quiz, where the students tend to have a lot of fun participating with their teams," Carney said.

Six of the events are written multiple-choice tests. Three are oral and written communication events, and the super quiz is the team event.

The awards were given at the annual banquet on Saturday night. Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead addressed the group at the banquet. Along with Snead's speech, the top three speakers in the prepared speech contest presented their speech, Carney said.

The team with the highest overall point total goes on to compete in April at the National Academic Decathlon in Rhode Island.

"Its been wonderful to watch the students compete and excel, no matter what their academic level," Jones said.

director here, I am the memory from one year to the next, since Mortar Board changes every year," Jones said.

Kim Ebben, senior in social work, is the chairwoman of the essay competition. She had to find 40 volunteers to grade the essays. The work is time consuming, with many hours spent grading nearly 185 essays, Ebben said.

"All of the volunteers for the essay competition are students from all majors across campus. My committee and I found volunteers quite easily, through the greek system and other ways such as my church," Ebben said.

song more than their AB's. It's very impressive that they're really excited to see Willy and the Classy Cats and the cheerleaders."

Heather Lansdowne, assistant director for the Alumni Records Local Agency at K-State, said she believes there's value in the Junior Wildcats.

"It's a lot of fun for the kids," Lansdowne said. "It's a good publicity event for K-State in a lot of ways ... they're so good with kids. It's really fun to watch. Sometimes the parents are really wanting to get those autographs, too."

Members come from all over the state. About 10 to 20 percent are from the Manhattan area. Most of the kids are 8 to 9 years old, and their parents are typically people who like K-State and support athletics.

"K-State's got a lot of supporters out there who aren't actually alumni," Lansdowne said. "The assumption most people make is that they're all kids of alumni and all from Manhattan, and that's not the case."

Hale to tackle funding shortages

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

Solving funding shortages at Hale Library will take a creative coalition of funding sources, Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said Monday.

Hobrock, speaking to members of the Privilege Fee Committee, said a student privilege fee is part of that coalition.

"This has to be a creative strategy with not one group taking the entire responsibility," he said. "No one expects the students to be the solution to this problem in its entirety, but it must be a creative coalition of sources."

That coalition could provide funds to maintain periodical subscriptions and electronic resources at the library. Hobrock told committee members that hard times in the stacks are a result of dramatic inflation.

"I like to call it the 'doomsday machine,'" he said. "It basically consumes every dollar that we have available for subscriptions because they have inflated at an average of 14 percent a year for the last 12 years."

Of the library's 6,600 academic journal subscriptions, Hobrock said 400 cost more than $1,000 per year, with some reaching the $10,000 mark.

Electronic resources are also expensive and their costs are rising, he said. The Lexis/Nexis periodical database cost $12,500 this year. In July, the service will boost its rates to $69,000 annually.

"Information worth having is very costly," Hobrock said. "There's no free lunch. Information has always been very costly, it will continue to be very costly, and there will be no magic bullet that will come along and change the situation."

The Task Force to Fund the Library for the Twenty-First Century's October report established three funding sources that could be used to fund periodicals. Hobrock said state funds, a student privilege fee and money from the KSU Foundation are all important in the fight against inflation.

In his State of the State address, Gov. Bill Graves recommended a 0.5-percent increase in university budgets earmarked for library improvements. Hobrock said K-State administrators will encourage

1998-99 LIBRARY FUNDING OPTIONS

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock presented Privilege Fee Committee members with several Hale Library funding options Monday, including one that would use an equal amount of state, student and KSU Foundation funding.

	STATE FUNDING	STUDENT FEES	KSU FOUNDATION	TOTAL
LIBRARY TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATION	$300,000	$720,000 ($2 fee)	$500,000	$1,520,000
EQUAL CONTRIBUTION ALTERNATIVE	$327,938*	$360,000 ($1 fee)	$360,000	$1,047,938

* Gov. Bill Graves has proposed a $163,938, or 0.5-percent increase. Hobrock said President Jon Wefald will petition Graves to increase state funds the additional $164,000.

Clinton plans to avoid sex scandal in speech

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — When he stands before the nation tonight, President Clinton does not intend to address the scandal confronting him, his spokesman said. His speech will be about the State of the Union — not about him personally.

▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board gives its take on what these scandals have done to the office of the presidency.

The nation's health — with the economy booming and unemployment at a 24-year low — is in better shape than Clinton's beleaguered presidency, spokesman Mike McCurry acknowledged Monday.

"The state of the presidency is ... that we are facing a lot of difficult questions," McCurry said. "But the state of this union is strong."

Typically, 60 million people would tune in at 8 tonight for the annual ritual of the president delivering his State of the Union address. It is usually the president's most important speech of the year, offering a roadmap of his legislative agenda and report card of the past year.

This year's audience is expected to be much larger than usual because of the intense media spotlight on allegations that Clinton had an affair with a young intern, Monica Lewinsky, and urged her to lie about it.

Joining his wife, Hillary, at an event to promote education initiatives, Clinton spoke forcefully Monday about the charges.

"I want to say one thing to the American people. I want you to listen to me," the president said, jabbing his finger in the air. "I'm going to say this again. I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky. I never told anybody to lie, not a single time — never. These allegations are false. And I need to go back to work for the American people."

Lewinsky forged letter, unidentified source says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORTLAND, Ore. — Lewis & Clark College officials encouraged an employee to give Whitewater investigators a document allegedly forged by Monica Lewinsky, a spokeswoman said Monday.

The allegedly phony letter on school stationery was written to help someone Lewinsky knew continue receiving unemployment benefits, The Sunday Oregonian reported, quoting an unidentified source.

The newspaper also reported that Lewinsky, who attended the school from 1993 to 1995, bragged of having an affair with a married man.

College spokeswoman Jean Kempe-Ware said the school encouraged an employee who kept a copy of the letter to turn it over to Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr, who is investigating allegations that Lewinsky had a sexual relationship with President Clinton and lied about it.

"I think it is fair to say that the employee believes that it may be an issue of forgery," Kempe-Ware said, although she refused to discuss the specific contents of the letter or identify the employee who kept a copy of it.

She said the employee brought it to the attention of school officials Thursday night after allegations arose about Lewinsky and Clinton.

The college has not done its own investigation of the letter.

"The issue is in the hands of the independent counsel to determine if there is relevance or authenticity to this document," she said.

One of the acquaintances said Lewinsky had no problem with the fact she was seeing a married man or discussing it publicly, sometimes in front of people she barely knew, the newspaper said.

"I never quizzed her about it personally, but I often heard her talk about it," said the student, who now is attending graduate school. "She was proud and not repentant at all."

STATE OF THE UNION RUNDOWN

Last year, President Clinton's State of the Union address had to compete with TV coverage of the O.J. Simpson civil trial verdict. This year, the president is on his own.

Blanket tTV coverage of the State of the Union address is not new, and network plans were in place before the allegations involving Clinton and a former White House intern.

In 1997, attention was focused on another high-profile story.

A jury's finding that Simpson was liable for damages in the deaths of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman was announced during the president's Feb. 4 speech.

Although the networks stayed with Clinton, some superimposed a text bulletin about the trial on the screen and then hastily cut away to the California courthouse when the president's speech concluded.

Cat fans continue to enjoy basketball despite age

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Since 1947, Harold Sylvis has been attending K-State basketball games.

He's still going.

Now, he takes part in K-State basketball by driving older Manhattan residents to home women's basketball games for the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

The department started the program in cooperation with the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics in 1994 to help increase awareness and support for women's basketball games.

Karen Perry, recreation supervisor, said they focused on older people because many times they can't get to the games themselves, and the bus is handicap-accessible.

Perry said those who use the bus look forward to the season every year.

"They start calling in October to see when the bus is going to start running," she said. "This year we even started busing them for the exhibition games."

Some go for something to do on cold winter nights, but most said they go for the love of the game.

Wayland Keefover and Venda Hayes have been attending games together since last year.

"We enjoy them immensely. We cheer them on," Hayes said. "Being with the people and the crowd — it gives you an uplift."

Keefover agreed.

"We can't get up and jump around too much," he said. "We hope to encourage the players a little, though."

These basketball fans make themselves known at Bramlage Coliseum. Keefover said they try to yell with the cheerleaders and do the same things. They also come decked out in K-State purple.

Elinore Tebbutt, whose granddaughter graduated from K-State in 1986, said she enjoys going to the games, especially since she doesn't have to drive herself, and the bus takes them in on ground level, eliminating a walk down the stairs in Bramlage.

Winning is the most fun part, she said.

"Last Saturday night, the girls were so downhearted when they lost. It's too bad, but that's what happens sometimes," Tebbutt said.

Though action on the court provides entertainment, she said cheerleaders also draw her attention.

"They liven things up, but I hold my breath when the guys hold the girls," Tebbutt said. "I asked one cheerleader if they ever dropped anyone, but he said no."

Emily Rabbag, who played basketball in Cairo, Egypt, when she was young, likes to watch the basketball games but said she also enjoys the entertainment.

"I like the halftime exhibition with the girls dancing. It's very nice. I also like that cat Willie," she said.

K-State classified employees to voice wage concerns

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Today is Kansas Board of Regents Legislative Day, and secretaries, custodians and maintenance workers from K-State, some of whom are members of Classified Senate, will visit Kansas lawmakers in Topeka.

They will be asking at least 20 state representatives and nine state senators, in part, why a promise Gov. Bill Graves made about their salary increases this fiscal year doesn't seem to match up with what is really being offered.

Debbie White, chair of the personnel and benefits committee within Classified Senate, said Graves promised a 4-percent raise for all classified employees in Kansas in his recent State of the State address.

"Nobody gets the four percent," White said. "It just sounds good."

On the state government's World Wide Web page and in written statements, the 4 percent is actually a combination of a 1.5-percent cost of living raise and a 2.5-percent "merit" raise that must be approved by the state every year, she said.

Except that according to the salary system implemented in 1941, classified employees who have been on payroll for more than 14 years cannot earn the merit raise, she said.

What's more, she said, the raise will only apply to those paychecks earned after their employee evaluations and before the end of the fiscal year, in July. Those who have evaluations in May, for example, will only receive the raise for two months.

The Classified Senate at K-State is elected by classified employees, which are defined as those state employees who perform duties in connection with the business operations of a state institution except those in administrative positions.

Twenty-five senators serve on Classified Senate, White said, from one of three divisions — clerical, technical or service. Most will hopefully attend today's meetings, although White said the turnout is never high.

"We have to take our own leave-time to go to a full day of meetings," she said.

Connie Kissee is president of Classified Senate, and has been a K-State employee for 25 years, now as a library assistant in the technical services office in Hale Library.

She said employees who have been on payroll for more than 10 years can earn one bonus per year, amounting to $40 times the number of years they've been employed, before taxes. At 25 years, the employ-

Kennedy family sells furniture retail store; last family business sold to realty company

CHICAGO — The Kennedy family announced Monday it has sold a substantial portion of its real estate holdings, including the sprawling, landmark Merchandise Mart in Chicago, for $625 million.

Vornado Realty Trust of Saddle Brook, N.J., will pay $465 million in cash, assume $50 million in debt and offer $110 million in securities for the properties, which total 5.3 million square feet.

The centerpiece of the deal, the Merchandise Mart, which is home to furniture and home design retailers, is the Kennedy family's last operating business. The family fortune is largely in securities such as stocks and bonds.

The Merchandise Mart was built in 1930 by retailer Marshall Field & Co. The 25-story limestone and terra-cotta building on the Chicago River is connected by underground railroad to the city's other important places of commerce. At 4.2 million square feet, the Mart is so large it has its own ZIP code.

After Joseph P. Kennedy — who made a fortune from the stock market and the liquor business — bought the building for $12.5 million in 1945, he transformed it into a national center for the home furnishings and design industries.

The sale also includes the Chicago Apparel Center, which is adjacent to the Merchandise Mart, the Washington Design Center and the Washington Office Center.

An attractive component of the deal is that the Kennedy heirs will receive a stake in one of the nation's largest real estate investment trusts. Such trusts enable sellers to defer capital-gains taxes from large sales.

"One of my cousins reminded me of a quote from my grandfather, 'Only a fool waits for top dollar,'" Christopher G. Kennedy, the executive vice president of Merchandise Mart Properties Inc., told The Wall Street Journal. He is a son of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy.

Christopher Kennedy, along with Thomas M. Kennedy, another executive vice president, and Chief Executive Joseph E. Hakim, will remain in charge of managing the properties and trade shows.

John F. Kennedy Jr. joked about his family's Illinois holdings when he visited Chicago in 1996 to mark the launch of George magazine, "In the 1940s, my family bought the Merchandise Mart. In the 1970s, we bought the Apparel Center. And in the 1960 election, my family bought 20,000 votes."

K-Stater arrested for selling drugs, posession; to appear this morning in Riley county court

A K-State theater student was arrested Thursday night on three counts of selling methamphetamines and one count each of methamphetamine and marijuana posession.

Riley County Lt. Herb Crosby said Kathleen Aguirre, junior in theater, was the subject of an investigation by the Riley County Police Department and was arrested at 10:44 p.m. in her University Commons apartment.

Aguirre was not alone but was the only one arrested, Crosby said. She did not resist and was later released on $3,000 bond.

Crosby said the penalty for such charges depends on whether the suspect has a criminal record. He would not comment as to whether Aguirre has such a record.

Brenda Jordan, assistant Riley County attorney, said Aguirre is scheduled to appear in court at 10 a.m. Wednesday, when she would be able to request an attorney and make further arrangements. As of this writing, charges had not been filed.

'Serb Hitler' pleads innocent to war crimes, identifies himself to U.N. by nickname, 'Adolf'

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — A Bosnian Serb who allegedly called himself the Serb Adolf Hitler and boasted of slaying scores of Muslims in 1992 pleaded innocent Monday to genocide and other war crimes.

In an appearance before the Yugoslav war crimes tribunal, Goran Jelisic, 29, called the charges all lies and fabrications.

Jelisic is charged with killing scores of Muslims at the Luka camp in northern Bosnia in May 1992, where prosecutors say he identified himself to inmates as the "Serb Adolf" — a reference to Hitler — and bragged about the number of Muslims he had killed.

Asked Monday to identify himself, Jelisic told the U.N. court, "My name is Goran Jelisic. I am also known by my nickname, Adolf."

Jelisic was arrested Thursday by U.S. troops in the NATO-led peacekeeping force in Bosnia. He is the fourth suspect to be seized by NATO troops and the first to be picked up in an American-led operation.

In addition to genocide, Jelisic is charged with crimes against humanity, war crimes and grave breaches of the Geneva Convention.

Jelisic's indictment documents a regime of terror and murder at Luka, a former port complex on the banks of the Sava River where hundreds of Muslim and Croats were detained after being forced from their homes by rebel Serbs.

According to the indictment, prisoners were sometimes ordered to kneel with their heads over a duct that drained into the river, where Jelisic and other camp guards would shoot them in the back of the head.

UCS program adds services

JENNIFER JANSONIUS
Kansas State Collegian

University Counseling Services has been counseling individuals, groups and couples for 50 years.

Fred Newton, director of UCS, said the center was established in 1946 to help veterans coming back to college.

Since that time, the center has evolved and now provides a variety of services.

"Along with counseling services, we also do several workshops on-site. Out-of-office presentations are available by request," Newton said.

Workshops for the spring semester include subjects such as eating disorders, depression, intercultural skills, stress management and wellness for women, men and emotions, career planning, and the learning enhancement assessment program, or LEAP.

The LEAP program is one of the newest additions. It assesses student learning problems and helps devise plans to improve the academic lives of students.

Newton said the spring workshops usually cost $10, depending on the psychological tests involved for the particular workshop. All students have five free sessions with a counselor.

"If a student wants additional sessions, the cost is $10 per session," he said.

John Robertson, psychologist with UCS, said a session with a patient would involve exploring the patient's social world, health history and interpersonal relationships.

"The highest concern of our patients today is relationship problems," Robertson said.

Robertson said he recommends students seek assistance when they feel the problem is interfering with everyday life.

"The warning signs are subjective," Robertson said.

Some signs that might hint at a need for treatment include fixation with a problem and/or difficulty concentrating while studying or at work.

He said another warning sign is if students feel energy levels are lower than necessary for them to complete daily tasks.

In addition to counseling, Newton said UCS has pamphlets and a home page at www.ksu.edu/ucs/ that can be used to help students help themselves to recognize warning symptoms. The pamphlets and homepage can also be used as resources for writing class papers.

Helping women

▶ INTERIM DIRECTOR APPLIES JOURNALISM BACKGROUND TO NEW POSITION AT CENTER.

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

Susan Allen said she wants the K-State Women's Center to be more than just a place for women in crisis.

Allen was named the interim director of the Women's Center in early January.

"I would like us to do some fun things, sponsor music or art exhibits and different types of entertainment rather than just dealing with crisis situations," she said.

She spent the last five years as assistant director and took over for Judy Davis at the center. Davis, who left the center to become executive director of Manhattan's Crisis Center Inc., said she thinks that Allen would do a good job at the director's position.

"Susan was a wonderful assistant and brings very good things to the Women's Center by having a background in journalism for the newsletter and lots of ideas on other issues," she said.

> "THIS IS A WAY TO NOT ONLY HELP THE WOMEN OF K-STATE BUT ALSO THE RURAL COMMUNITIES."
> SUSAN ALLEN
> interm director of K-State's Women's Center

Elizabeth Crain, who has worked at the center since 1996, was promoted to assistant director.

"Susan is good for this job because she looks at things in all angles, ways that we sometime overlook," she said. "With her background, she can really dissect things to help us put them in proper terms."

As assistant director, Allen was the editor of the newsletter published by the center and will remain editor in addition to her new responsibilities.

"Now I counsel more women, and give more help to Elizabeth Crain as she is in charge of all of our programming and our head counselor, while, funding permitted, we will continue the newsletter," Allen said.

Unlike her predecessor, Allen's primary strength doesn't come in the form of counseling. She said she feels her passion for justice, not only for women but for everyone, will help her in her duties.

"Women at K-State or anywhere need to be allowed to participate in their world without being held back by prejudices," Allen said. "I am one of those people who continues to think that its worth the effort to work toward justice for all citizens and a better balanced world in general."

The center works closely with other service providers in the area and is offering a series of six workshops for women on "Wellness and Stress Management Strategies" in February, in conjunction with University Counseling Services. The Center is also working on planning events for March, Women's History Month.

The staff is also in the process of creating a grant proposal under the direction of Allen with Torry Dickinson, assistant professor in women's studies at K-State and Carol Peak, Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives. The program would create internships for female students at K-State to help women in rural communities create employment opportunities.

"This is a way to not only help the women of K-State but also the rural communities," Allen said. "It gives those communities another avenue to help find employment."

Allen, a native of Wichita, has a doctorate in media anthropology from the University of Kansas and a master's degree in journalism from K-State.

She has been at K-State since 1980, working in the Office of Cultural and Minority Affairs and university counseling before joining the Women's Center in 1993.

Allen also worked in Washington, D.C., in Senator Nancy Landon Kassebaum's office. There, she mainly dealt with constituents and writing letters, but also wrote the Senate resolution that was sent to the 1980 Olympic Committee, in an attempt to persuade them to include the Women's Marathon as an Olympic event. The Women's Marathon was included that year for the first time.

"I was very privileged to have had the honor to write that resolution," she said. "Senator Kassebaum then asked me, 'Isn't it fun when you can make a difference?' And it was. That was a part of history I will never forget."

Tobacco industry deceived public, attorney says

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

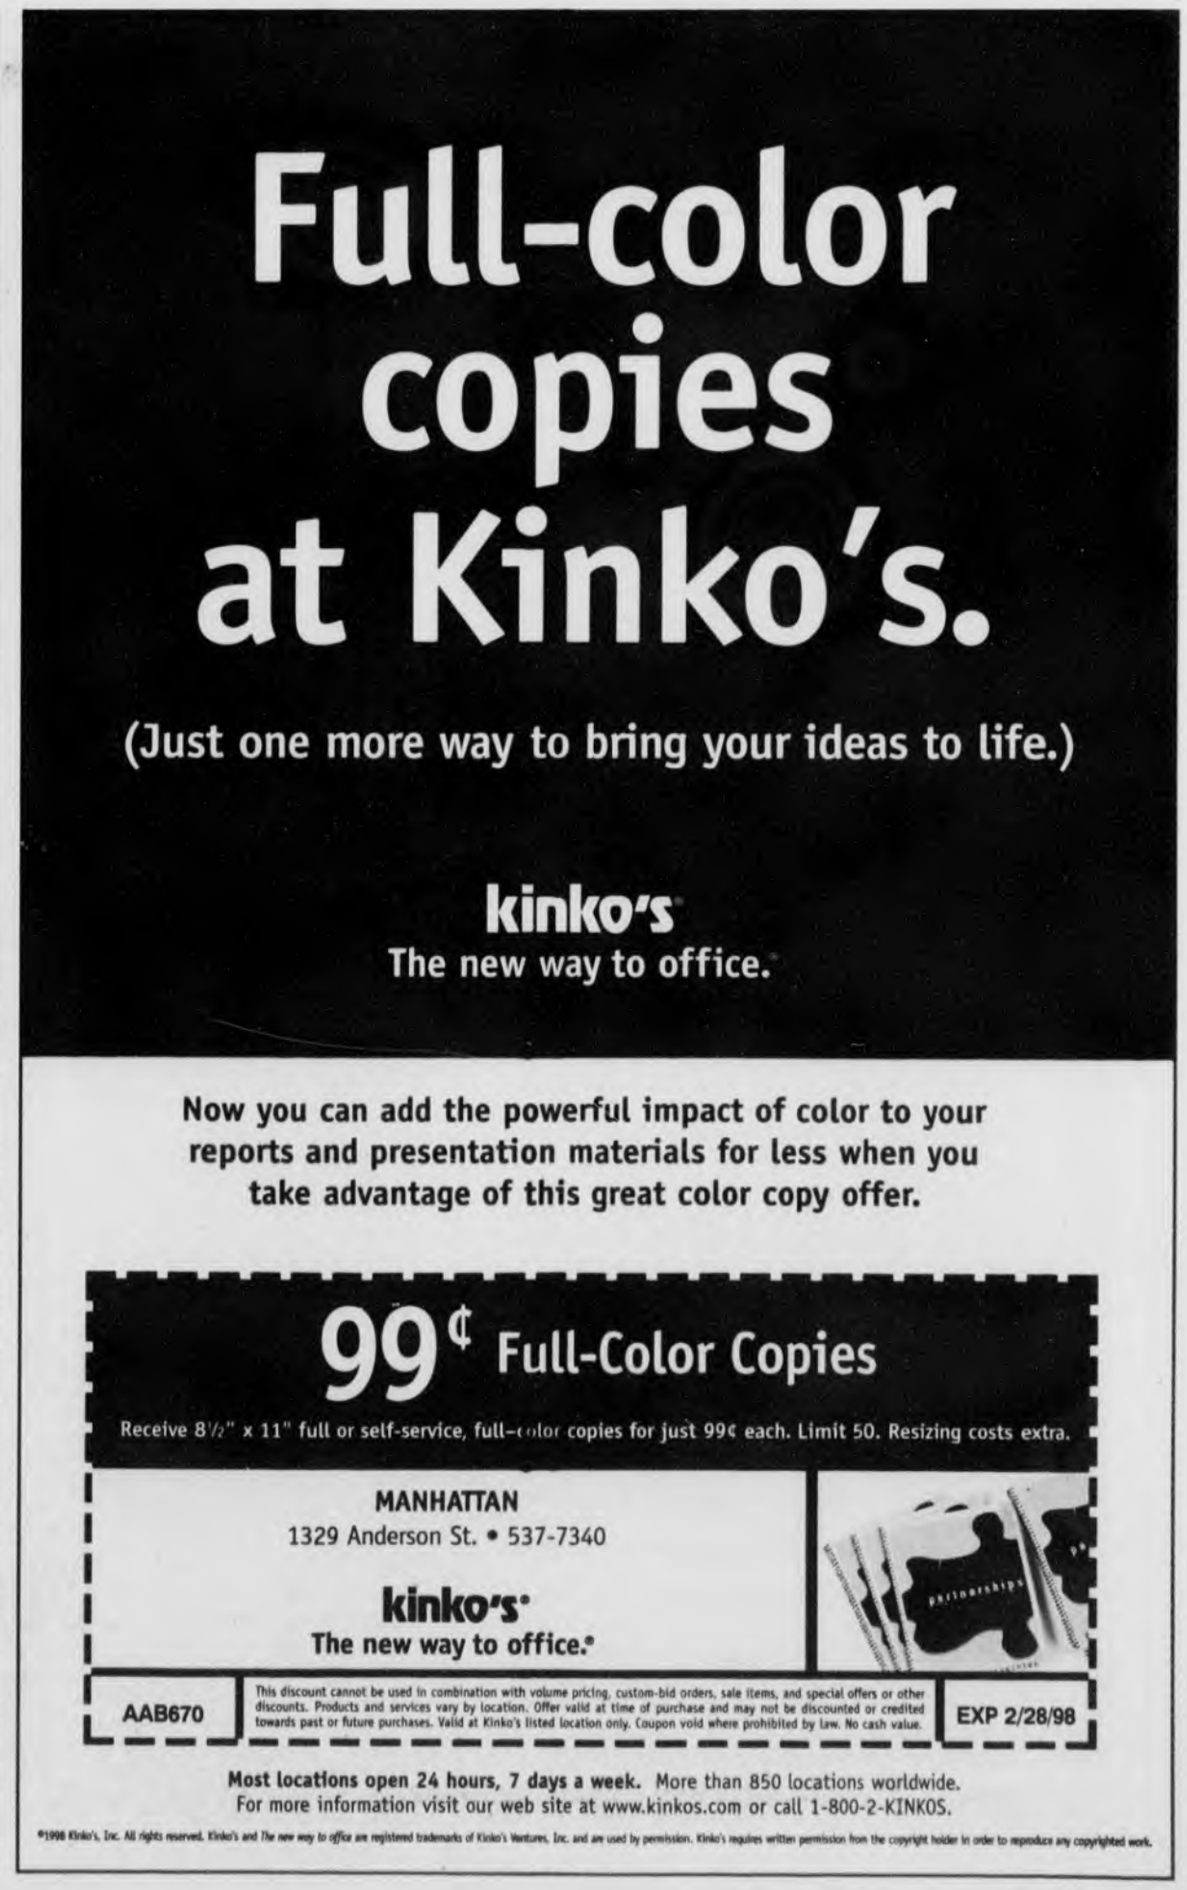
ST. PAUL, Minn. — Tobacco companies deceived the public about the dangers of smoking for decades, and the state of Minnesota has documents to prove it, an attorney for the state said Monday.

"This case is about the conduct of the industry and how this industry chose — intentionally chose — to violate the laws of the state of Minnesota," attorney Michael Ciresi said.

"To this day all of the defendants save one, Liggett, publicly deny that smoking is addictive and causes disease," Ciresi said, as opening statements began in what could be a four-month trial.

"Except for Liggett, which has admitted the addictive nature of nicotine, not one of these defendants has disclosed all that they know," Ciresi said.

The state will introduce evidence from millions of secret industry documents to prove its case, Ciresi said.



The state and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Minnesota are seeking reimbursement for the costs of treating smoking-related illnesses, estimated at $1.75 billion. The plaintiffs also seek punitive damages.

The state and Blue Cross claim tobacco companies committed fraud by suppressing information on the dangers of smoking while publicly denying that tobacco was a health hazard.

In addition to Brown & Williamson, defendants include Philip Morris Inc.; R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.; Lorillard Tobacco Co.; the Tobacco Institute; and Liggett Group Inc., which is a defendant of Blue Cross only.

Liggett reached a separate settlement with the state last year.

President's speech tainted by scandalous rumors

As President Clinton's sixth State of the Union address floods the airwaves tonight, any news concerning the future of our country will unfortunately be overshadowed by the latest scandal development.

Sadly, the American people are enduring another wave of controversy in the term of this popular president, and this time, no one will emerge a winner.

Politicians are concerned about persistent scandals overshadowing the business of government and the potential harm of a president forced to defend himself against charges of sexual misconduct while still in the White House.

Although Clinton is innocent until proven guilty, an entire nation is discussing the sex life of the president. Media and news outlets, in a flurry of discussion about the objectiveness and amount of coverage, are forced to decide how explicit their reports will be.

For the first time, news programs have referred to a distinction between oral sex and intercourse in defining alleged adultery in connection with the president.

Shows are actually warning against sexual content and striving for good taste while still attempting to have honest coverage of relevant details.

The names of the men and women involved have been tossed around on the nightly news, earning them a part in what-if discussions all over the world.

While opinions are divided over a nation's right to know the intimate details of a president's sex life, some are more interested in the quality of his job performance.

The questions and speculations are endless, and when all the facts are brought to light, the American people will have to decide how much they care about the alleged exploits of their president.

Hopefully, Americans will never tolerate a president who breaks the laws of the country he leads.

During tonight's address, the president will talk directly to Americans. Tune in and listen, and remember the future of America is larger than this scandal.

Americans have the power to define what we expect from the office of the president.

In this situation, we need to decide how much the issues of character and integrity should play a role in whom we elect.

In defense of winter's white annoyance

MARNY BURKE/Collegian

Snow is as close as I'll ever get to God.

My roommate has cursed snow with every other breath this winter, and it's not difficult to see why. While we got our much-sought white Christmas, most everyone making the holiday pilgrimage turned into hockey pucks on the state's roads. Frostbite and blue hands lose their appeal rather quickly, and this is just in the state of Kansas. Let's not even bring Maine into the picture.

Is there anything less appealing than gray snow? After mixing with mud and ice, the resulting mass of dead snow is just an afterthought, and it just can't melt fast enough. Sidewalks covered in ice make even pedestrian travel challenging or hazardous. Let's not forget the jump in utility bills as heaters kick in, struggling to keep temperatures indoors somewhere above absolute zero during daylight hours, and there is no greater bane to vagabonds and other travelers than freezing rain.

I can understand, to a degree, grousing about winter and its effect on the carefully crafted itineraries of hard-working Americans, but snow has always had a bizarre grasp on what's left of my soul for reasons I'm notoriously bad at delineating — but it's worth a shot. It deserves justification or at least defense.

The autumn world is colorful, even radiant, but its floor is soon covered with corpses of leaves and the oranges become shades of brown — lifeless, barren, fallen. Permeated with death but not dead itself, it's a world in need of revitalization and resurrection, of something divine to spark a change.

I wish I could remember my response the first time I saw snow. Rain is mindless, it's an army of lemming-minded droplets kamikaze-crashing into the ground with yawning uniformity. Snow is distinctive in the individuality of each — you remember hearing how no two snowflakes are alike? That's hard enough to imagine when staring at a snowdrift, let alone imagining all the snow in the world at that moment, or even all the snow that has ever been or will ever be. It's an idea my mind can't even approach — it cowers, almost reverently, at such a concept.

The descent of each snow crystal is also unique, with the fragile flakes violently tossed away on the breath of a whisper, making buoying clouds in the oddly silent descent from the clouds.

Falling snow moves like a thing alive, a crystal sometimes casually slipping between the branches of a tree and circling them for a moment as if distracted before resuming on its downward exodus.

A good dusting of snow takes the most earthen, drab landscape and denies its color, rendering it a stark white, covering the autumnal carnage almost apologetically. The crystalline nature of snow is best seen at daybreak, when minuscule sparkles of color peek in and out over the newly smoothed landscape. After landing, each snowflake is a transitory diamond, a reflection of pure crystalline order, but only until the temperature tears it quietly apart. There's an inherent, tragic beauty in this brevity.

A good snowscape is visually unfamiliar — it makes you see your home, roads or terrain differently, as if anew. A snowscape is cleansed of the base earthiness of the seasons before and replaced with almost pristine order and divine serenity. Snow is forgiveness.

I see little redeemable in this world. Whether it's the petty and vicious cruelties we save for the people closest to us or the mind-numbing statistics of evil and injustice en masse, my eyes are instantly drawn to humanity's errors made not once but constantly and simultaneously. Crimes to each other, to our world, or even to ourselves have tried my spirit to the point where the spark of forgiveness is, in me, at best a memory, at worst a delusion. Were it given to me, I'd burn it all in fire in the hopes that the flames would cleanse the taint, and something redeemable might emerge from the ashes.

But what I see in snow is infinitely more than I am capable of. I see forgiveness. I see patience. I see cleansing of the world's wound of existence. I see order and precision of a magnitude which by itself almost transcends nature and alone proves, if not defines, God.

I'm no theologian. I have trouble believing in what I can't see, hear or spend. God to me is still a pretty hazy concept at best, but it's never as clear as on the first chilly whistle of the season's first snow. I'm not convinced humanity is worthy of snow, but I'll never be able to turn my back on it.

And, failing all else, nothing beats nailing a copy editor with a perfectly packed snowball.

Library funding needs to be collected from 3 areas, dean of libraries says

Editor,

The Collegian editorial staff, concerning Monday's "Leadership needed in library funding options" editorial, are, understandably, not privy to the coalition-building that is occurring among university, legislative and KSU Foundation leaders.

But, the editorial is helpful in creating campus awareness, because this is a "university problem," and indeed, a problem for all faculty and students worldwide. Since 1986 there has been a worldwide hyperinflation of scholarly information costs and a continuing transformation to electronic formats, while worldwide publishing is being captured by worldwide monopolies.

The best efforts of leaders worldwide have not been able to reverse this run-up in costs (14-percent average annual inflation for journals since 1986). In reality, a "fund" was created and this has been a "priority" for the past 10 years at K-State. More than $1 million has already been added to library acquisitions funding since 1986 by legislative, Foundation and university leadership. But, it is not nearly enough.

We can all agree that the solution to library funding cannot fall exclusively on students. Thus, it is extremely important that university, Foundation and legislative leaders get their ducks in order, before there is an approach to students. It would be unconscionable to place the entire "fix" on student fees. There must be legislative and Foundation commitments along with student involvement, a tripartite approach to a very nasty problem.

Nevertheless, I want to convey that there is not a lack of attention to this issue by K-State leadership. I was personally involved in the development of the creative funding coalitions that resulted in our incredible $30 million Hale Library renovation and expansion.

The same creative leadership is being brought to bear on library funding. I have met with President Jon Wefald and his staff repeatedly in the past two months to discuss the necessity to build the tripartite funding plan among the Legislature, the Foundation and the university (including students).

The Kansas Board of Regents asked the Legislature for a 1-percent other operating expenses supplement for libraries in October, because leadership at K-State asked for it. The governor would not have recommended one-half of 1 percent except for the strong input from K-State leadership. The Foundation will be responding in the next few days with a commitment to assistance, because Wefald has given it the charge to do so.

The Task Force on Library Funding recommended a coalition of legislative, Foundation and university funding developed in the next five years to increase information resources purchased for academic and research programs. K-State leadership responded appropriately to the legislative and Foundation portions. We are asking students to debate a request for a credit-hour fee in support of the libraries, matching the legislative and Foundation commitments.

Stories of week keep columnist wishy-washy

One night in January, my parents felt passionate. That's an image I could do without. Even so, nine months later I was born with the curse.

The curse of being a Libra. The scales. The balance. The wishy-washy nature of the beast. Fortunately, no one ever asked, "What's your sign?" Unfortunately, they know now.

VIEWPOINT

PAMELA MANNING

Pamela is a senior in radio and television. You can send e-mail to Pamela at pdm6732@ksu.edu.

The curse of being a Libra is that things don't appear black and white. There's lots of gray in between, and at different scales. Decision-making for me is worse than having all my wisdom teeth pulled at once. Anyone who knows me can speak on my gift of indecisiveness. I've even thought of calling myself a moderate Republican, just so I can hide behind my fence-straddling.

The death penalty gets people talking. Here lately, though, they're talking, and I'm not sure I'm fully understanding. Uncle Ted the Unabomber pleaded guilty to his crimes in exchange for avoiding the death penalty. What gives?

One side of my scale tips toward his mother and his brother. For them I'm OK with the fact Teddy will spend the rest of his life in prison instead of the alternative. Especially for his brother, since he was the one who turned him in. The fact they've had to endure any of this has surely eaten away a great portion of their lives.

But what about the families of the victims, or those who survived the attacks but were severely injured? Some of them have expressed satisfaction with the result. Others, however, haven't been so forgiving. Their loved ones are dead or living with permanent disabilities.

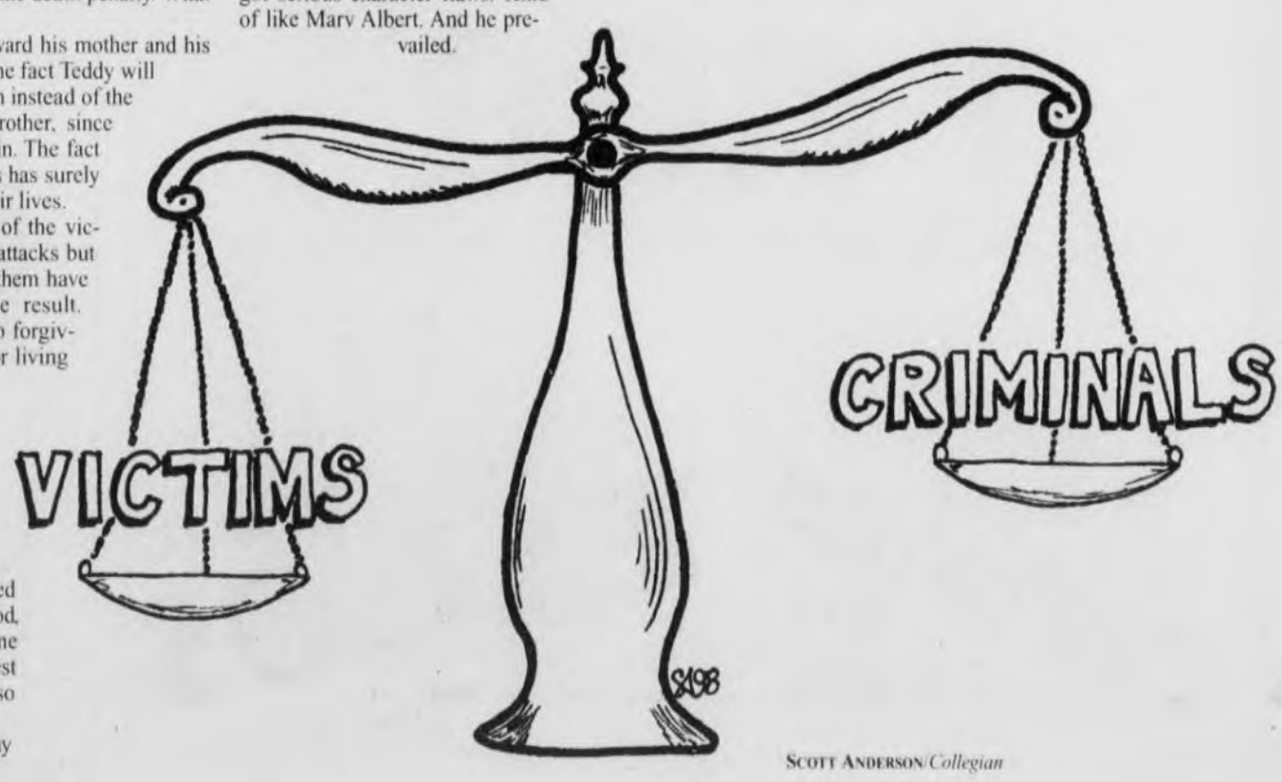
The other side of my scale tips toward them. That side believes those who kill should be killed. An eye for an eye. Without the plea, the death penalty would have most certainly been the outcome of the trial. How can it be justified to them that Kaczynski gets food, shelter, employment and some semblance of normalcy for the rest of his life when they have lost so much?

Just as ridiculous is Karla Fay Tucker, on death row in Texas. All of a sudden she had a Jesus experience, so religious media mogul Pat Robertson and others are pushing for her sentence to be commuted to life in prison. I have positive religious beliefs, but I don't think it should be an excuse to save her life. I don't think the family of those she axe-murdered should see it that way either.

See Bill. See Bill and Hillary. Bill and Gennifer. Bill and Paula. Bill and Kathleen. Bill and Monica. See the news media run.

Once again I'm balancing the scales with the political pundits. On the one hand, if Billy did ask anyone to lie on his behalf, to obstruct justice, he should be called on the presidential carpet for it. If it's true he sexually harassed Paula Jones, he should also get his just desserts.

Those are my beliefs in terms of following the laws of this country. Outside of the legal claims, the rest of the allegations from Lewinsky, Flowers and Willey seem to involve consensual sex. The biggest vocal noise is that Clinton claims it never happened.



Suppose the allegations become factual. Let's say Clinton did have a relationship with the intern. She was 21. Adulthood was hers. If it's proven once and for all that he had consensual sex with the other women, all he is guilty of is perjury. It's purely a character issue. He's just like the rest of us in that he's got serious character flaws. Kind of like Marv Albert. And he prevailed.

Saying that one spouse who lies to the other cannot be trusted at all, ever again, in any situation is digging your heels in way too deep. We had indications of President Kennedy's dalliances, but to this day he remains one of our most valued politicians.

For their part, the news media have been at their best and worst. On television, this story has been called everything from "Investigating the President" to "Clinton Sex Scandal" and "Sex, Lies and the White House." You can't escape it. Try as they might news readers can't help slanting this story. Somebody tell Susan Carpenter-McMillan to get off my set. Gate keeping at its finest.

The real story of last week lasted only about a day and a half. A visibly frail Pope visits agnostic Cuba. A respectable Fidel Castro emerges, possibly sensing his own imminent mortality. The welcoming, the celebration and the tears of the people were something truly to behold. I guess it wasn't a big story in the United States. Our media hurriedly rushed back to cover Clinton. Don't they know the Cuba experience was truly once in a lifetime? How funny if the Clinton story blows up in their faces. Long live freedom of the press.

Being the Libra, I have so much more to say. I just can't decide what it is.

Brownback defends campaign spending

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Tired of seemingly endless questions about his 1996 campaign fund raising, Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas has issued a 12-page memorandum to the news media telling his side of the story.

Democratic complaints about Brownback and about Washington-based Triad Management Services are nothing new, and Brownback has yet to draw a Democratic opponent for his 1998 re-election bid.

A Brownback spokesman, Bob Murray, said Monday the freshman senator wants to correct inaccuracies that persist — and hoped the memo, issued late Friday, would do the job.

"It just cascades from one story to another," Murray said. "You repeat things enough times and they have a tendency to become fact — whether they are or not."

Topics in the memo range from a history of campaign law to whether Brownback's 1996 race against Democrat Jill Docking to complete Bob Dole's term was really close. It also addresses the use of adjectives like "shadowy" and "secretive" in news stories about Brownback contributors.

The subject recurred last week when Roll Call, a Capitol Hill publication, reported on Democratic allegations that Brownback illegally received huge last-minute donations from Triad.

Triad is a conservative political consulting firm that matches GOP donors with candidates.

In fact, Brownback's campaign received no direct contributions from Triad, the memo points out, and there have been no such allegations from Democrats.

Democratic complaints have centered on Triad's operations and its link to Brownback's in-laws, Topeka media millionaires John and Ruth Stauffer. The Stauffers donated $37,500 to eight political action committees, which then donated $36,000 to Brownback's campaign in July 1996. The memo also focuses on the role of labor unions in the 1996 Kansas elections.

In particular, it notes a study issued last Sept. 16 by the Annenberg Public Policy Center of the University of Pennsylvania which concluded the AFL-CIO spent about $35 million in 1996 on so-called issue advertising, which is not subject to campaign contribution limits.

The memo says some estimates place labor's political activity in all 1996 races nationwide as high as $300 million, "virtually establishing them as America's third political party."

Steve Rosenthal, AFL-CIO political director, called that claim ludicrous.

"I wish we had $300 million to spend for political purposes," Rosenthal said Monday. He said the Brownback campaign "tried to use us as an excuse for organizations like Triad that were set up to literally pump hundreds of millions of dollars in big business money into the '96 election."

Rosenthal pointed to a study by the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan think tank, concluding that business outspent labor 11-to-1 in all 1996 races. Rosenthal said he didn't know how much money AFL-CIO spent in Kansas.

A spokesman for the Center for Responsive Politics said Monday it is difficult to track labor expenditures, but "the very same holds true for issue ads that other interest groups buy."

"Those aren't disclosed at the Federal Election Commission, either," said Paul Hendrie, the center's communications director.

Ultimately, Brownback's memo said, there is no evidence that special interest on either side materially affected the outcome of the race, although it details at least $1 million in issue advocacy funds from the Democratic Party, labor and other groups that went to Docking.

It also asserts that spending is not out of control because for the total spent on the open Senate seat — estimated at about $6.4 million — the per-voter cost was $6.

"Why would groups pour so much money into a state like that if they didn't think they were having some impact on the race?" Hendrie asked. "That's a questionable statement. And the money (for television advertising) tends to go farther in a state like Kansas."

Docking was recuperating Monday from recent elective surgery and could not be reached for comment.

Her campaign spokesman, Scott Swenson, said he was baffled by the memo's assertions that the race was never close and that Brownback's polls showed comfortable leads of 10 to 15 points throughout the campaign.

"In our polling, the lead changed hands," Swenson said. "Our internal polling showed it was very volatile. It showed us as up by as much as eight points in one poll and down by five or six in another."

A Mason-Dixon poll in the race's final days, on Nov. 2, showed Brownback leading Docking 46 percent to 45 percent with a 3.5 margin of error.

Murray argued the final vote tally — with Brownback winning 54 percent to 43 percent — showed the race could not have been so close. The memo notes Brownback's totals mirrored Dole's and ran ahead of the margins in three of the four House districts, all won by Republicans.

Students teach English language

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

The Conversational English Program at K-State gives participants an opportunity to teach and learn.

The program lets international students and their spouses practice their English in an informal setting and learn about American culture.

Irene Nephew, graduate student in education, said she and her husband volunteered to have a conversational partner because it would be a good experience.

"I'm from England and thought it would be a good learning experience for me, and I can empathize with some of the difficulties of living in a country with a different culture," she said.

She and her husband have taken their conversational partner, Cristain Ghiaus, to Topeka, a Kansas City art museum, a basketball game and out to eat.

Ghiaus, a Fulbright scholar visiting from the Technical University of Bucharest in Romania, said he is lucky, because he has met a special family.

"They are more like my friends. It's not like a course," Ghiaus said.

Alan Aubert, graduate assistant for the International Student Center, said the program was started in 1978 with funding from the Educational Opportunity Fund.

"The Conversational English Program came out of a need for new internationals who have studied and speak English, but need to practice," Aubert said.

Not only is this an opportunity for international people to practice their English, Aubert said it's also an opportunity for the volunteers who work with the program.

Aubert said the program has a heightened awareness of cultural diversity, and it's an opportunity for students to gain an international experience without leaving Manhattan.

Tim Sidorfsky, sophomore in physics, took advantage of that opportunity. He said he signed up for the program because he wanted to learn about other cultures and people from other places.

"Some of the ways other people look at our culture, or the world, is a very good mind-opening experience and gives you a different perspective on the world," Sidorfsky said.

NCAA

No. 11 Princeton 59, College of New Jersey 50

PRINCETON, N.J. — Brian Earl scored 16 points, including five in an 8-0 run to start the second half, as No. 11 Princeton beat Division III College of New Jersey in its first game after a 16-day layoff.

The Tigers (14-1) were rusty after returning from the lengthy exam break, and were playing CNJ (14-2) — ranked No. 5 in Division III — for the first time.

CNJ, trailing 33-24 at the half, missed its first nine shots to open the second half as the Tigers built a 41-24 lead and then moved ahead 55-37 with 2:33 left.

Joe Amari, a high school teammate of Earl's, led CNJ with 20 points.

Princeton annually schedules a lower division opponent as a warmup before returning to Ivy League play.

No. 13 South Carolina 79, Furman 52

GREENVILLE, S.C. — BJ McKie scored 14 of his 16 points in the first half, including three of South Carolina's season-high 11 three-pointers, as the Gamecocks ran past Furman.

South Carolina (14-3) hit nine three-pointers in the first half. The Gamecocks led 44-20 and went on to win for the sixth time in seven games.

Chuck Vincent scored 13 points for Furman, which has not beaten South Carolina since 1980.

No. 20 Syracuse 84, Georgetown 66

WASHINGTON D.C. — Etan Thomas scored 17 of his 23 points in the first half as the Orangemen (16-4, 6-3 Big East) routed the Hoyas (11-7, 4-6).

The sophomore center was eight for 11 from the field and seven of 10 from the line in posting a career-best point total.

The loss snapped a two-game winning streak for Georgetown, which is in danger of finishing with a losing record in Big East play for only the second time in the John Thompson era.

Syracuse hit 34 of 46 free throws, while Georgetown converted 19 of 33 from the line.

NBA

Celtics 94, Knicks 85

BOSTON — The Boston Celtics ended their 21-game losing streak against New York on Monday night, beating the Knicks 94-85 behind 25 points from Chauncey Billups.

It was Boston's first win over New York since Jan. 10, 1993. The losing streak was the Celtics' longest ever against an opponent, while the 21-straight victories were the most by the Knicks against one team.

Antoine Walker had 16 points, six assists and seven rebounds for Boston. Allan Houston led New York with 21 points.

Raptors 91, Sixers 87

TORONTO — Oliver Miller got loose for a go-ahead layup with 3.5 seconds left and the Toronto Raptors tied a team record with their third-straight win.

Miller, who scored nine points, made a layup with 21 seconds remaining that tied it at 87. Marcus Camby then lofted an inbounds pass over Derrick Coleman's reach and into the hands of Miller, who had an easy shot for the lead.

Doug Christie, who scored 26 points for the Raptors, intercepted Jim Jackson's pass with less than three seconds left and dunked to seal the victory. Damon Stoudamire added 20 points and eight assists for Toronto.

Rookie Tim Thomas led the Sixers with 14 points while Allen Iverson scored only 13. Iverson missed nine minutes of the second quarter because of a cut that required five stitches to his upper lip.

Suns 96, Hawks 91

ATLANTA — Rex Chapman scored 13 of his 26 points in the third quarter and Danny Manning got nine of his 19 in the final period as the Phoenix Suns beat the Atlanta Hawks.

It was the fifth victory in six games for the Suns and the fourth loss in a row for Atlanta, which chopped a 12-point fourth-quarter deficit to 87-86 on Dikembe Mutombo's two free throws with 4:39 remaining.

But Mutombo missed four free throws in the final four minutes, and the Suns got baskets by Steve Nash, Mark Bryant and Manning to keep the lead the rest of the way.

Steve Smith led the Hawks with 26 points and Mutombo added 20.

Cavaliers 94, Heat 93

MIAMI — Rookie center Zydrunas Ilgauskas scored 23 points, including a free throw with 1.3 seconds left that gave Cleveland a victory over Miami.

The win was the third straight for the Cavaliers, who snapped a 10-game losing streak at Miami Arena.

Reserve center Vitaly Potapenko had 18 points and Wesley Person added 16 for Cleveland. Tim Hardaway led the Heat with 33 points.

Trailing 88-81, the Heat rallied to tie at 93 on Hardaway's three-point shot with 21.4 seconds left. The Cavs then worked for the final shot, and the 7-foot-3-inch Ilgauskas found himself free on the baseline and drew a foul from Jamal Mashburn.

Ilgauskas hit the first free throw and missed the second. Miami couldn't get a shot off, however, as Dan Majerle's inbounds pass was deflected as time expired.

Leeper jumps ahead of competition at ISU Open

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

With a high jump of 7 feet, 4 1/4 inches in Saturday's Iowa State University Open, Nathan Leeper became one of two Wildcats to bring home a gold medal.

"He jumped higher than he's ever jumped in his life," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Still, I think he has a long way to go."

Leeper's previous personal record was 7 feet, 3 3/4 inches, his winning jump at the NJCAA Outdoor Championship when he competed for Dodge City Community College.

His jump of 7 feet, 4 1/4 inches is a provisional qualifying mark for the NCAA Indoor Championships.

"I should be able to jump a lot higher than that," Leeper said. "Once I get used to this rotation, I should get over the bar easier."

Leeper credited good rotation over the crossbar and a firm surface for his winning jump.

Rovelto said Leeper's willingness to work will be key in determining how high he will be able to jump, and he has a lot to live up to because of past Wildcat high-jump greats.

Those greats include 1993 NCAA Indoor Champion Percell Gaskins, 1996 NCAA Indoor All-American Itai Margalit and 1996 Olympic qualifier Ed Broxterman.

"ONCE I GET USED TO THIS ROTATION, I SHOULD GET OVER THE BAR EASIER."

NATHAN LEEPER
K-State high jumper who set a personal best Saturday

"The standard that has been set here by guys before him is pretty high," Rovelto said.

Leeper's performance at the ISU Open narrowed the gap between himself and the former K-State greats, but he still does not have the highest jump by a Cat this season.

Charles Burney cleared the crossbar at 7 feet, 4 1/2 inches at the KSU Allcomers meet on Dec. 6, and tied Broxterman for third on K-State's all-time list with that jump. Leeper is fifth on the list, with Gaskins and Margalit remaining as the top two all-time K-State indoor high jumpers.

Rovelto said both Leeper and Burney are capable of jumping as high as K-State's all-time greats.

"I don't want to limit them, so it's hard to say," Rovelto said. "I think they're capable of jumping just as high as anyone else is capable of jumping."

At the ISU Open, Leeper topped his K-State predecessors Margalit and Broxterman, who were both competing unattached.

Margalit took second place with a jump of 7 feet, 2 1/4 inches and Broxterman finished in third place with a jump of 7 feet, 1/4 inch. Burney jumped 7 feet, 1/4 inch in a fourth-place effort.

Regardless of how high he jumps, Leeper said only a championship would truly put him in the company of the greats.

"Until I do something great like win a championship or go to the Olympics, I'm not going to be on the same plateau as those guys," Leeper said.

Sophomore weight thrower Renetta Seiler joined Leeper as the Cats' other gold medal winner in the ISU Open.

Seiler remained unbeaten in the weight throw this season with a throw of 63 feet, 5 inches. That throw was an automatic qualifier for the NCAA Indoor Championships, but her best throw of the season, 67 feet, 9 inches, came at the Jan. 16 Wildcat Invitational.

Sophomore Anna Whitham placed third in the weight throw with a toss of 56 feet, 3 inches. She provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships with that throw.

Senior sprinter Keith Black provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships in the 400-meter dash with a time of 46.84 seconds. He placed third in the race and improved by more than a second from his time in the Wildcat Invitational a week before.

"Keith will tell you he's disappointed with his time, but it's better than where he was at this time last year," Rovelto said of the 1997 all-American.

DAN CATALDI

Senior leadership helped the K-State women's tennis team roll past a young Southwest Missouri State squad in its season opener Sunday in Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats barely broke a sweat, dropping just two sets in a 9-0 victory over the Bears, a team with no juniors or seniors on its roster.

The shutout victory could help the Cats keep their No. 60 national ranking by the Intercollegiate Tennis Association.

The Cats were led by their four seniors, none of whom lost a set. At No. 1 singles, Yana Dorodnova won in straight sets, 6-4, 6-1, over the Bear's Tuva Hegna.

"Yana played very good tennis," K-State coach Steve Bietau said.

After opening up a 5-1 lead in the first set, Dorodnova dropped three-straight games before turning the match back in her favor. She won seven of the last eight games of the match.

"I think I played pretty good," Dorodnova said. "I let her come back a little bit in the first set, but I put some pressure on her to finish the match. At first I relaxed a little bit because the match was going really easy for me."

Another senior, Lena Piliptchak, was down 4-1 early in her match at No. 3 singles, but recovered to win in straight sets, 6-4, 6-3.

"I started going to the net right after my serve and returning a little bit better," Piliptchak said. "I got into the match and won five games in a row to win the set."

Closing out the seniors play in singles was Dinah Watson at No. 4. Watson blew past Asa Duneborn 6-1, 6-0 in the most lopsided match of the day.

"She had a very solid, business like performance, and never gave her opponent a chance to get into the match," Bietau said.

While the seniors led the way for the Cats, three freshmen also contributed victories in singles.

Anna Pampoulova won a spirited match at No. 2 singles over the Bears' Olga Rembiclinska. The three-set match ended up 6-2, 5-7, 6-4.

At No. 5 singles, Eva Novotna' cruised to a 6-2, 6-1 victory over Amy Newman.

Closing out the singles matches for the Cats was Natalia Farmer at No. 6. She won a hard-fought match over Sara Anciaux, coming back after losing the first set 5-7.

She battled back to win a tie breaker to take the set 7-6, fighting off two match points. Farmer finished off the match with a 6-0 third-set win.

The doubles play was no different for the Cats as they were again led by their seniors, with all four posting victories.

Again, Dorodnova paced the group as she teamed with Novotna' at the No. 1 position to give the Cats an 8-3 victory over Hegna and Newman.

"The number one doubles team looked relatively mistake-free," Bietau said.

This win could help the pair keep its No. 3 ranking in the Central region of the ITA rankings.

"I think we are getting into the shape that we were last fall," Dorodnova said. "I expect a very good season because we really get along with each other."

At the No. 2 spot, Piliptchak paired with Pampoulova to post an 8-2 win against the Bears' team of Rembiclinska and Viktoria Gimberg.

"It was good for the first match," Piliptchak said. "I think we stayed very focused."

Two K-State seniors, Chris Schulte and Watson, joined to complete the sweep over the Bears as they won the No. 3 doubles match 8-4 over Duneborn and Anciaux.

"It was a very good start for the whole team," Dorodnova said. "Everybody played reasonably well for the first match, especially the freshmen."

Asbury's colorful demeanor adds spectrum to team's success

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

Scott is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

Tom Asbury is colorful. Full of color, just like his neckties. A splash of sarcasm. Hints of anger. A flash of humor. Always coordinated and perfect for any occasion.

Especially at press conferences after basketball games. He loves it that way.

He enters the postgame press conference and might offer a congenial nod, a wink, a small slap on the pant leg of reporters who stand in his path to his podium.

Camera lights shine and all eyes focus on Asbury as he orchestrates the group of reporters, reveals the unknown, reiterates the obvious, emphasizes the keys to winning and criticizes mistakes.

He doesn't tell the media if he's playing a game with them.

He lays out all the facts and lets the reporters decide. But he's unpredictable like the Magic Eight Ball. The Eight Ball knows all.

Shake up Asbury and you never know what you'll get.

Ask him about his team's play against Colorado on Sunday afternoon. K-State led by 22 points with seven minutes left in the game. You think he'd feel comfortable.

He didn't.

Manny Dies averaged 21 points through seven Big 12 games. His five double-doubles lead the team. He has blossomed into a solid Big 12 player as his 28-point, 13-rebound, five-block performance illustrated Sunday.

Any comment?

"I'm not sure Manny has been doing it consistently," Asbury said. "But he's been playing pretty well lately."

Sunday's pregame lineup against Colorado listed forwards Pero Vasiljevic and Chris Griffin as starters. But forward Manny Dies and Josh Reid stood at midcourt before tip-off.

Vasiljevic and Griffin wore warm-ups on the bench.

Ask him why he changed the lineup and you'll get a response sort of like this: "I continuously mess with the media and always make sure I give a lineup in your newspapers and press releases that will not start."

Brilliant. A splash of sarcasm. A couple hints of anger. A flash of humor. All mixed into one.

That is what makes Asbury fun. He won't tell you he's disgusted with the media for picking K-State to finish dead last in the Big 12 Conference.

"If the Big 12 had 13 teams, we would have been picked 13th," he said.

And everybody laughs.

ASBURY

Asbury is a coach, not a comedian. Yet, often times his clever responses receive a press room chuckle. He'll tell you he doesn't care about the polls, anyway.

Asbury demands dedication from his players. He goes by the book on disciplinary action. Don't ask for the name of the book. He won't tell it to you.

But Asbury's commitment to running a solid program in all facets began when he benched Dies and Vasiljevic early in the season for off-court incidents and when he benched guard Duane Davis later for receiving his second DUI offense.

Dies had arguably the best game of his college career Sunday, but because he was reportedly late to a team practice earlier in the week, Dies was off-limits to the media for the second or third or fourth time this season and stood outside the locker room dressed in his letter jacket, blue jeans, ball cap, socks and sandals with nothing to say to anyone.

Sure, Asbury gets tired of the incidents, the load of crap that he carries as a Division I basketball coach.

Somehow, everything seems to just nip at his heels and his team continues to march through the Big 12 and at 12-5, already boasting the biggest turnaround in school history.

The same sports writers who voted K-State to the cellar of the Big 12 will look for Asbury's name to be mentioned as a candidate for Big 12 Coach of the Year in March.

Asbury sometimes gets frustrated. He doesn't like to talk to the media when questions become monotonous. Especially after the 69-62 loss to Kansas.

Looking like a trapped tiger amid the chaos of TV cameras and reporters in the hallway of Allen Fieldhouse, where microphones suddenly poked him like stun guns, he had finally had enough with the press.

Defense tactic: "You people are all ugly. There are no pretty people in this group. Does anyone have an intelligent question for me?"

Yes. Are sports writers supposed to be pretty?

Motivation makes the musician

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Although K-State Professor Sara Funkhouser has seen many woodwind students during her 40 years of teaching music, she rarely recommends students to play professionally.

However, Funkhouser has seen a few students, including oboist Michael Dressler, who have the motivation to beat these odds.

Dressler, a Manhattan High School senior, has studied with Funkhouser for seven years. He recently won the Topeka Symphony Youth Talent Audition, earning him the opportunity to play Mozart's Oboe Concerto with the Topeka Symphony Orchestra next month. Dressler has upcoming auditions at Julliard and the Cleveland Institute of Music.

Funkhouser teaches classes in bassoon and oboe, which she calls applied instruments, as well as in recorder and the shawm, historical instruments not commonly played anymore.

She studied at Julliard, played with the Kansas City Philharmonic and has instructed students for four decades, two of those at K-State. But she said there have been only six or seven students she recommended to become professional musicians.

Funkhouser said students must be so motivated, that if they might want to do anything else professionally, she would encourage the other profession.

"Music schools graduate too many talented performers for the jobs available," Funkhouser said.

Graduates from the top conservatories are competing for relatively few full-time musical performance jobs, she said.

Funkhouser credits Dressler's phrasing ability, how a single note is played in a phrase of notes, for his success in the Topeka Symphony competition.

"Michael is eager to learn everything," Funkhouser said.

He often brings questions to his lessons in an effort to learn as much as possible, she said.

Dressler has the rare motivation level required to play professionally, but for many music students, the jobs may not be available.

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian
Oboist Michael Dressler, 18, senior at Manhattan High School, has studied with K-State music professor Sara Funkhouser for seven years.

The entire state of Kansas has no full-time orchestra, Funkhouser said, while Missouri has one. Funkhouser said this is a sad state of cultural affairs.

"In Europe there are more full-time orchestras. Every city has two or three," Funkhouser said.

The lack of full-time professional orchestras in the United States makes it difficult for music graduates to get a job performing, she said.

Funkhouser's students credit her teaching skills with improving their performances.

"She always encouraged me to practice and to play my best," said Miranda Marsh, senior in family studies and community service and a former student of Funkhouser.

Dressler called Funkhouser a wonderful instructor. "She's a great influence and a great role model," he said.

Web museums more commercial than artistic

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

The World Wide Web may be a good source of information, airline tickets and books, but it still doesn't know what to do with art.

Museum Web pages exist mainly as a means of accessing information about the museum: hours of operation, admission, exhibition schedules and so on. Some will even give you text introductions to their collections, along with icons of art one can usually click to see a larger reproduction. Depending on the quality of one's monitor, the Web is hardly a place to enjoy art in its formal glories.

The Museum of Modern Art, at www.moma.org, has a characteristically modern design with an all-black background and stylish fonts and icons. Could it ever replace a physical visit to the museum? Not on your life. The majority of art is not created for vicarious enjoyment — it must be experienced in person. Some art, such as an Ed Keinholz installation, requires the viewer to actually walk through it.

So it's with trepidation one visits the new Web site "That's Art" (www.thatsart.com), one of a slew of online galleries that have popped up on the Web in the past few years. "That's Art" is quite unexceptional in its design — perhaps that has something to do with the fact it doesn't carry any advertisements that would allow for more money to be used in its design.

Art Review

Basically, it's a digital place (no physical gallery exists) to access small views of paintings. The current exhibition of paintings, all for sale, features relatively unknown Cuban artists.

Havana artist Gilberto Frometa's expressionist oil paintings are offered for the $30,000 range. Alicia Leal's oils of circus performers look like bad Hallmark cards, perhaps a harsh comment since one can hardly judge art that is reduced to mere pixels and squeezed onto a Web site.

Which begs the question, who would purchase a $20,000 painting off the Web? Yes, according to this site, a sale can be arranged without ever physically viewing the painting or talking with the artist. Welcome to the detached '90s.

For more richly informative art resources, museum Web pages have the best to offer. The Los Angeles-based Getty Center has a number of pages, and one can view some of the highlights of the J. Paul Getty Museum's collection at www.getty.edu/museum/. For example, a link to a painting by Paul Cezanne includes an interpretation of the painting and a short biography on the painter. For pure information, it's nearly as good as an art history textbook, but for artistic pleasure it's an intellectual cul-de-sac.

Even more substantial is the Web page for the National Gallery of Art in Washington D.C. (www.nga.gov). They offer a tour, in this case of portraiture by the French painter Jean Chardin. Included is an overview of the French Academy system and a comprehensive background of each painting represented. Again, however, the page concentrates on providing information — no attempt is made at replicating the experience of viewing the painting itself, perhaps for the best.

Again at the MoMA Web site, the artist Peter Halley has created a special Web experience to coincide with an exhibition of his work at the museum. Visitors to the site can create an original work of art using templates and designs by Halley. The museum also has a few other Web-exclusive projects, like an exploration of a curator's trip to China and an AIDS-related time capsule.

Commercial galleries are well represented on the Web, but the bottom line is still informing netsurfers of hours of operation or how to buy their offered art. The difference between commercial and online galleries is that one can actually visit a commercial gallery in person. Or even arrange to meet artists at their shows.

A pleasant exception to the one-dimensionality of most commercial art Web sites is the Pace Wildenstein Gallery, a notable New York and Los Angeles dealer in modern art (www.pacewildenstein.com).

A visit to its site reveals information on all of their artists currently represented. For example, the page dedicated to hot New York art star Kiki Smith gives an upcoming international exhibition schedule of her work, a biography and a selection of public collections which hold her work. Nowhere is there some schlocky attempt to sell her paintings over the Web.

Although these are but a few of the museum and gallery offerings on the Web, they are representative of some of the best sites. If art could be satisfactorily reproduced on the Web, the point of museums would be lost. Even quality CD-ROMs are no match for the real thing.

The question that remains to be answered for art lovers who enjoy technology is when will real, meaningful art ever be produced solely for the Web or some other technology yet to be invented? When will society be emotionally moved or politically challenged by a work of art created specifically for the Internet?

U.N. considers options in Iraq standoff

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Iraq could stop all cooperation with U.N. weapons experts if a military strike is launched over the inspections impasse, Iraq's U.N. ambassador said Monday.

Faced with Iraq's refusal to allow inspectors into Saddam Hussein's presidential palaces and other sites where it is suspected of hiding biological and chemical weapons, the United States and Britain have beefed up their forces in the Persian Gulf in preparation for possible military action.

Iraq is taking the threat seriously and has mobilized forces, registering all its university and high school students for military training, the country's ruling Baath Party said Monday.

"Obviously if there will be a military action against Iraq, Iraq would have to respond," said Iraq's ambassador to the United Nations, Nizar Hamdoon.

"I think its premature to say right now what iraq intends to do," he said, but added, "One of the options is to stop cooperation with the Special Commission."

The commission on Iraq is trying to determine whether Baghdad has complied with U.N. orders issued at the end of the 1991 Gulf War to eliminate long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

That is the main condition for the council to lift crippling economic sanctions imposed in 1990 after Hussein's forces invaded Kuwait. Diplomats from several countries have warned there is growing concern that military force would backfire. It could prompt the Iraqis to kick out all U.N. inspectors and refuse any U.N. surveillance, leaving the Iraqis free to step up efforts to rebuild their arsenals.

> "OBVIOUSLY, IF THERE WILL BE A MILITARY ACTION AGAINST IRAQ, IRAQ WILL HAVE TO RESPOND."
> NIZAR HAMDOON
> Iraq's ambassador to the United Nations

Among the five permanent members of the Security Council, only the United States and Britain have refused to rule out military action. France, Russia and China have all opposed using such force.

Security Council members haven't responded formally to a report Friday by the chief U.N. weapons inspector, Richard Butler, who said there had been grave attempts by Iraq to mislead U.N. arms experts and that there were strong indications that Iraq was determined to withhold any new information.

U.S. officials were talking Monday with other council members to come up with a united response, said White House spokesman Mike McCurry. "All options are on the table," he said.

He insisted that a possible U.S. military response to Iraq would not be affected by the scandal over President Clinton's alleged involvement with a former White House intern.

Iraqi newspapers suggested Monday that Clinton would attack Iraq to deflect attention from the controversy.

While the United States and Britain prepared for a possible military response — over the weekend Britain sent the aircraft carrier HMS Invincible and a supply ship to join the beefed-up U.S. force in the Gulf — Russia launched another diplomatic effort.

President Boris Yeltsin sent a deputy foreign minister, Viktor Posuvalyuk, to Baghdad to try to negotiate an end to the standoff. And in Paris, Secretary-General Kofi Annan was set to discuss Iraq with France's foreign minister, Hubert Vedrine, on Tuesday.

In Baghdad, Information Minister Humam Abdel-Khaliq said Monday that repeated visits by the inspectors to suspected weapons sites "are inflicting great harm ... on (Iraq's) industrial and service establishments. Iraq cannot remain silent on a situation like this."

Iraq has been sparring with the inspectors since last October, barring them from sensitive sites on grounds of sovereignty. It also has blocked some teams from working altogether, accusing American inspectors of being spies.

In Cairo, the 22-member Arab League came out Monday against a U.S. strike, urging dialogue and diplomacy to solve the dispute.

Cattleman claims Oprah failed to show objectivity

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMARILLO, Texas — Oprah Winfrey's airing of a second show on mad cow disease was not enough to undo the damage caused by the first, a cattleman testified Monday.

"She didn't go on the program and eat a hamburger before the world," said Bill O'Brien, co-owner of Texas Beef Group and one of several cattlemen suing Winfrey on charges she defamed the industry.

Cattlemen claim meat prices plummeted after the April 1996 show, but lawyers for Winfrey say there is no evidence of a connection between falling prices and the talk show.

Although National Cattlemen's Beef Association specialist Gary Weber was invited back to Winfrey's show to reassert that the industry was doing everything possible to prevent the brain-destroying disease from striking U.S. herds, the plaintiffs claim it was too late.

"I would put (the second show) into the category of being too little, too late," O'Brien said. "The second show did not correct the damage."

At issue is whether Winfrey and her production company knowingly aired false and defamatory statements about the potential threat of mad cow disease in the United States, a disease that began ravaging British cattle herds in the 1980s.

Defense lawyer Charles Babcock said two consumer confidence surveys issued by the National Cattlemen's Beef Association showed very little change in support for red meat. Prior to the show, there was 82-percent support for red meat. A week later, support was still at 80 percent.

O'Brien said the numbers reflected consumer attitude and not actual behavior.

"The key thing for us is what happened in the stores," O'Brien said.

O'Brien testified last week that cattle prices in the Texas Panhandle fell 7 percent in just eight days and took months to recover.

Already slumping cattle prices fell after the April 16, 1996, show that included an interview with vegetarian activist Howard Lyman, a co-defendant in the lawsuit. Cattlemen claim they lost $10.3 million. The defense blames the price drop on drought, oversupply and other factors.

Fans recall Nichols gym

Bramlage Coliseum isn't what most of the program's participants remember about K-State basketball.

For those like Sylvis, who have attended games for years, Nichols Hall, which used to house the university gymnasium, holds many memories.

Sylvis remembers one basketball game in Nichols clearly.

"A bunch of people made a straw dummy and climbed out on the support girders over the court. During the heat of the game, we heard a blood-curdling cry. Then we saw the dummy drop to the court," he said.

K-State was pitted against the University of Kansas, and a large crowd for the game convinced state legislators in attendance that it was time for a new facility.

"The legislators decided it was getting too crowded in there, so they started legislation to build Ahearn Field House," he said.

Sylvis' routine as bus driver for the program gets him a seat at games, as well. After dropping off the passengers, he parks the bus and makes his own way into Bramlage.

Waiting just a few minutes to enter the door, Sylvis said he quickly finds his seat. Years ago, Sylvis said he had to wait six hours outside of Nichols if he wanted a good seat.

"We had to get there at noon. We brought blankets, coats, playing cards and snackies," he said.

Sylvis said the line went up the east side of Nichols, past Thompson Hall and toward Aggieville. Nichols was so small that only half the student body could attend each game. The other half had to wait until the next game because there weren't enough seats available, he said.

"There were two different activity cards. One color went to one game, the other color to another game," he said.

Sylvis said the atmosphere in Nichols was as wild as any day in Bramlage. They didn't have as many people to make noise, but were allowed noisemakers, the most popular being cowbells.

"Get a couple hundred cowbells jamming and you've got some noise," he said.

Sylvis and the others who attend games today leave their cowbells at home, but bring their memories with them. No matter where the games are or who's playing in them, the experience is enjoyable, Sylvis said.

When asked, many seniors in the program couldn't remember how long they had been attending games through the program.

"That shows you that time flies when you're having fun," Sylvis said.

Hale searches for funding

Graves and legislators to boost the figure.

"The university's intention is to try to persuade the governor and the legislature to try to raise the 0.5 percent to 1 percent before the end of this legislative session," Hobrock said.

He also credited President Jon Wefald for leadership in the fight for money.

"The reason we even have the governor recommending the 0.5 percent is Jon Wefald," Hobrock said. "He told me today that he's made a request to the Foundation and that they're going to come up with a plan to participate in this."

The task force report recommended a $10 million Foundation endowment fund that would produce $500,000 per year. Hobrock said that figure, though nice, is unrealistic.

"Their research shows that no one is willing to give anything but very small amounts to the library," he said. "The last consultant that the university hired to do the work on the scholarship campaign determined that the library probably should be able to raise no more than $300,000 per year."

At that rate, a $10 million endowment would take 30 years to fund.

Committee members questioned Hobrock about the legitimacy of a faculty fee to raise money for periodicals, since many journals are used solely by faculty and a handful of graduate students.

Though most faculty are opposed to a charge, they're also opposed to the loss of journals, Hobrock said.

"Up to this point it's been a very gentlemanly kind of agreement between faculty and the library," Hobrock said. "The faculty tell us what it is they need, and we try to buy it.

"It's becoming a very ungentlemanly contract because we're so low on funds, and the whole place just goes berserk when you say you have to cancel," he said.

But Hobrock said tough choices need to be made.

"It may be that a $5,000 journal serves only four or five faculty members, or less than that, and very few students," he said. "But what do you say to that department or faculty member when you say, 'I'm sorry I cannot afford the journal that is the key component of your research.'?

"We've got to address these questions more seriously than we have in the past," Hobrock said.

Workers to lobby state Legislature ee's bonus reaches its maximum, $1,000.

A consulting firm, Fox/Lawson, presented a study of the merit pay scale to the Kansas Legislative Council Committee in July, comparing salaries of state classified employees to the salaries those employees might earn if they weren't working for the state, Kissee said.

The study has made its way to the department of human resources at K-State, but has yet to be approved. Kissee said she thinks the report will prescribe raises for most of the classified employees at K-State, so the next task will be to figure out where the money will come from.

"If it wasn't for the janitorial services, clerical people or maintenance people, this university wouldn't run," she said. "I'll go that far, to say that."

Clinton vows to aid dwindling Social Security funds

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Shaken by scandal, President Clinton sought to reassert his leadership in a crucial State of the Union address Tuesday night, urging Congress to save Social Security before cutting taxes or increasing spending.

With the end of big budget deficits, Clinton said "every penny of any surplus" should be devoted to shoring up Social Security, which faces bankruptcy in the next century as baby boomers retire. Republicans are eyeing the surpluses for tax cuts.

Replying to Clinton, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott said the best thing Washington can do is cut tax burdens on the American family.

In an expectant atmosphere, Clinton faced probably the largest TV audience of his life as he stood before a joint session of Congress. The embattled president did not mention the furor about allegations he had sex with a young intern, Monica Lewinsky, and urged her to lie about it. He has denied the charges.

Democrats applauded Clinton warmly when he strode into the chamber. Stony-faced, most Republicans applauded as well and gave the president a respectful hearing. Clinton appeared upbeat and spoke with conviction during the 72-minute speech.

Hillary Rodham Clinton had a front-row seat, beaming and applauding. Earlier in the day she vigorously defended her husband against "right-wing opponents" she said were out to destroy him. In his speech, Clinton singled her out as "America's first lady," bringing a burst of applause from lawmakers.

Amid fresh tensions with Saddam Hussein, Clinton issued a veiled threat of force against Iraq: "You cannot defy the will of the world. ... You have used weapons of mass destruction before. We are determined to deny you the capacity to use them again."

In a subtle reference to Clinton's personal troubles, Lott said the Congress would back the president against Iraq despite any current controversy.

In his annual report to the nation, Clinton said America is enjoying good times enhanced by the lowest unemployment and inflation in decades. He urged Congress to raise the minimum wage — now $5.15 an hour — but did not specify how much. "We can afford to take one simple, sensible step to help millions of workers struggling to provide for their families."

Social Security faces bankruptcy in the next century under a tidal wave of pay-offs for the baby boom generation. On this politically charged issue, Clinton challenged Congress to join in a bipartisan search for a fix. With the prospect of the first balanced budget in 30 years, Clinton said the question is what should be done with the projected surpluses.

"I have a simple four-word answer: save Social Security first," the president said. "Tonight I propose that we reserve 100 percent of the surplus — that's every penny of any surplus — until we have taken all the necessary measures to strengthen the Social Security system for the 21st century."

To promote a Social Security solution, the administration will arrange three or four regional conferences to discuss the problems. He said he would convene the leaders of Congress next January to craft a bipartisan agreement.

Clinton also challenged Congress to pass national tobacco legislation, but its fate is uncertain.

He urged raising the price of cigarettes by $1.50 a pack to deter teen smoking, and said tobacco companies should be slapped with penalties "if they continue marketing to kids."

Clinton urged $21.7 billion for a child-care initiative, doubling to 2 million the number of children eligible for child-care subsidies. "Not a single family should have to choose between a job they need and the child they love," he said.

"NOT A SINGLE FAMILY SHOULD HAVE TO CHOOSE BETWEEN A JOB THEY NEED AND THE CHILD THEY LOVE."

Hale inches closer to funding solution

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Funding solutions for Hale Library's periodical subscription fallout have moved ahead this week.

Campus administrators, library staff, student leaders and KSU Foundation executives have all met either separately or together in hopes of moving forward with long-term solutions to the budget gap in periodical subscriptions.

HOBROCK

So far, only one source of funds has been somewhat secured. Gov. Bill Graves proposed a 0.5-percent increase in Other Operating Expenses, or $163,938, to offset library costs in his State of the State address. Local legislators have said the proposal likely will pass, but also expressed doubts it could be increased.

President Jon Wefald said he has hopes it will be increased, if not by the Legislature then through a university reallocation.

WEFALD

He said another 0.5 percent for the library could be secured out of the proposed overall 2.5-percent OOE increase. This would amount to a 1-percent library increase and a 1.5-percent overall university increase.

The Task Force to Fund the Library for the 21st Century, charged with developing solutions to the library's periodicals-budget crisis, delivered its report in October and has not met since. The task force identified, among other sources, the Foundation as the potential source of a $10 million endowment. That endowment could generate $500,000 per year.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock told Privilege Fee Committee members Monday that a consultant to the Foundation "determined that the library probably should be

Students at K-State might soon be able to get their peers' views of courses — before they enroll.

HANSEN

The Course Information Program, initiated last year by former Student Body President Chris Hansen, would survey students about course material and professors at the end of each semester. Results of the surveys would be published for students as they make enrollment decisions.

The program is midway through its pilot year. Hansen, now chair of the CIP committee, said his plan is still lacking one significant component — funding.

Hansen said the solution could lie in a new student privilege fee.

TRUJILLO

In spring 1996, Hansen said he and others within Student Governing Association recognized a need in the student body. They wanted to provide course information, received from previous students, on general education classes. The campaigning began.

The following year, the idea was put before Student Senate, the Kansas Board of Regents, Faculty Senate and the Students'

Writer's life remains simple after book deal

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

Always an early riser, Jessie Lee Brown Foveaux's day still begins at 7 a.m.

She works around her kitchen, helping with breakfast, and then retires to her comfortable living room chair. There, bathed in soft natural light breaking through the northern windows, she spends time tatting and then reads through mail from the day before.

In the months after Warner Books bought the 98-year-old great-grandmother's handwritten memoirs for $1 million, little of Foveaux's daily routine has changed.

"It's all very exciting," she said, laughing. "But not much is different, except the phone calls."

The phone calls, Foveaux said, started when Clare Ansberry, a Wall Street Journal staff writer, wrote a front-page story highlighting her life experiences.

The phone calls, to her still-listed local number, have never stopped.

"I am happy for what people tell me, that they like it," Foveaux said. "Some thank me for writing the book."

Foveaux's memoirs, originally titled "The Life of Jessie Lee Brown from Birth Up to 80 Years," emerged from a writing class taught by Charles Kempthorne, a Manhattan resident. He urged the senior citizens' writing group to write down the stories of their lives.

"I liked going and visiting and talking about current events, but I told him three times that I wasn't a writer," Foveaux said.

"He kept at me to write the story of my life for my family. He said it was important," she said. "I said no one wanted to hear my story."

Kempthorne finally admitted to Foveaux that if his own grandmother had written the story of her life, it would have meant everything to him.

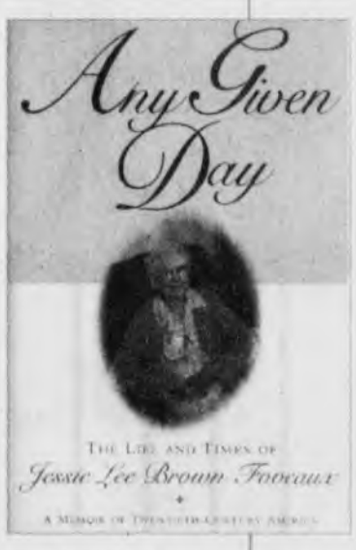
"I thought about that," Foveaux said. "One day I was at the kitchen table, I grabbed a piece of paper and started writing. I had saved clippings and albums, and I used them. I filled notebooks."

Foveaux changed the name to "Any Given Day," but Warner Books was committed to remaining as faithful as possible to the great-grandmother's original manuscript.

The story Foveaux wrote 18 years ago as a Christmas present for her children begins by directly addressing her grandchildren, great-grandchildren and grandchildren by marriage.

"I wanted them to know their history and understand where they're from," she said. "I wanted to tell my children what type of life I wanted for them."

Hailed on the book jacket as a memoir of 20th-century America, Foveaux's story spans both world wars, her decision to divorce an alcoholic husband and the difficulty of finding a job in order to raise her eight children alone.



"I suppose it's about what makes me tick," Foveaux said, concerning the struggles she endured. "I never thought anyone would read it but my own. If I had, I probably wouldn't have told as much."

In times of heartache and humor, Foveaux relied heavily on the American values she acquired while living in the Midwest.

A long-time Manhattan resident, Foveaux has lived in the same quiet east-side neighborhood since 1910. Even in the wake of the book's success, she said she won't move.

"Well, I kind of like the place. I have been here all these years and can't imagine anywhere I'd want to go," Foveaux said.

Clinton nominated for 1998 Nobel Peace Prize by Norwegian right-wing Party of Progress

OSLO, Norway — President Clinton has been nominated for the 1998 Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts to protect world peace and promote democracy, three Norwegian legislators announced Tuesday.

Clinton, embroiled in a sex scandal in the United States, was nominated by members of the right-wing Party of Progress, one of the largest blocs in Norway's Parliament.

"Throughout his presidency he has been a guarantor and friend of peace," the lawmakers said in a statement.

They praised Clinton for helping end the war in former Yugoslavia and for standing up to "despots who want to repress human rights and democracy's rules of play."

One of the legislators, Vidar Kleppe, said by telephone that they made the decision to nominate Clinton in December, before his current problems.

The nomination deadline for this year's peace prize is Jan. 31, although the Oslo-based awards committee usually accepts nominations postmarked by then. The committee refuses to release the names of nominees, usually 120-130 each year, or comment on candidates.

Members of national legislatures are among those with nomination rights and often announce the name of their candidate.

The winner is announced in Oslo, usually in mid-October, and the award is presented Dec. 10, the anniversary of the death of Alfred Nobel, the Swede who invented dynamite and endowed the prizes that bear his name.

Russian envoy tries to negotiate end to standoff caused by U.N. weapons inspections in Iraq

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A Russian envoy arrived Tuesday to try to negotiate an end to the standoff about U.N. weapons inspections. An Iraqi official, meanwhile, claimed that powdered milk rations to babies must be cut because the United States was holding up oil-for-food contracts.

The envoy, Viktor Posuvalyuk, said Russia insists on a political solution to the crisis sparked by Iraq's barring U.N. weapons inspectors from sites it deems essential to its security and sovereignty.

"President Yeltsin and the Russian government firmly believe that the use of force against Iraq is not constructive under any circumstances," the official Iraqi News Agency quoted him as saying.

Soon after arriving, Posuvalyuk met Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz and Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf. He said he planned to discuss "means that will ensure a way out of the situation by keeping it within the political framework."

An official spokesman for Iraq's Culture and Information Ministry said the United States was bent on a military strike against Iraq and is not ready to accept a diplomatic solution.

Iraq has been sparring about U.N. inspectors since October, barring them from sensitive sites including presidential compounds. It also has blocked some teams from working, accusing American inspectors of being spies.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded that the inspectors be given full access and says punishing trade sanctions — imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait — will not be lifted until the inspectors certify that Iraq has eliminated its weapons of mass destruction.

In Washington D.C., military planners were working to ensure there was enough firepower in the Persian Gulf for a sustained air attack against Iraq, if needed.

New National Cancer Institute findings reveal rare cancers not linked to '50s polio vaccination

CHICAGO — Millions of Americans who were given polio vaccine during the 1950s that was contaminated with a monkey virus do not have a higher incidence of rare cancers linked to the virus, a study found.

"This result is reassuring, as it is likely that we would have observed an effect on cancer rates if one existed," said the authors, led by Dr. Howard D. Strickler of the National Cancer Institute.

The findings were published in Wednesday's issue of The Journal of the American Medical Association. Strickler presented the same data at a conference a year ago.

Polio vaccine made using monkey tissue entered mass distribution in 1955. In 1960 doctors discovered that the vaccine was contaminated with monkey virus SV40. The virus was found to cause cancer in laboratory animals injected with it.

The government ordered manufacturers to provide virus-free vaccine, but it didn't reach the market until 1963, after as many as 98 million people were exposed to the contamination. Vaccine sold today is tested to ensure it is free of the virus.

Concerns had subsided until scientists in recent years found genetic pieces of SV40 inside tumors taken from cancer victims. It was feared that people who were given the vaccine — especially those with damaged immune systems — might be more prone to certain cancers of the brain, bone and lung.

But 30 years of follow-up of children who could have received the contaminated vaccine found no significant increase in those cancers, the researchers reported.

Kansas Attorney General still studying guns, refuses to back concealed weapons measure yet

TOPEKA — Attorney General Carla Stovall is sympathetic toward citizens wanting to carry concealed handguns, but has not endorsed a bill that would allow it.

Stovall said during an interview Tuesday she still is studying the issue.

"There are pros and cons to it," Stovall said. "I certainly understand the desire of Kansans to be able to protect themselves by carrying a weapon. The bad guys carry them now, and the good guys want to carry them."

Stovall said she is concerned because the law enforcement community is so divided on the issue.

"I'm not opposed to it, but at this point I'm not actively endorsing it," she said.

Representative blames legislature for problems in Kansas' higher-education governance system

TOPEKA — The Legislature shares responsibility for the mess in which Kansas finds its higher-education governance system, the chairman of the House Select Committee on Higher Education said Tuesday.

"The Legislature is a big part of the problem," Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, said. "We haven't done our share."

The committee was created by Speaker Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, and House Minority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, to develop a plan by mid-January for restructuring management of higher education in Kansas.

It met Tuesday, focusing mostly on the lack of leadership and accountability in the present system.

Adkins said the House panel is not likely to recommend creation of an office of "education czar" for the state, but would like to force more coordination that would reduce duplication and competition among institutions.

No,
I don't need money

Call home just to say "hi."

Wanna really surprise your parents? Why not flip your Wildcat Card over and follow the easy calling card instructions and call home just for the fun of it? And when they hear your sweet voice NOT asking for money, maybe they'll finally realize you're not the "irresponsible teenager" they once thought you were.

What a concept. Why worry about carrying cash or checks when there's an easier, safer way to make purchases. The Wildcat Card is the one card to carry for nearly all of your everyday needs. Use it to access your Wildcat checking account for books and supplies, for food and beverages, as a library card and in many campus vending machines. This card also allows access to your financial aid surplus. Transactions are debited directly from your account and detailed on one simple monthly statement.

That's not all. The Wildcat Card also works at many participating merchants off-campus and acts as a universal ATM card, giving you 24-hour access to your account in Manhattan and around the world. (And be sure to let your parents know that, with the Wildcat Card, they can deposit money directly into your account from their hometown bank, free of charge.)

It's that easy. So take the hassle-free way to get things done on- and off- campus—take advantage of the Wildcat Card. For more information call Commerce on campus at 532-3500 or the Campus Card Center at 532-6399.

K-State students teach microbiology, entomology, chemistry, physics at Lee School

K-State students played the role of teachers Tuesday night, as they educated and entertained students at Lee School.

David Stuever, senior in microbiology and president of the Microbiology Club, along with Aaron Carman, junior in microbiology, volunteered to take part in the Parent-Teacher Organization sponsored event.

"This is our first opportunity to work with kids like this," Carman said. "We have geared our information toward a parent/child audience."

The Lee gymnasium was packed with children from kindergarten through sixth grade. The gym was broken into four sections, microbiology, chemistry, physics and entomology, all presented by K-State students. The audience went to each station's presentation for 10 minutes and then rotated.

The microbiology section had samples of bacteria from different places, including a floor and the inside of the mouth, sealed in containers.

Carman began the presentation when he said microbiology is the study of living things.

"There are numerous fields of study which include bacteriology, virology, mycology, genetics and general medicine," Carman said.

He said bacteria are everywhere.

"That's why you kids have to get shots, so you won't get sick. No matter how many times you wash your hands, you'll never get rid of all of the bacteria," he said.

Carman told the group that research on HIV is being done at K-State and showed a model of the virus.

"You can't see a virus on a normal microscope. You can only see bacteria," Carman said.

Stuever said the size of bacteria and viruses meant it was important to keep hands clean.

"You can't see the bacteria or virus with the naked eye," Stuever said. "You need to wash your hands three to four times a day."

Ian Mutta, a student at Lee said, he learned that there are bacteria and viruses on hands.

"I learned to wash your hands," he said.

The section also had a microscope set up for children so they could see bacteria in detail.

After the presentations, the children and parents had a chance to look at the exhibits set up on tables.

"The kids are having a great time," said Meliz Mutta, who was there with her son Ian. "This is a wonderful resource for both the kids and college students to learn."

Lisa Guerra, a senior in education who was in charge of organizing the program, said she thought there was a good turnout for the program.

"We want to expose the kids to sciences. We had a good turnout, and a lot of oohs and ahs. I think we will try this again next year," she said. "We tried to do a program that deals with everyday life and that has an interesting connection for the kids."

IRS commissioner to announce agency overhaul to better serve taxpayers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As the Senate begins work on restructuring the Internal Revenue Service, the agency's new commissioner is ordering its biggest overhaul in 45 years.

The reorganization will focus the IRS on serving taxpayers' needs, officials said Tuesday.

Under the plan, IRS Commissioner Charles O. Rossotti would reorganize the agency into "taxpayer service organizations" devoted to four categories: individual taxpayers; small businesses and the self-employed; large corporations; and pension plans, nonprofits and state and local governments.

Rossotti is scheduled to unveil the plan during testimony today before the Senate Finance Committee.

The announcement shows the Clinton administration taking the initiative in proposing important changes at the IRS before Senate Republicans begin reworking an IRS overhaul bill that passed the House in November.

Next week, the National Performance Review, Vice President Al Gore's reinventing government group, will release a detailed report on IRS restructuring.

A key principle of the effort, billed as modernizing America's tax agency, would have the IRS better "understand and solve problems from a taxpayer's point of view," according to an IRS briefing paper. Officials briefed on the plan described it as conceptual, with details left for later.

The changes would scrap the division of the IRS into the various functions of the tax collection process, such as examination, collection and appeals.

"There are a lot of sleepy bureaucrats who will be upset about this," said Jeffrey S. Trinca, a former chief of staff of the National Commission on Restructuring the IRS, a congressionally appointed panel that proposed ways to overhaul the agency.

Rossotti's initiative was applauded by congressional Republicans.

"It makes a lot of sense, and it is consistent with the new customer orientation at the IRS," said Rep. Rob Portman, R-Ohio, co-chairman of the IRS restructuring commission.

"We think it's great and it will work well, whatever legislation we come up with," Ginny Flynn, Senate Finance Committee spokeswoman, said. "We think they will be complementary initiatives."

IRS spokesman Frank Keith declined comment. An outline of the proposal was first reported in the industry newsletter Tax Notes.

The proposal envisions shrinking the national IRS office. "The national office becomes a much smaller corporate headquarters," according to the briefing paper. Further details weren't available, but the paper envisions that agency employment would remain stable.

The reorganization would create the new wage and investment income group to serve some 100 million tax filers; a small business group serving 25 million; a large corporate group serving 100,000; and a pension group serving 1.8 million.

The concept was described in detail in the June 1997 report of the restructuring commission, which said under the IRS' current structure the various divisions "often are disconnected from the other functions and the organization as a whole."

"This is why a taxpayer may receive a notice from the IRS, but when the taxpayer calls the toll-free number, the customer service representative is unable to help," the report said.

Value of family history not to be underestimated

Long before Jessie Lee Brown Foveaux's handwritten memoirs gained national attention and were published for $1 million, this great-grandmother from Manhattan decided to share the story of her life with her family.

She wrote honestly about the decisions she made and the lessons she learned. She shared her mistakes and her wisdom. She shared the painful heartache and the overwhelming joys. In the end, a fuller image of her identity and life emerged.

Not all of us are fortunate enough to have a book from our grandmother.

Not all of us have heard the stories of our parents and grandparents. Not all of us understand the highs and lows of their lives and what events made them who they are.

If nothing else, the Foveaux memoirs reinforce the value and wisdom gathered from one individual life. Our families have stories that no one else can tell and their eye-witness accounts of history can be more moving and enlightening than anything learned from a textbook.

We must take it upon ourselves to ask questions. We need to listen and learn from the experiences of our families. In hearing their stories and learning from the past, we add depth and understanding to who we are and where we come from.

Our families are full of individuals with great stories. Our parents and grandparents can be the greatest treasures of our lives and provide a living library of information about our past. It would be a horrible shame to let their times of laughter and tears die with them.

This is an age when electronic communication, especially e-mail, has become increasingly popular.

We cannot forget the value of handwritten letters and face-to-face communication.

In a fleeting world, don't let an opportunity to hear about your history firsthand slip away.

MILE-HIGH HAPPINESS

Super Bowl dream comes true for Elway, columnist

SHANE FOSBURG/Collegian

Something happened Sunday night that I've been waiting for since I was a small child. John Elway and company finally walked away with the coveted Vince Lombardi trophy with rings to match.

I know. I know. Three days have passed and I should just move on. But I can't. No, it's all just too important to this born-and-bred Bronco.

See, I grew up in a small town about 17 miles from Colorado's eastern border. If the family ever went on a weekend retreat to do some shopping or just get away, the place was Denver. With Kansas City a good seven hours away and Wichita at least five, the obvious choice was always to take the three-hour jaunt to the Mile High City.

It was then, as a boy on my family's weekend getaways, that I became acquainted with the boys in blue. I began following them on television and tracking their record in the league. My pops would score an occasional ticket, and we'd take off for the day. We even had season tickets for a while, which was sometimes tough to manage while living three hours away. But we did it, and we loved it.

Then came the infamous string of misses. I'm sure you're all familiar with the three pretty much no-show appearances by the Broncos in the Super Bowl. If you're not, this is how it went down. The Giants, the Redskins and the Niners all sent them home packin', leaving Denver fans asking themselves a lot of questions. Questions like, "Is Elway really a choke artist?" and "Can they ever win the big game?" Those were rough years for a young man and his favorite team. The Broncos had become the laughing stock of Super Bowl City. Elway was the mayor, and I was one of the many dejected citizens wondering what his next term would bring.

Sure, it would have been easy to forget the Broncos and jump on the Dallas bandwagon like everybody else, but I didn't. I stayed true and clung tight to the dream that some day my hero and his band of bad asses would finish a season as the undisputed champions. Some weren't as true as I. Some chose the path that leads to resentment and mistrust. One such person is my roommate Jason. He's originally from Colorado and grew up a Bronco fan.

He probably liked them before I even knew who they were.

Alas, as the Broncos first three attempts to snag a championship withered and died, so did Jason's love for the team. Can you say sell-out? I felt betrayed as we watched the first half together. He didn't really yell either way, but he didn't have in him the same fire that burned in me every time the Broncos scored. Maybe I just ate too much cheese dip? In any case, people make decisions and then have to live with them. Jason is still living with his decision to cast away the mile-high marauders, and my guess is he regrets it a little.

Normally I would publicly chastise someone for that, but he's my homie, so I'll let it slide.

Which brings us to this year, and what a year it was. From day one, I started preaching a Bronco championship to my friends, who are all pretty much die-hard Chiefs fans. Of course, all they could do was that stupid tomahawk chop thing and yell "Chiefs!" Sorry fellas, maybe next year. Week after week, I dealt with their verbal smatterings of Elway and the Broncos. To these people I have one thing to say. "Ha!" You've gotta be just plain dumb to scoff at Elway's skills. Now the man has nothing left to prove. He showed the world on Sunday that he can run, throw and take hits — i.e. his third quarter scramble for a first down — better than any other 37 year old on the planet.

If you ask me, he's the best ever. Now I can understand why loyal Chiefs or Browns fans and disciples of Marty Schottenheimer might hate the guy. After all, he spoiled their hopes for a championship more than a few times. But to say that the guy is too old, too slow or past his prime is complete idiocy. Anyone who knows football can tell you that. All that I can hope for is that he puts off retirement until his contract is out so he and his fully loaded arsenal can take a shot at a few more rings.

In review, I have just a few summary points before I'm finished. Elway is the man. The Broncos are the team. Props to the loyal fans who have weathered many a storm. No props to the fair weather fans. Congratulations to the city of Denver and the state of Colorado. You finally got the big one.

A huge round of applause to Johnny boy. You finally closed the deal and filled the void. On a personal note, John, when you were being carried off the field after the game with your patented "all teeth" smile and tears streaming down your cheeks, I felt like I was a champion too. Congratulations.

Yes, you are definitely the man.

Great architect sits for rare, post-death interview

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Russell is a fifth-year senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu.

Imagine my chagrin Saturday evening, as I had settled into some reading, when I heard a rattle in the living room.

Alighting to the door to check on matters, I was confounded to find an old man in 19th-century dress leafing through a copy of Robert Venturi's "Learning from Las Vegas" ("Pure rubbish," I overheard him say).

As he appeared quite harmless, I ventured to ask a polite question. Can I help you with something?

Having heard no reply, I turned on a lamp and recoiled in delightful horror to find Frank Lloyd Wright, the individualist master of 20th-century architecture, sitting on my sofa reading a classic post modern manifesto.

Being a journalist of sorts, I grabbed a tape recorder and asked if he would mind sitting for an interview, seeing as how he was dead, he had the time. He agreed, and, after I had supplied him with an ample amount of Twinkies ("Amazing things," he murmured), we began:

Russell: You were last on the K-State campus in 1952, correct?

Frank: Indeed. And my death in 1959 was no doubt linked in part to that disastrous visit.

Russell: I've read the Collegian's account of your speech, how you suggested the campus should be bulldozed, how America had no culture and Manhattan was one of the ugliest towns in the country. Do you still feel that way?

Frank: The current state of affairs of this country is far more alarming than anything I could have imagined in 1952. If I lamented the fact individuals were moving toward extinction then, no one could have believed the mass culture society of contemporary America today. To read that an architect feels this popular culture is worth celebrating is preposterous.

Russell: But what has really changed? Good architecture on this campus is still as impossible as it was in 1952, 1932 or 1892. You yourself said in 1952 that "the habit started and you can't get rid of it."

Frank: Still true. Who on this campus thought your new Throckmorton Hall a vast improvement on something as disastrous as Waters Hall? Or Cardwell Hall? The only thing worse than the collegiate Gothic of Willard Hall is a building that attempts to modernize the style, like the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building.

Russell: What about the new Hale Library?

Frank: When will people learn? When will they really understand what my lasting legacy is all about? Hale is a symbol of conformity, a frightening blemish on any place of higher learning. Like I said in 1952, we are lacking in independence of thought, action and feeling.

I might have begun my career by looking at other contemporary architects, but I soon developed my own innovations. Unfortunately, with most architects, that never happens and we have the Hale Libraries of the world.

Russell: Every building can't be a Guggenheim.

Frank: Absolutely. Most of my buildings weren't. However, never did I turn to an untrue style to please anyone. My ego might have been hard to love and my architecture unpopular, but name one city in the United States that doesn't prize one of my buildings. They're icons for no other reason than they are still some of the most individual expressions of this country.

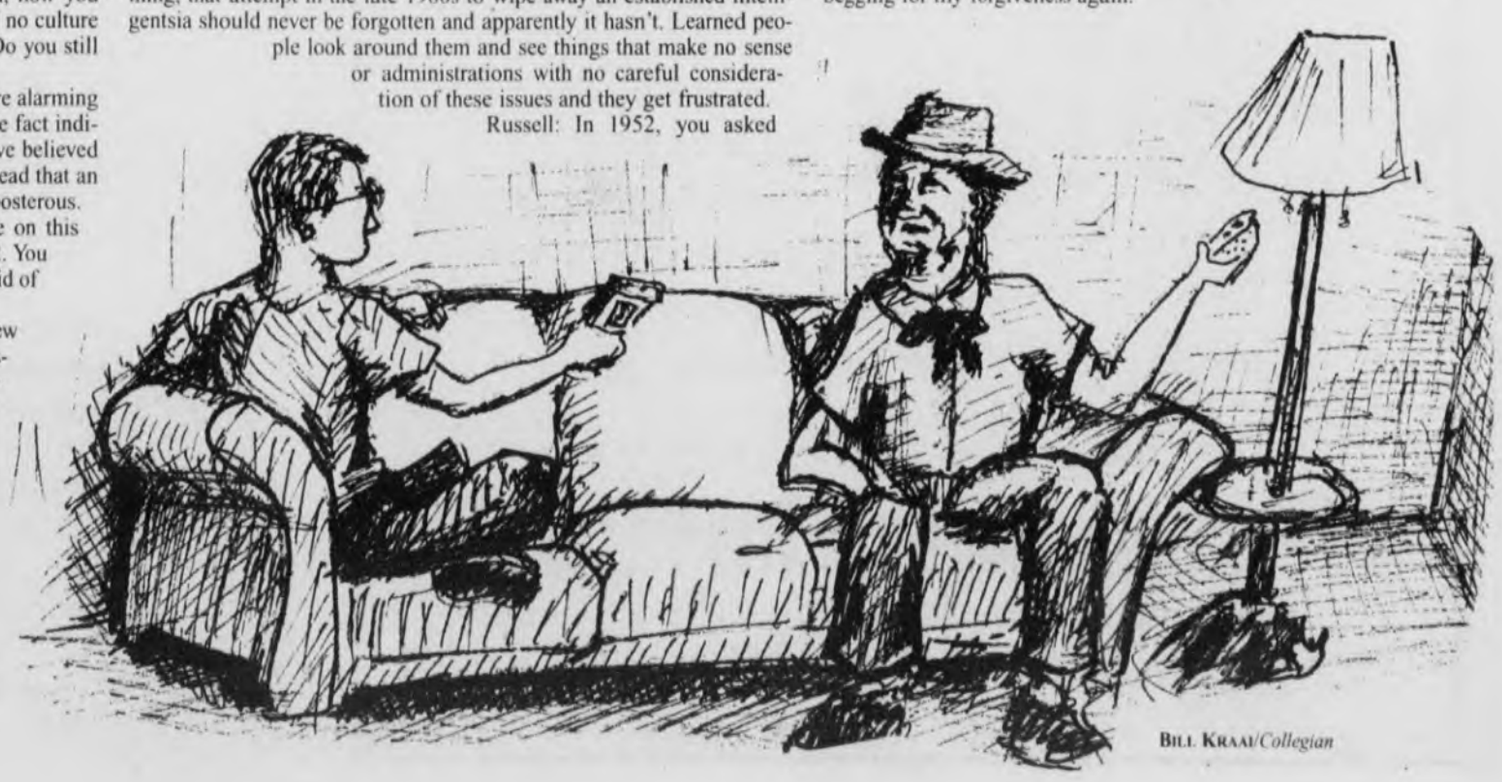
Russell: The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art appears to be an individual expression.

Frank: How many of my followers' buildings are good? A handful, at best. Riding on the reputation of a master is no way to practice architecture. There is no cohesion in the museum's design. The building fails in not making any decision to be anything, instead it wants to be it all. I love working with natural materials, but I knew their properties like the back of my hand. Obviously, that's not always the case.

Russell: Why do you think architecture students and faculty have had some bad blood with the administration on this campus?

Frank: You and I both know that an administration that considers doing away with a College of Architecture will never change its ways. If anything, that attempt in the late 1980s to wipe away an established intelligentsia should never be forgotten and apparently it hasn't. Learned people look around them and see things that make no sense or administrations with no careful consideration of these issues and they get frustrated.

Russell: In 1952, you asked architecture students how they "were going to learn in an atmosphere like this," meaning the built campus. Does the fact they seem to have a freer realm now to criticize count for anything?



Frank: No. You have a system of design on this campus that is inherently wrong. When someone decides to make an effort for improving these matters, my answer might change.

Russell: Yes, but any more it's the big donors who set the tone on how a building should look. Then there's all of this administrative and state oversight. And then the stuff under the table you never read about, but you hear about.

Frank: With as many poseurs as this campus contains, you could offer a degree in ruining buildings. K-State's way of building structures might have existed for some time, but it never has worked successfully.

Unlike masters, such as a Michelangelo or a Bernini or myself, the age of something doesn't automatically make it unquestionably great. You live on a campus that refuses to learn from itself, that refuses to listen to itself. Break that habit and things could change.

And now I must go, Philip Johnson is begging for my forgiveness again.

Macs offer services of future, reader says

Editor,

Peter Knupfer's letter concerning the removal of Macs being a quality business decision is very biased and also very wrong. It has been proven time and time again that Macs are easier to use and less expensive to support. Not only are Mac users required to upgrade less often, they don't need an entire army of information technology troops to keep them up and running. No wonder the IT people are wanting the Macs out of here — if this were a Macintosh campus, half of them would be without a job.

Knupfer states, "The standards we use to determine whether equipment stays or goes should include the extent to which the equipment promotes the primary objective of higher education: creativity in research and teaching," as if it is an argument to do away with Macs. Actually, more World Wide Web pages are created on a Macintosh, more than 54 percent of all multimedia applications development is done on a Macintosh, there are more than 4,500 educational programs for the Macintosh — compared to less than 3,000 titles for Windows-based computers — more than 20 percent of Web servers are Macintosh — second only to Unix servers — Apple is still No. 1 in education, and, finally, PC World and PC Magazine picked the Macintosh as No. 1 for reliability and service. If that's not enough to invoke unparalleled creativity in research and teaching, I'd be glad to do more than just break the surface of facts.

Now let's put the whole market share into perspective. Apple's worldwide market share is greater than the combined market shares of Cadillac, Lincoln, Acura, BMW, Volvo, Lexus, Mercedes, Eagle, Infinity, Saab, Land Rover, Jaguar, Audi and Porsche. (Source: Automotive News.) To see what this means in the world of electronics, Guy Kawasaki reports that according to Appliance Manufacturer, April 1996, p. 32, "Sony's market share for color TVs in 1995 was 7 percent. Funny that Sony has a smaller market share in color TVs than Apple does in personal computers, for some strange reason the media considers Sony a winner."

Over the years I have heard many comments referring to Macintosh as being only good for graphics, and that they are slower than PCs. This biased statement is far from the truth. According to Apple's internal figures, Apple actually has a 50-percent share of chemical, pharmaceutical, biotechnology, scientific and engineering computing markets. I won't even mention that 80 percent of all computers used for color publishing jobs are done on a Macintosh, according to a 1996 study by Griffin Dix Research Associates. If speed is vital to your educational needs, get this. PC magazine admits a 200-Mhz Mac trounces a 200-Mhz Pentium Pro in their own real-world tests. If you think that's fast, you better strap on a seat belt for the G3 processors Apple introduced in November.

If these facts are not enough to prove that the over 20 million Macintosh computers in use today are not an important player in the computer industry, maybe ignorance is. Byte magazine said it best, "To see tomorrow's PC, look at today's Macintosh."

Think different.

Tickets, towing fees cost students too much

Editor,

I would like to relate to you something that happened a few weeks ago.

I work in Hale Library, and on Jan. 8, during the time when the university is almost at a standstill, library personnel were still busy. One of the students in my office came in around noon. She foolishly assumed that since the university was not in full session and that the parking lot across the street was virtually empty, that she could park wherever she wanted. Sometime between noon and when she left work, Parking Services had her car towed by Mike's Wrecker Service. When she left work at about 4 p.m., she found her car was gone. She returned to the office. Being that her car was older, she pretty much knew that no one had stolen it, so she called Parking Services and asked them if they knew what had happened. The reply was, "Yeah, we got her."

Because she didn't have any cash and therefore could not take a taxi, I took her to Parking Services. She was charged $50 and was given a map to where they had had her car towed. I also drove her to Mike's Wrecker, which is across the viaduct and along McDowell Creek Road. We managed to get there before 5 p.m., when they close. The people at Mike's Wrecker made an exception and permitted her to pay with a credit card, or she would have had to pay a taxi the next morning to go to the bank, pay the taxi to take her back to Mike's Wrecker and would have also had to pay for another day's storage at Mike's. The towing bill was $56. Apparently there were eight to 10 people sitting in the office at Parking Services, and not one of them mentioned that she would need cash to pay Mike's Wrecker. (Does it seem like a lot of people in the office during such a slow time?)

When the student picked up her car, she noticed that the ticket was for $30 and not $50, which is what she was charged by Parking Services.

It must be admitted that the student did park in a place that was reserved, but maybe we should look at some other issues as well. She is a freshman from another place in Kansas, and she has only been here one semester — perhaps not enough time for her to know the voracity of Parking Services' pursuit of money. The parking lot was empty, so it could not have been a situation of the person who reserved the stall calling in because he or she could not find a place to park. Again, the lot was empty. Would Parking Services have towed a faculty member's car? If the ticket on the car was for $30, why was she asked to pay another $20? Between tickets and towing, the bill came to over $100.

For someone that makes minimum wage, one might question the morality of taking a student's entire paycheck for going to work. Finally, was the damage the student did to the university even remotely close to the damage the university did to the student? It makes me wonder just how it is that we are investing in our youth.

NCAA top-25 men's hoops

No. 9 Connecticut 63, Providence 56

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Despite a rough shooting night by leading scorer Richard Hamilton and the ejection of Coach Jim Calhoun, No. 9 Connecticut beat Providence 63-56 Tuesday night.

Hamilton, who led the Huskies with a 22.5 average, was kept to just four points on two-for-13 shooting. Calhoun was charged with three technicals in the second half — the last two leading to four free throws by Jamel Thomas that tied the score 47-47 with 8:47 to go. But the Friars scored just one field goal the rest of the way.

Kevin Freeman, who sat out Saturday's win at Syracuse with a sprained right wrist, returned to score 17 points for Connecticut (18-3, 8-2).

Thomas had 26 points for Providence (8-10, 3-6).

Llewellyn Cole's free throw with three minutes left brought the Friars to within three points, but the Huskies made seven of eight free throws in the last three minutes.

No. 24 Xavier 93, Duquesne 71

CINCINNATI — James Posey scored a career-high 25 points and matched his career high with 15 rebounds to lead the Musketeers.

Xavier (13-5, 5-3 Atlantic 10) had 10 steals and forced 17 turnovers while pulling away to a 52-32 halftime lead. Overall, Xavier forced 28 turnovers and scored 50 points in the paint.

Posey was 10-of-15 from the field, four-of-four from the foul line and hit his only three-point attempt.

Nick Bosnic scored 16 points for Duquesne (8-12, 3-5).

Zoeller signs endorsement deal despite racial-jokes controversy

INDIANAPOLIS — Fuzzy Zoeller, who lost his endorsement deal with Kmart after making racial jokes about Tiger Woods, has landed one of his most lucrative contracts since the controversy.

Zoeller signed a deal with Daiwa Golf worth almost $1 million over three years, said Zoeller's business manager and agent, Dave Lobeck.

Zoeller also has agreed to a deal with sunglasses manufacturer Ocean Waves, which plans a Fuzzy Zoeller signature line in stores by September.

Sport-Haley, a Denver-based apparel company, announced two weeks ago that it had signed Zoeller to promote and wear its clothing.

Daiwa said it determined that the time was right to offer Zoeller an endorsement deal after the Woods controversy.

"There's a political correctness that's very prevalent in American society these days, and you cannot lose sight of that fact," Bob MacDougall, Daiwa's director of marketing, told The Indianapolis Star.

"But when we looked into it and talked with (golf) industry people, golf professionals and our own people, the one name that kept popping up that still commands a lot of attention is Fuzzy."

Kmart dropped Zoeller last April after he said that Woods — the first black Masters champion — should not serve fried chicken and collard greens at the Masters champions' dinner. Zoeller later insisted he was joking. Ocean Waves considered all that before approaching Zoeller.

"We talked to everybody in the (golf) industry," said Kevin Carlson, Ocean Waves president. "They took it that Fuzzy was joking and that's his nature."

2 former ABL stars assigned to new WNBA teams in expansion

NEW YORK — Cindy Brown and Nikki McCray, the WNBA's two prize catches from the rival ABL, were assigned to expansion teams Tuesday.

Brown, a 6-foot 2-inch forward, will play for the Detroit Shock, and McCray, a 5-11 forward, was assigned to the Washington Mystics.

Brown last year played for the ABL's Seattle Reign, averaging 17.5 points and 8.3 rebounds a game. McCray was the league's most valuable player while playing for the Columbus Quest. She averaged 19.9 points and five rebounds a game.

Both played on gold-medal winning U.S. Olympic teams — Brown in 1988 in Seoul and McCray in 1996 in Atlanta.

Each of the expansion teams also received another player — Razija Mujanovic, a 6-8 center with the Yugoslav Olympic team in 1998, was assigned to Detroit, and Alessandra Santos de Oliveira, a member of the Brazilian Olympic team in 1996, went to Washington.

New 80,000-seat stadium opens with only 5,000 parking spaces

SAINT-DENIS, France — The 80,000-seat Stade de France, site of the World Cup opener and final, will be opened by President Jacques Chirac today before an exhibition game between France and Spain.

Beneath its suspended halo roof, the $450 million stadium just outside Paris has 152 skyboxes and 6,450 club seats. Its state-of-the-art design allows lower seats to be lifted for track and field competitions and Paris is expected to vie for the 2001 or 2003 World Championships.

But the stadium is just as notable for what it doesn't have — a home team. Paris Saint-Germain had been expected to move there, but the city's biggest club chose to stay closer to central Paris at Parc des Princes, which holds 48,725.

Planners have been criticized because just 5,000 parking spaces are near the stadium.

Fiesta Bowl money was 'already spent'

JACOB JANSONIUS
Kansas State Collegian

The 1998 Fiesta Bowl paid out $8.2 million to Syracuse and K-State, but athletic department officials said K-State's take is already accounted for.

K-State received nearly $1.4 million from the Fiesta Bowl to cover expenses. The remainder of the Fiesta Bowl payout is divided among all Big 12 schools. Nebraska, Texas A&M, Missouri and Oklahoma State also divide their bowl earnings among Big 12 schools.

As a result, K-State will accumulate an additional $730,000.

Athletic Director Max Urick said the money gained from the other Big 12 schools is already spent.

"We always try to break even at our department. The money we get from the bowl games is already accounted for in our budget," Urick said. "We kind of roll the dice, in terms of already counting on money we don't even have yet."

Athletic Department Business Director Bob Cavello said the money from postseason bowls isn't really extra money. It is simply used to pay off expenses and debts.

"Our department runs on self-generated revenue. We have operated on a $14-15 million budget for the past three years," he said. "The money we receive from the Fiesta Bowl and from all of the other Big 12 bowl games allows us to break even."

Urick said the athletic department does everything it can to stay within its budget.

"We stayed under our budget when we took the team down to Arizona, and we have stayed under our budget for the last several years. We have been able to sell our tickets, and that enables us to pay our expenses," Urick said.

Cavello said the $730,000 isn't a big boost to the department's budget.

"It sounds like a lot of money at first, but that $730,000 is already built into the budget," Cavello said. "When you operate solely on self-generated revenue and get minimal support from the state, we are usually lucky to break even."

Money from this year's bowl game is primarily used for Title IX, a national mandate granting equal support to men's and women's activities. Money will also be used to repair a leaky roof on Vanier Football Complex and new restrooms in the football complex.

The complex has been leaking for about two years, Urick said, but the situation became critical when a large June rain damaged it even more.

"We weren't really planning on repairing it this year, but circumstances forced us to take action," he said. "Part of the money we will be receiving will be used to fix that situation."

Cavello said K-State's football program is an essential part in creating a positive image for the university.

"Anyone can do what Nebraska and Notre Dame do. When money is pouring into your program, it's easy to build a national power," he said. "But we've made K-State football into a great program with limited resources. We don't have $20-25 million to spend like most of the other Big 12 schools, but we still get our expenses paid."

"WE STAYED UNDER OUR BUDGET WHEN WE TOOK THE TEAM DOWN TO ARIZONA, AND WE HAVE STAYED UNDER OUR BUDGET FOR THE LAST SEVERAL YEARS."

Big 12 basketball continues tonight

▶ WOMEN TRY TO PUSH CONFERENCE RECORD ABOVE .500 FOR 1ST TIME THIS YEAR AT IOWA STATE.

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

We have reached the heart of Big 12 Conference play, and as both the men's and women's basketball teams at K-State are learning, winning on the road is no simple task.

After a three-game home stand, of which the Wildcats won the last two, the women's team will have to be road warriors to pull its conference mark over .500 for the first time this year.

The Cats (9-7 overall, 3-3 Big 12) have to play four of their next five games on the road, starting tonight in Ames, Iowa, against Iowa State (16-3, 5-1).

"It's so hard to win on the road," K-State coach Deb Patterson said. "Invariably, if you're in a game on the road, it's going to be close."

The upstart Cyclones, who despite reaching the NCAA Tournament a year ago were picked sixth in the Big 12 preseason coaches' poll, are taking many by surprise with their quick start.

Last Tuesday, now-No. 24 Iowa State beat then-No. 5 Texas Tech by an 82-73 count in Ames to vault into the Associated Press Top 25 and improve its record to 5-0 in the Big 12.

The Cyclones suffered a letdown Saturday against Missouri, which had only one previous Big 12 win — against K-State — in six games. But the Tigers shocked the Cyclones by winning an overtime contest, 59-57, avoiding a season sweep after an earlier 58-55 loss in Ames.

The loss to the Tigers ended a nine-game Cyclone winning streak that had dated back to Dec. 21. The Cyclones still carry a perfect 10-0 home record into tonight's battle with the Cats, and K-State has won only one road game this season.

The odds seem stacked against the Cats, but K-State has overcome many difficulties this season. The Cats had lost five of six games before beating defending conference champion Colorado on Jan. 21 and Baylor on Saturday night, a game that went down to the wire.

Patterson said the wins against the Buffs and Lady Bears should help prepare the Cats for the road.

"Our players should have gained some experience with respect to the mental intensity and composure it takes down the stretch to get a win," she said. "Now I want to see us do that in someone else's gym."

K-State is also playing shorthanded. After losing guard Dee DeShay after knee surgery and forward Ewa Laskowska, who returned home to Independence, Kan., because she was homesick, the Cats only have nine available players.

Now freshman point guard Kim Woodlee is injured, but playing. She had already been playing with a dislocated right pinky finger, and in the Colorado game she aggravated a knee injury she suffered in high school.

Despite sporting a brace on her right knee, she played her fifth 40-minute game of the year Saturday night. Because of the lack of depth, and DeShay's injury, Woodlee has to play more than the coaches would like.

"If we were deeper, I would love to be able to give Kim five to eight to 10 minutes a game, just to not have so much pressure on her shoulders," Patterson said. "We don't have that luxury."

▶ MEN TAKE ON NEBRASKA IN BRAMLAGE COLISEUM, LOOK TO BRING RECORD TO 10-0 AT HOME THIS YEAR.

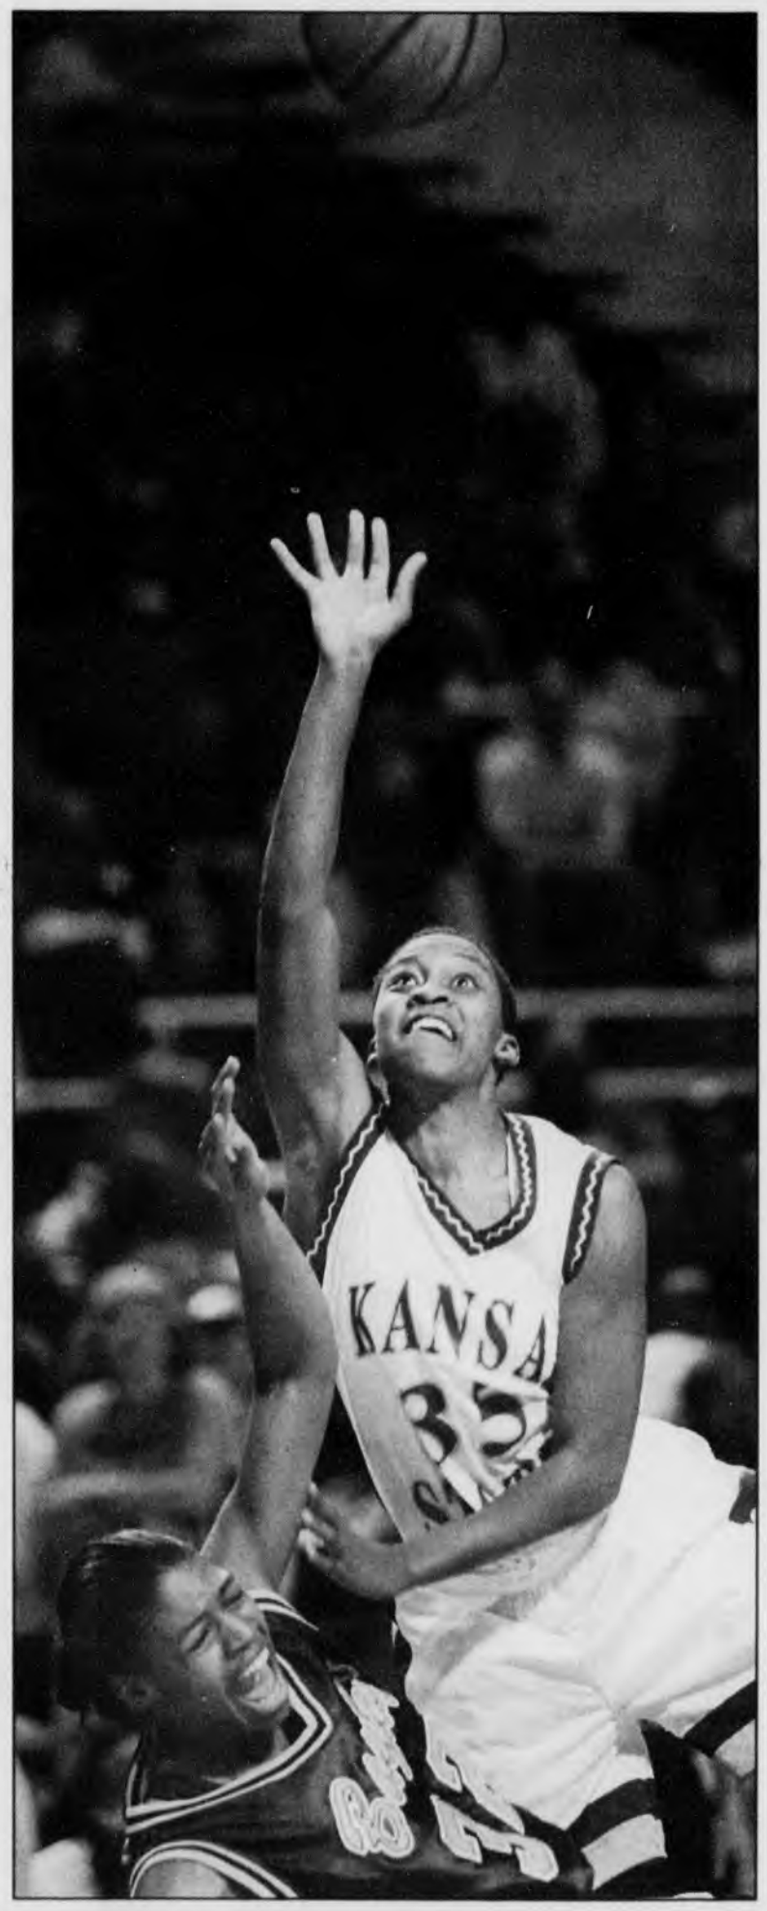
JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Wildcats have seen a lot of star players lately.

Tonight, the Cats (12-5, 3-4) will face Nebraska (13-6, 4-2) at 7 in Bramlage Coliseum and take on another star player in Husker point guard Tyronn Lue.

Lue has been the throttle of the Nebraska offense thus far, averaging nearly 22 points per game.

"Tyronn Lue is just in another long line of great players in this conference and we have to do a good job on him defensively," K-State head coach Tom Asbury said.



Much of that defensive assignment will fall on the shoulders of K-State point-guard Duane Davis, who said he would be prepared for his assignment.

"I don't think I'll shut him down," Davis said. "But I can't let him have a terrific game and beat us by himself."

But Asbury said Lue has the ability to do just that — to run away from a defender and wear him down. To alleviate that, Asbury said he would have a number of players defend Lue.

"Well have to send a committee at

Weed-smoking NBA players have no discipline policy to fear

VIEWPOINT

BYRON VOGEL

Byron is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Byron at byronv@ksu.edu.

"Smoke all the pot you want to, because it won't be detected until you are picked up by the cops."

"Weed is something guys grow up doing, and there's no reason for them to stop."

No, these aren't lyrics from the next DJ Quick album. They're the words of reigning NBA most valuable player Karl Malone and banned-in-the-NBA drug offender Richard Dumas, respectively.

While Malone and Dumas are polar opposites in the image department, both fully understand one thing — the NBA's drug policy is a joke.

Last Tuesday's arrest of Washington forward Chris Webber for drug possession, assault and driving under the influence is only the most recent in a sordid series of incidents involving NBA players and marijuana. In addition to Webber, stars such as Allen Iverson, Isaiah Rider, Mookie Blaylock and Marcus Camby have all faced marijuana charges in the past year.

These highly publicized occurrences represent only a minuscule segment of league-wide delinquency. In fact, a recent New York Times report found that 60 to 70 percent of NBA players — one sports agent put the number even higher — aren't just lighting up just the scoreboards nowadays.

Seventy percent.

Problem is, the league's collective bargaining agreement mandates only rookies undergo drug testing. It doesn't even prohibit marijuana use. What's more, it forbids the testing of veterans for heroin and cocaine without definitive proof or eyewitness testimony. Even then, the case goes to an arbitrator who decides whether to order a test.

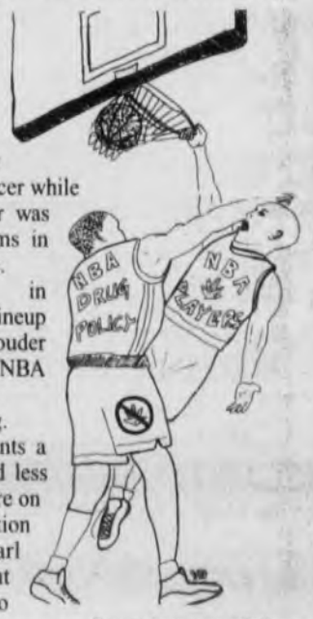
Although NBA Commissioner David Stern says the percentage of pot smokers falls closer to 30, he knows he needs to snuff out the problem before it billows beyond control. Stern will no doubt give marijuana use top billing when the NBA reopens the collective bargaining agreement this summer.

Don't expect it to be easy, though. Stern faces stiff opposition from the NBA Players Union and NBA Players Association Executive Director Bill Hunter. In addition to crediting Hunter with erecting a stone wall around the marijuana issue, Stern has accused the NBAPA of demanding financial compensation before it institutes penalties for marijuana use.

The NBAPA has good reason to oppose such penalties. The more the league sharpens its code of conduct, the more players will snag their baggy shorts on it.

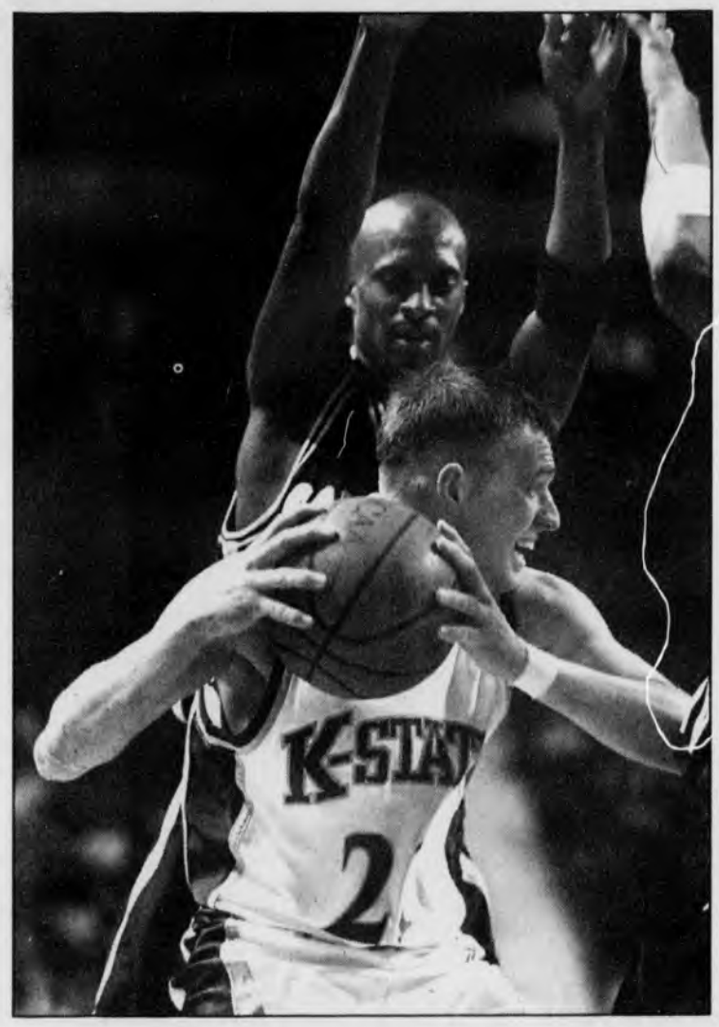
Dumas said if the NBA tested for pot, there would be no NBA, which is probably why Greg Ostertag will make the All-Star team before serious anti-marijuana policies ever come to fruition.

For a league obsessed with maintaining a squeaky-clean image, Michael Jordan's silence is deafening. If he truly is the most powerful man in sports, Jordan has the opportunity — not to mention the responsibility — to leave the NBA in better condition than when he entered it.



Along with heirs apparent Grant Hill and Anfernee Hardaway, the NBA brass could persuade Hunter and the Players Union to adopt legitimate regulations on marijuana use. It's one last chance for basketball's old school to leave a meaningful impression on the new breed of superstars.

Instead, a vast majority of players idly stand by. Meanwhile, only one day after he was arrested for allegedly assaulting a police officer while high on dope, Webber was greeted with open arms in the Wizards' clubhouse.



His presence in Washington's starting lineup every night speaks louder than any penalty the NBA has the guts to impose.

America is listening.

Hunter says he wants a marijuana policy based less on punishment and more on education. If it's education Hunter wants, Karl Malone knows about 250 colleagues who could teach the class.

him," Asbury said. "It won't be just Duane, but that's where Adam (Lopez) can help us. Chris Griffin has to help. Those guys have to help because he'll wear one guy out. He will absolutely wear one guy out."

Last season in Lincoln, Lue burned K-State for 29 points in an overtime thriller the Huskers won by 10 points. But here in Manhattan, the Cats held Lue to just 15 points and won the contest. In both games, Lue never left the court.

"He's not going to leave the floor on Wednesday night if I can help it," Nebraska coach Danny Nee said. "That's probably the best coaching I can do."

Nee said he was impressed with what he thought was one of the most improved teams in the league — a team that hasn't lost a game at home thus far in the season.

"I think they have improved dramatically in their scoring and their accuracy in their scoring," he said. "They're hard-nosed, tough and they play good defense."

Besides Lue, the Huskers also boast two starters averaging at least 10 points per game. Forward Venson Hamilton is averaging nearly 13 a game and guard Cookie Belcher is chipping in 10 points per contest.

Asbury said Nebraska had the talent to contend for the conference championship.

"They've done one thing that makes them a contender," he said. "If no other reason, they've won a road game."

Those wins were against then-unbeaten Oklahoma State and last week at Iowa State.

Sprewell's hearing on Carlesimo attack begins

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORTLAND, Ore. — Behind a curtain of secrecy, an arbitrator began hearing testimony Tuesday on whether the NBA and the Golden State Warriors excessively punished Latrell Sprewell for choking and threatening to kill coach P.J. Carlesimo.

"I'm happy to be here," Sprewell said as he arrived at the downtown office building for the start of the hearing. "Hopefully, this will get over with."

Arbitrator John Feerick, dean of the Fordham Law School, has issued a gag order, barring those involved from revealing testimony.

Sprewell was thrown out of the league for a year, the longest non-drug suspension in NBA history, and the remaining three years of his contract with Golden State, valued at $25 million, were terminated.

Billy Hunter, the head of the NBA players' union, expressed optimism that the punishment will be reduced.

"There will be some modification, I'm convinced," he said before going into the hearing. " ... The best outcome would be Sprewell's return, and let us sort of end things where they are."

Hunter said the case is extremely important for players' contractual rights.

"If this becomes a precedent, it means that basically no one has a guaranteed contract," he said. "Everybody becomes vulnerable."

Hunter said the best outcome from the union's perspective would be to have Sprewell reinstated immediately with "maybe a $3 million to $4 million setback."

The hearing takes the form of a trial, with Sprewell and the union serving as plaintiffs and the Warriors and NBA as defendants. After opening statements, each side calls witnesses, who will be subject to cross-examination.

The hearing is closed, and the NBA placed security guards outside the office as well as on other floors.

At the Rose Garden arena, across the Willamette River from the hearing site, Carlesimo took Warriors players through a morning shootaround in preparation for Tuesday night's game against Portland.

He and some Warrior players are expected to testify on today. Carlesimo refused to comment on the hearing, saying he was concentrating on trying to end his team's 14-game losing streak.

"We're not talking about the arbitration," he said. "If you want to talk about the game, fine."

Many of those who testify will relive the Golden State practice of Dec. 1, when Sprewell choked Carlesimo and threatened to kill him.

Some witnesses said Sprewell left the gym after the attack, but returned 20 minutes later and assaulted the coach again.

They also might address the personalities of both Sprewell, a sometimes sullen player, and Carlesimo, an intense coach with a reputation as a screamer.

"We'll just tell the truth," said the Warriors' Muggsy Bogues, who didn't know if he would be called to testify. "We'll just have to wait and see what questions they ask and who gets called upon and basically go and tell the truth.

"I'm quite sure everybody was looking forward to this day and wants to get it behind them."

The Portland sessions are expected to run through Friday, with the hearing reopening next Tuesday and Wednesday in New York, where NBA commissioner David Stern likely will testify.

Feerick's decision is binding under the league's collective bargaining agreement with the union.

Each side has 10 days to file briefs after the hearing. Feerick has 30 days to rule after either the last day of the hearing or after any later hearing resulting from the briefs.

That would mean Sprewell would know his fate by March 16, at the latest.

The NBA was represented by NBA chief counsel Jeffrey Mishkin, league attorney Rick Buchanan and Shep Goldfein, retained as an outside counsel. The Warriors' attorney is Bob Schiebelhut. The league said it will not comment on the hearing until a ruling is made.

Sprewell was quoted in Tuesday's New York Post as saying, "I wasn't trying to kill P.J."

Last week he also told the newspaper: "Death threats! That's not the person I am. I was angry, but I didn't mean what I said. You know how people say things they don't mean when they're angry.

"This has taught me a lot about my aggressiveness. I've learned I've got to get control of it. I'm working on that."

The Bookplate Cafe will open Thursday in the 24-hour study area of Hale Library.

The cafe, operated by K-State Student Union Food Services, will feature items such as pastries and baked goods, soups, salads, sandwiches, cappuccino, flavored coffees, fresh fruit and bottled water.

Paul Stolle, director of Union Food Services, said the cafe will have lunch specials available during the afternoon and evening.

"The first special will be a salad or sandwich, dessert and a 16-ounce drink, coffee or tea for $4.95," Stolle said.

Stolle said patrons will be able to see the cafe's menu and upcoming specials on the Union World Wide Web site.

Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager for the Union, said some of the food items will be named with a library theme.

"We expect to have the Hale Club Sandwich," Snyder said.

Carrie Harper, senior in agribusiness, said she thought the cafe would be useful to everyone.

"I think it is a good idea because I think that a lot of people are in the library, and the Union is usually pretty packed," she said.

Jorge Coley, junior in secondary education, said the cafe's location would be more convenient for him.

"I'm in the library pretty much every day and like having a place that is a little bit closer," he said.

University president apologizes, agrees to probation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — After nearly being fired for referring to his new boss as an Oreo, the president of the University of Florida got to keep his job Tuesday by apologizing and agreeing to six months of probation.

During his probation, John Lombardi, who has been president of Florida's 42,000-student flagship university since 1990, will be closely watched by three members of the Florida Board of Regents.

The board had come under intense pressure from alumni and legislators who supported the popular educator, and the agreement that let him keep his job was worked out with help from the man he had insulted.

During a Christmas party at Lombardi's house in Gainesville, he described incoming university system Chancellor Adam Herbert, who is black, as an Oreo. Lombardi, who is white, said Herbert was effective in dealing with whites because he was black on the outside and white on the inside.

Lombardi apologized Tuesday at a public regents meeting that was attended by lawmakers and prominent alumni.

"I have not lived up to the standards that the board expects of its presidents," the 55-year-old Lombardi said. "For that failing, I apologize to all of you."

Afterward, he told reporters, "It's a learning experience when you make a mistake."

Regents Chairman Steve Uhlfelder had moved to fire Lombardi earlier this month, and went so far as to send Lombardi a Jan. 14 letter discussing his resignation and details of what he would be paid after stepping down to a faculty position.

Lombardi never saw the letter but was made aware of its contents, university spokeswoman Linda Gray said.

However, Herbert, who was officially installed as chancellor on Jan. 19, recommended that Lombardi keep the job. And after Uhlfelder's move, legislators and powerful alumni came to Lombardi's defense.

Lombardi has built up strong ties with students, even taking time to teach a course on Latin American history, and has built up rapport with lawmakers.

"If Lombardi is demoted or has to step down from the presidential position, I will no longer be interested in donating to the University of Florida," said a fax to one board member last week from Joy Culverhouse. The widow of former Tampa Bay Buccaneers owner Hugh Culverhouse gave the university $2.05 million last year.

Uhlfelder said the pressure from some Lombardi backers went even further.

"When they started calling my law firm clients telling them to leave ... I said to myself, 'Why?' The stakes aren't high enough for me to hurt my law firm," he said.

But Uhlfelder was satisfied with the outcome. "He was contrite. He was different," Uhlfelder said of Lombardi. "He's changed."

It was just the latest run-in with the Regents for Lombardi.

In 1995, he caused a stir when he bypassed the chancellor and went straight to state lawmakers with his ideas. The following year, he irritated the regents by calling a policy they had approved to restrict university expansion stupid and "typical of this idiotic system."

School video shows strengths, concerns

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A decaying city neighborhood is the focus of a 30-minute documentary — put together by some filmmakers who are especially close to their subject.

The video, "What My Eyes See," was put together by students at Quindaro Elementary School. It examines the school's strengths and the neighborhood's problems — abandoned and burned-out houses, boarded-up businesses, guns, gangs and drug dealers.

Two nonprofit organizations, Storytellers Inc. and YouthFriends, and TV station KSMO helped the youngsters create the video, providing technical help and equipment.

The video takes the viewer through a typical day at the school and out into the neighborhood, with adults interviewed throughout. All of Quindaro's students helped define the questions posed to teachers and residents.

They start with the big one: "What is the meaning of life?"

"Making the most of every day," one teacher said.

"Glorifying God," another said. "Being the best person you can be."

"Being kind to someone every day," a third offered.

The cameras were then trained on the neighborhood outside the school. What they recorded was not pretty.

"These buildings look like a war zone. People hanging out. I wish I were in charge," a young voice commented as tape of Quindaro Boulevard is rolled.

"I've seen the community deteriorate a great deal over my 26 years in Quindaro," a Baptist minister told the interviewers, explaining why his church has built a community center and offers help with job skills.

A bank building with a large closed sign comes into focus.

"How can they (businesses) do business without a bank?" another young voice asked.

At a small, family-run market that has been a neighborhood fixture for 50 years, the proprietor told students, "Crime has gone up. It's a little rough here."

The scene shifts to a group of Quindaro graduates. Most are young and still live in the neighborhood.

"Life is a gift. Respect others. Give to those in need," one advised.

Another repeats an oft-mentioned need: "We need to get rid of the gangs and drug dealers."

One person said that Muslims, who have opened several businesses in the area, are making a positive contribution.

Finally, a 1925 graduate of Quindaro Elementary School — one of the few white people in the video — points out that the school sits on what used to be the unofficial dividing line between the black and white communities.

He remembers hitching rides on horse-drawn wagons. He remembers that neighbors knew and looked out for one another. Back then, he said, it was a stronger, vibrant community.

Whether the video has any effect on the outside community, "it brought out hidden talents in several kids (and) in the whole (school) population," Quindaro principal Linnie McCluney said.

"I was surprised how articulate these kids are when on tape."

Fasteners, bolts not linked to crash, Boeing says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Airline records indicate that all the fasteners on the horizontal stabilizer of the SilkAir 737 that crashed on the island of Sumatra in December were in place nine days before the accident, Boeing Co. said Tuesday.

An examination of the wreckage also found that a bolt thought to be missing from a hinge on the stabilizer had been installed, the company said in a letter to airline customers.

Harry Arnold, executive vice president for airplane definition and design at Boeing Commercial Airplane Group, and Nancy Bethel, executive vice president for customers, say in the letter that they want to counter "erroneous reports" in the media of possible problems in Boeing 737 horizontal stabilizers, the small wing at the rear of an aircraft that balances and helps steer the plane.

"At this time there are no indications that missing fasteners or bolts caused or contributed to the tragic crash of a 737 near Palembang, Indonesia, last Dec. 19," their letter reads.

All 104 people aboard the Singaporean jetliner were killed when the plane plunged into a jungle river while on a flight from Jakarta to Singapore. The cause of the crash has not been determined.

The Federal Aviation Administration sought inspections of 211 late-model 737s after a preliminary investigation revealed the plane lacked 26 fasteners on the stabilizer's leading edge, and might have been missing a bolt in a hinge on the stabilizer's elevator.

The elevator is a flap on the trailing edge of the stabilizer that helps control the aircraft.

The FAA reported earlier this month that missing or loose fasteners were found on eight aircraft, but none of the problems were considered serious.

Boeing normally says little about accident investigations that are under way, but Boeing Commercial Airplane Group President Ron Woodard volunteered during a teleconference with reporters Tuesday that the letter had been sent out to reassure customers. Boeing subsequently released a copy of the letter.

"You should recognize it is quite unusual for Boeing to comment about an ongoing airplane accident investigation," Arnold and Bethel write, "but in this case we believe that the media attention — and subsequent misperception — about the 737 horizontal stabilizer issues are unusual as well."

They wrote that the airplane was inspected nine days, or 67 flight hours, before the crash. "At that time, it was noted — and documented — that all of the fasteners were in place."

A check of all 737s in production or on the field at the assembly plant in Renton and Boeing's flight center in Seattle found no missing or loose fasteners or bolts, they said.

The FAA airworthiness directive for the inspections was mandatory for 68 737s flown by U.S. airlines and voluntary for 143 planes operated by foreign carriers. Boeing said 192 planes in all were checked.

The FAA also has completed an audit of Boeing's manufacture and installation of 737 stabilizers, but results have not yet been made public.

Music Review

review by Phil Kellum

Local ska band releases album with soulful sound

If you're looking for a fun, upbeat, energetic ska album, look no further.

The Gadjits, from Leawood, Kan., have just released a second album on Hellcat Records, a division of punk super-label Epitaph.

Hellcat is presided over by Tim Armstrong of Rancid, who signed the Gadjits to his label.

Gadjits drummer Adam Phillips said the band got hooked up with Hellcat after playing shows with Rancid at Liberty Hall in Lawrence and also in Omaha, Neb.

"They asked us to do a record on Tim's new label, Hellcat," he said.

Armstrong also produced the album, and the result sounds brilliant.

Bassist and vocalist Zach Phillips said, "We were really caught by surprise. We thought we were ready for it. It just sort of grabbed us by the balls and swung us into the saddle."

Many people might be shocked by the switch from often snotty, ska-punk to more soulful ska and rocksteady.

"When we recorded the album, that was really a transitional period for the Gadjits. That was the switch-over. We had all these new songs, and we had this new addition to the band, the keyboards. When we recorded, that was the climax. The new sound, if you will," Zach Phillips said.

"It's a big difference from our last album, thankfully," Adam Phillips said.

The Gadjits kick the album off in fine style with "Bullet in the Mattress." It's an energetic, mid-paced song sure to get you out of your seat and onto the dance floor. It also showcases the musicianship of the band quite well with the killer drum fills from Adam Phillips and a great keyboard solo from Heidi Blobaum.

The chorus is especially infectious and will stick in your head all day.

"Sh-Bop" features a heavy keyboard sound and smooth vocals from guitarist/lead vocalist Brandon Phillips.

Zach Phillips' bass lines are mixed up front on "Seat 6," which is nice because they're incredible and all over the place. The bass riffs carry the rocksteady and reggae rhythm perfectly. I especially like the huge-sounding choruses.

The song getting a lot of airplay now is "Traffic Tickets," a fast, infectious tune about getting pulled over by the police. It's a fun tune with an awesome bass solo in the bridge.

The song that blew me away was "The Corpse I Fell in Love With." An earlier version of the song appeared on the band's first record, "Da Gravy On Yo' Grits."

This version is rearranged and re-recorded and also instrumental. It sounds far better than the original version. It's fuller and more soulful. Brandon's solos are great and not flashy at all. It ends suddenly for some reason.

"Trusted" is a song perfect for dancing with your significant other. It's a more subdued and slower tempo song with Zach Phillips handling the lead vocals.

My favorite song on "At Ease" is "Party Girl." It's a mean-sounding song about that weird girl who shows up at every party, but it sounds fun.

"Backup" is a tongue-in-cheek tune about getting in fights. I like the breakdowns and the dual vocal interchange between Brandon Phillips and Zach Phillips.

If you like traditional ska and rocksteady, you must check out the cover of "Skinhead Girl," originally done by Simaryp. It's wonderful, with the bass and keyboard especially prominent. Blobaum's solo is perfect for the song.

I'm also a big fan of "Need Yo' Luv," a soulful ska tune with dual vocals and great solos from Brandon Phillips and Blobaum. Brandon Phillips' solo is mixed too far back in the mix, so you have to struggle to hear it. It's a great sappy love song.

The Gadjits also tackle a soul classic in Wilson Pickett's "Mustang Sally." This has no ska at all in it. It's soul, soul, soul. This is a brilliant cover. I love it.

The album is closed with "Beautiful Girl," which originally appeared on Hellcat's "Give 'Em the Boot" compilation compact disc. It's a catchy, keyboard-driven number that will definitely get you moving.

This band is on its way to stardom, with this album out in stores now. The boys and girl are going on tour with ska kings Hepcat and the Slackers for a month and a half starting Feb. 4 in Sacramento, Calif.

Definitely check out "At Ease" and support your local scene. It's one of the best ska albums you'll hear this year. Guaranteed.

Freshman Seminar opens eyes to K-State fine arts

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

With so much time to divide among classes, schoolwork, a job and a social life, students sometimes might have difficulty finding the time to attend events on campus.

But what if failure to attend these events meant failure in a class?

Such is the case with the Freshman Seminar. Offered in the fall by the College of Arts and Sciences, the course exposes freshmen to a different cultural or intellectual event each week and gives them two fine arts credits in the humanities.

"I like the idea that students became involved and aware of activities other than just going to classes," Vera Orlock, assistant professor of dance, said. Orlock was one of several instructors who taught Freshman Seminar last semester.

After each event, students discuss the event in class and write a short paper about it. In addition, each instructor augments the curriculum with various in-class speakers or videos that usually pertain to the event the class saw or will see. This helps students better understand the events, Orlock said.

"It helps the students to appreciate the diversity on campus and maybe helps them to discover things that may enrich their lives," Orlock said. "People might enroll in classes they might not have chosen as electives, support events like the lecture series, become more well-rounded individuals, and become interested in the world around them."

According to the syllabus, events the students attended last semester focused on arts and cultural events such as plays, musicals and concerts. Other events included lectures, a comedy sketch troupe, a dance performance and a trip to the Konza Prairie. Tickets, all but one of which were included in a discount packet for $54, were separate from the regular tuition.

> "IT HELPS THE STUDENTS TO APPRECIATE THE DIVERSITY ON CAMPUS."
> VERA ORLOCK
> assistant professor of dance

"I think there was a pretty broad spectrum of events," said Matthew Farris, freshman in architecture, who took the course last semester. "I enjoyed all of them. There was some that were a lot different than anything I had seen before."

Alfred Cochran, associate professor of music, helped develop the course, which began in 1988. He said its purpose is not merely to introduce students to new experiences, but to get them to think critically.

"All of the events that are part of the Freshman Seminar are designed not to be just simply discrete things unto themselves, but rather, to act as a springboard to initiate discussion amongst the students," Cochran said. "They may have held views very strongly for no good reason, and then when those are challenged then they can see maybe a different way to look at it."

Judith Zivanovic, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said instructors benefit from the course, too.

"I think the instructors really like very much having a course where they have that kind of interaction with students," she said. "It's a different kind of experience because you're interacting with the students not only in class, but outside of class."

Zivanovic said some students usually drop the class, either because they don't have the time to attend every event, or because they don't want to do the written work.

Farris was one of the few in his class who stayed. However, 13 of the 15 students in his class had dropped by the second week, and Farris had to transfer to another section.

Zivanovic said a study and student feedback have shown that students who take the Freshman Seminar are more likely to attend campus events.

"These students do tend to participate more in these activities," she said.

Farris said he thinks the class has made him more likely to attend events on campus.

"Since the class, I haven't gone to anything, but I think I probably will," he said. "I know that I probably wouldn't have gone to any other events if I hadn't taken the class."

Ultimate Fakebook

Local band to compete in Mentos' online tour

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

Ultimate Fakebook, a Manhattan band, is in the running to compete in the Freshmaker Tour. What is the Freshmaker Tour, you might ask?

It is a contest sponsored by breath mint company Mentos that consists of six concerts broadcast on the company's World Wide Web site. Each concert will feature four bands playing 30 minutes each. The four bands chosen for each concert are picked from eight original bands.

Ultimate Fakebook, if selected, will play on March 28 at the Ogden Theatre in Denver. Voting runs from Jan. 24 to Feb. 20.

The band is also featured on the first in a series of three compilation compact discs sponsored by Mentos. The bands on the CD series are all 48 bands in the contest. All 48 bands are unsigned or on small, independent record labels.

The Ultimate Fakebook song "Far, Far Away" is track three on the CD.

The CD will be sold in 258,000 retail stores, including all Wal-Marts, Tower Records, Sam Goody, Camelot and 11,000 independent record stores.

"That's going to be awesome. Not only is it going to be for sale in a lot of stores across the nation, but they're going to be sending like a thousand to indie labels, major labels, everything, so it's going all over the industry, so that's cool," vocalist and guitarist Bill McShane said.

Advertising about the contest is being placed in magazines such as Rolling Stone.

McShane said the band got involved in the competition through Ozark Talent, a booking agency in Lawrence.

Ultimate Fakebook is competing against Baby Jason and the Spankers, Chief Broom, Global Village, the Impossibles, Nastyboy Klick, and Zuba.

"All the bands we're up against are all from other places in the nation. We're going up against a lot of psychedelic, hippie kind of rock. There's like one ska band (the Impossibles), and everybody else is not even close to our genre," McShane said.

Being the only rock band involved in the Denver portion of the competition, McShane said he thought the band's chances depend on the kind of person who surfs the site.

"If they're a rock fan and they listen to the other bands, then they're likely to pick us. Since there's all these bands that are all in that hippie genre, if they like one hippie band, then they're going to like the other hippie band," he said.

McShane said the band members are just asking people to vote for them.

"We're begging everybody, basically. We don't have any special strategy to get people," he said.

The band put fliers at its recent shows and notices on both of its Web sites to get the word out.

"It only takes a few seconds, so we're trying to entice people if they're bored and on the Web, just go there and vote for us," McShane said. "It would really help us big time, because it's a national

Speech team rolls to 4th win in 3 weeks

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State speech team is on a roll.

The team has won four tournaments in three weeks, winning at the 1998 Cornhusker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., on Jan. 10, the Moorhead State/Concordia College Swing Tournament in Moorhead and Fargo, S.D., on Jan. 17 and 18, and the Concordia College Invitational in Seward, Neb., on Saturday.

"This is great. Coming in off break and winning four tournaments in a row was nothing that I thought we would do. I expect us to do well but this is just a real surprise," Wesley Schawe, junior in mathematics, said.

Last year at the American Forensics Association National Individual Events tournament, the team finished third in the team sweepstakes and team members said they hope to do as well this year, if not better.

Craig Brown, intercollegiate speech instructor, said this is one of two national tournaments, but it has the tougher requirements to qualify. To qualify, competitors must break into final rounds three times and average at least third place in those breaks.

Patrick Broxterman, senior in speech communication and life science, said he thought the team had a good chance of being top 10 in the nation again this year.

"We have a good team and have done well against some good teams, so I feel that it is very realistic that we have a shot of finishing as one of the top 10 teams in the country," he said.

While many people might have seen the "National Debate Champions" sign on Interstate-70, one should not get them mistaken with the speech team.

"We don't have anything to do with that sign. We are totally different teams. I think they are having a successful year, which is good for them, but we are different. Hopefully we will have a sign of our own sometime in the near future," Christina Foust, senior in speech communication, said.

While the team hasn't finished first, it has finished in the top 20 every year since 1991. Brown said he credits the team's success with the amount of support the team gets from the university.

"President Wefald, along with the rest of the university, gives us a lot of support, and you don't find that on all campuses across the nation," he said.

Brown also said it helps that K-State has had the same coaching philosophy

Architecture presentation to offer career options in design, marketing

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

The College of Architecture, Planning and Design will be host to the president of an important U.S. industrial design firm.

Indle King, president of Walter Dorwin Teague Associates Inc., is coming to campus as part of the college's mock interview session. He will be presenting "Industrial Design as Part of Today's Development Product" at 2 p.m. Thursday in the Little Theatre.

Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said King's presentation will focus on how product packaging affects marketing.

"He will talk about how you package the interior of an aircraft and make it more comfortable, and how you can package a product so it attracts your eye in the grocery store," Schuley said.

Walter Dorwin Teague Associates Inc., is the largest industrial design firm in America.

"This firm is credited with being the creator of industrial design," said Allan Hastings, professor of interior design. "Their designs include the Polaroid camera and the Ivory liquid bottle."

Boeing is one of the firm's largest clients, and it recently designed the interior of Boeing's 777 jumbo jet.

"They had to develop everything from the seating to the environment and the graphic design of the aircraft," Hastings said.

Misty Hinkle, fifth-year senior in interior architecture and member of the mock interview planning committee, said the firms are excited about the opportunity to talk to students.

"They brought it up when we called them. They come from a long way, and while they're here they want to talk to as many students as they can," Hinkle said.

Hinkle said students from across campus are invited to attend the presentations.

"These speeches will make people become more aware of the options they can take," Hinkle said.

Students interested in industrial design, marketing, graphic design and engineering will be introduced to career possibilities through the presentation, Schuley said.

"Students aren't aware of where their major, their degree can take them. This can help show them that."

Nantek receives grants

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

The U.S. Department of Defense could be sending $1.5 million to Manhattan.

Nantek Inc., a Manhattan advanced materials technology company working with the K-State Department of Chemistry, received notice of two awards totaling $1.5 million.

Nantek Chairman of the Board Ron Sampson said his company will attempt to create substances that aid in military protection from chemical warfare.

Research has begun on the first $750,000 project to create materials capable of destroying old military toxic substances. This project will aid in environmental detoxification of substances, Sampson said.

A contract is expected to be signed in April for the second $750,000 award to develop a skin cream capable of protecting soldiers from chemical warfare agents, said Kenneth Klabunde, K-State professor of chemistry and Nantek chief technology officer.

Nantek and K-State researchers' discovery of nanoparticles, very small particles with unique properties such as a high surface area and high absorption rates, led to the grant, Klabunde said.

These small particles can be used to create a fine powder that can be mixed with other substances for practical use, he said.

Nantek was created in 1995 as a spinoff from K-State's chemistry research efforts, said Klabunde, also the co-founder. The company works with K-State to research and create materials for practical use in both governmental and commercial applications, he said.

Nantek is also working on a $100,000 grant from Kansas Technology Enterprise Corp. to use nanoparticles in plastics to protect against high voltages. This will be useful for the electronics industry to protect against electrical hazards, Klabunde said.

Corrie Carnes, graduate student in chemistry and former Nantek employee, said the recognition for K-State is an impressive aspect of the research.

"The people who started Nantek are from K-State and the people working with the company are from K-State. That is what will stand out," he said.

Michael Sloane, sophomore in chemistry, said a significant advantage is potential employment for students who work on the research.

K-State speech team sets goal of repeat top-10 finish at national tournament since the program was started in 1976.

"I was an undergraduate student under Lynn Ross, and she started the program so the philosophy has been relatively the same for a long time," he said.

It's that philosophy that helped Brad Clark, sophomore in speech, and Aundray Collins, senior in theater and speech, perform well at the recent tournament in Seward, Neb.

"At the Concordia tournament in Seward, Brad Clark had the best tournament he has had. Aundray Collins is one of our returning national champions, but she didn't compete during the fall semester and last week was her first time out this year. It was good to see her back because she pretty much just stomped everybody," Brown said.

He said the team as a whole has done well in the past three weeks.

"Nebraska was very nice because we faced some pretty tough competition, but we had a lot of our people break into finals," Brown said.

"You really need to have 13 to 20 breaks to win. Then we come back the next weekend and bring home two more first-place team trophies. On the season, we now have nine different people qualified for nationals in 22 events."

Breaking into finals in several entries is necessary to win the team sweepstakes. But it's likely that just two students breaking in each of their six events could push a team into the running for a team trophy. At Concordia in Seward, the team broke into finals in 19 events, which allowed it to win the first-place trophy.

"This past weekend's tournament at Concordia was a place for the kids to get some of their other events qualified for nationals," Brown said. "We got two more qualified this week with Brad Clark in prose and Wesley Schawe in extemp.

"Hopefully, next week those that go to Central Missouri State University can qualify some more. The month of January has been very good to us, and if February is anything like this, we will be in great shape for nationals in April."

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Every so often this campus exhibits a work of art that is a bit more over the line, that confronts viewers and invades our safe campus space.

Lawrence artist Maria Velasco's "Remember Lot's Wife," an installation in the Willard Gallery, is just such a work.

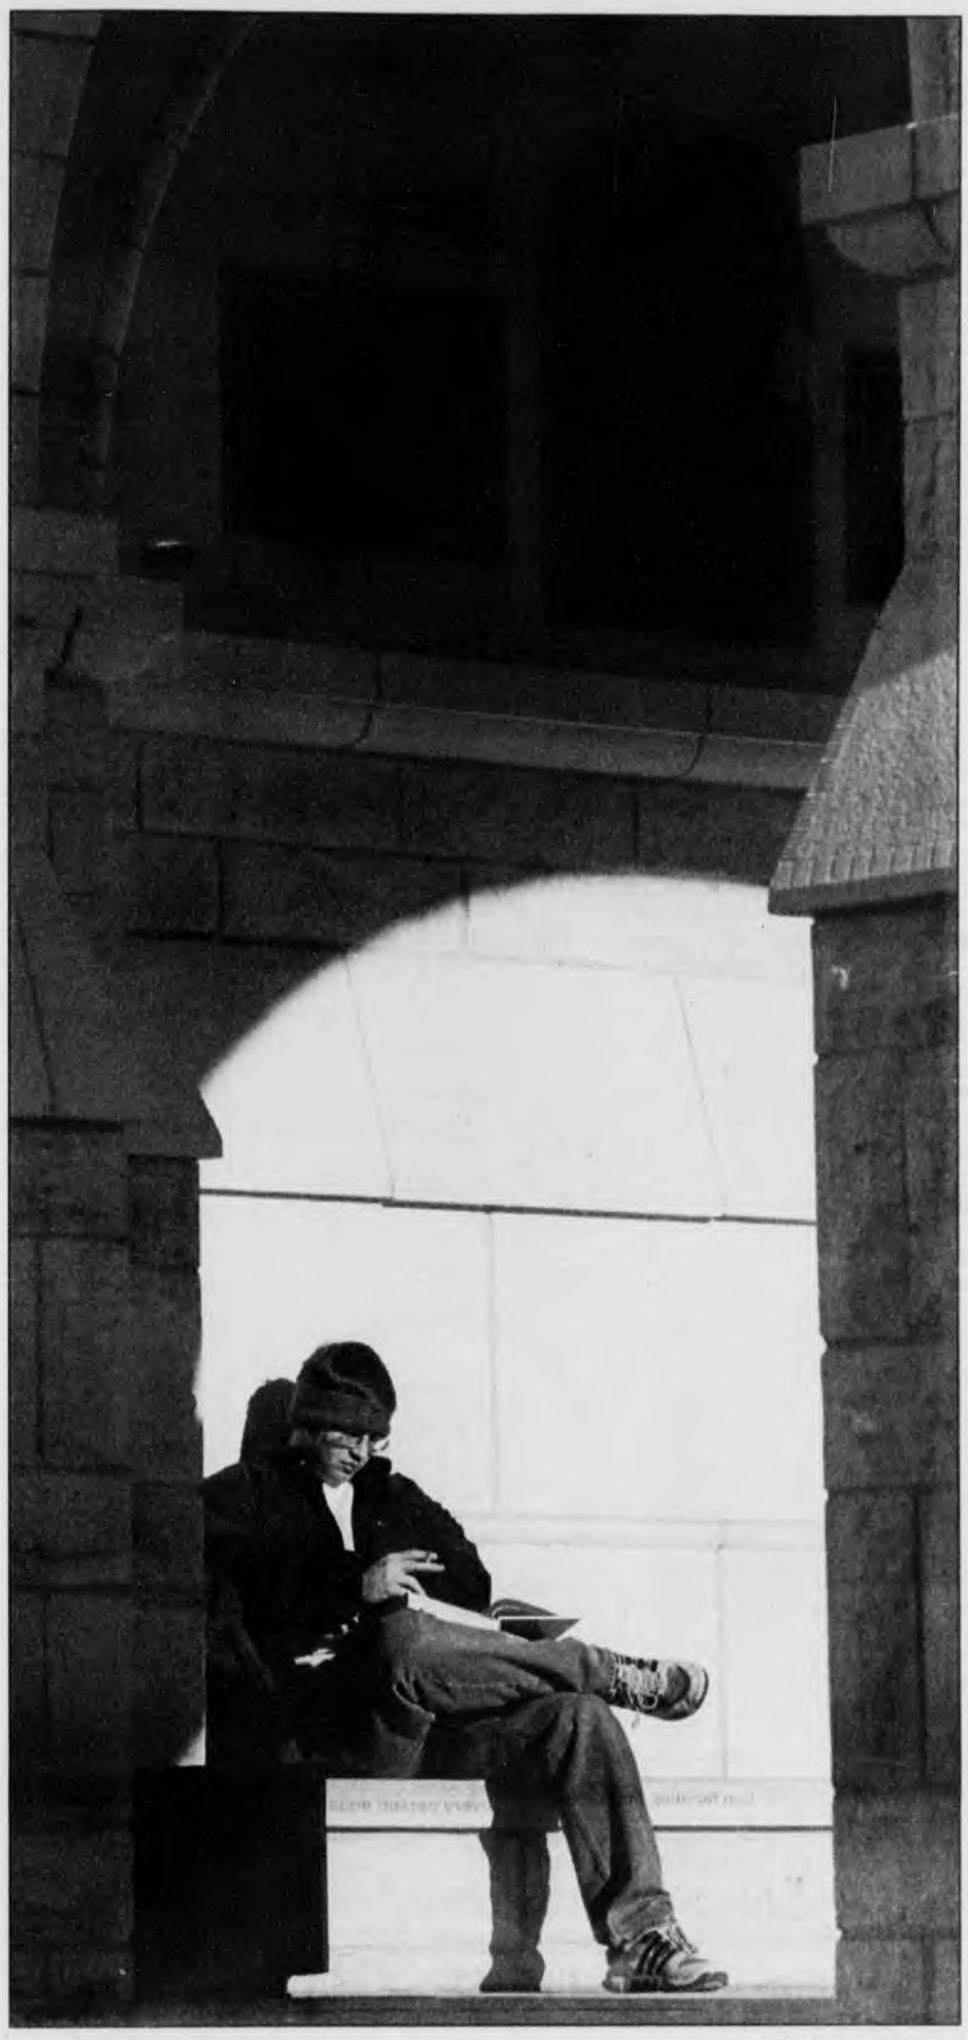
Installation at K-State? On top of that, an installation that features a nude woman with her breasts crammed up against a plate of glass? Would you be more willing to believe this was a site-specific installation at the Salina Arts Center in October? Yes, conservative Salina has managed to commission a work of art that did not involve some fictional character carved from a tree trunk.

"Remember Lot's Wife" is a simple construction of plexiglass panels that frame a giant photo of a discouraged nude woman pressed against glass. The middle panel is peeled open, as a door, and reveals the second side, which of course is a similar photo of the back of this woman. Poured on both sides of the door is a pile of rock salt. A soundtrack of cicadas plays relentlessly in the background.

Accompanying the installation are several wall-hung images that add the phrase: "remember lot's wife/pleasing to the eye/lingering behind/candied in salt/longing after/in tearful emptiness." The visual images add little to the impression of the installation.

This installation, like an oversized bus shelter, is almost too big for the smallish Willard Gallery. It does invade your space, but it also overwhelms it.

At the Salina Arts Center, it was placed in front of the main door, causing all those who entered to immediately confront it and then have to pass to another entrance. Taken out of context in Willard, there is no approach, no jarring interruption, no reason to stop and take notice of one's surroundings.



That's the trouble with site-specific installations — they rarely succeed on the same level when located elsewhere. When you visit Willard, imagine the work installed at the main entrance to the Manhattan Town Center or the K-State Student Union. One doubts if Manhattan, or even Salina, would allow this installation to occur outside of the hidden confines of an art center or gallery where one, on some level, expects something of this sort.

Regardless, Velasco's work will definitely leave an impression. The work has numerous feminist messages. The truth is, this woman could be anyone.

Velasco, a Madrid native, explains some of her intentions in an artist's statement. The salt makes specific reference to the industrial origins of Salina. The cicadas could be discarded lovers or pulsations of love and death. She also sets a mission for the installation to revise the "traditional construction of women's roles in our culture."

Is it successful? Velasco is no Cindy Sherman. Sherman's recent giant photographs of mangled bodies or constructed mannequins make more arguments about Velasco's self-declared issues of "power, dominance, difference and tolerance" with much less fussiness and extraneous information.

It's hard to forget the singular image of a woman trapped in some two-dimensional world of set expectations and stereotypes, but that's lost in an artist's attempt to bring too much meaning to an overcrowded installation.

Judge rules in gay rights, AOL case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Navy went too far in pursuing allegations of homosexuality against a senior sailor and surreptitiously obtaining key evidence against him from a computer online service, a federal judge ruled.

In a victory for gay rights and computer privacy advocates, U.S. District Judge Stanley Sporkin extended the career of a senior Navy enlistee facing expulsion for homosexuality based on evidence the Navy obtained by anonymously calling America Online Inc.

"In these days of 'big brother,' where through technology and otherwise the privacy interests of individuals from all walks of life are being ignored or marginalized, it is imperative that statutes explicitly protecting these rights be strictly observed," Sporkin wrote.

"This court finds that the Navy has gone too far."

Though not the final word in the case, Monday's decision represented a sharp rebuke of the Navy, both for its enforcement of the military policy on homosexuality and for the intrusiveness of its investigation. It promised to reverberate beyond the military to all government agencies that might want to bolster investigations by demanding information from online computer services.

Sporkin issued a temporary restraining order barring the Navy from honorably discharging Senior Chief Petty Officer Timothy R. McVeigh, a move that would have cut short a 17-year career. McVeigh can remain in the Navy pending final outcome of the case, which Sporkin said was likely to go in the sailor's favor.

McVeigh, 36, no relation to the convicted Oklahoma City bomber, is suing the Navy for violating federal law in trying to force an end to his career.

The Navy overstepped the law in pursuing allegations of homosexuality against McVeigh that stemmed from a sexually suggestive online message and by linking him to that message by secretly getting his identity from AOL. Because the message was anonymous, Sporkin wrote, the Navy broke the "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military by trying to identify McVeigh as the author, and the 1986 Electronic Communications Privacy Act by getting information from AOL without a warrant or court order.

"Although McVeigh did not publicly announce his sexual orientation, the Navy nonetheless impermissibly embarked on a search and 'outing' mission," Sporkin wrote.

The Dulles, Va.-based online service company has acknowledged it broke its own confidentiality rules in providing the information. And Sporkin said AOL also broke the law. But he aimed particular criticism at the Navy for failing to identify itself when it sought McVeigh's identity from AOL.

"The government knew, or should have known, that by turning over the information without a warrant, AOL was breaking the law," Sporkin wrote. "Yet the Navy, in this case, directly solicited the information anyway. What is most telling is that the Naval investigator did not identify himself when he made his request."

Sporkin ruled that McVeigh would lose his job, income, pension, health and life insurance, and other benefits if discharged before a final ruling was reached in the case. The Navy said through a spokesman that McVeigh would remain assigned to Submarine Squadron Three in Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. McVeigh himself was returning to Hawaii when the ruling came down and was unavailable for comment.

Attorney Christopher Wolf, who argued for McVeigh in court, called Sporkin's ruling a milestone for online privacy and for defining the gays-in-the-military policy.

"The judge knew a witch hunt when he saw one," Wolf said. "What this case means is that when the government violates electronic privacy laws, it should not be allowed to use the fruits of its violation against law-abiding citizens," he said.

Sporkin recognized that his ruling has the potential to set a new precedent in how the military handles homosexuality cases. Although several challenges have been mounted to the don't-ask, don't-tell policy, the key questions of "what it practically means not to ask, not to tell and not to pursue — have yet to be litigated in the courts," Sporkin wrote.

Lithuanian Fulbright Scholar researches canola while at K-State

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

Lithuania is counting on one man to increase its crop yields by 20-30 percent.

Gvidas Sidlauskas, a Fulbright scholar from the Lithuanian Institute of Agriculture, came to K-State in August to study the effects of temperature on the growth and development of canola. Sidlauskas applied for the Fulbright through the U.S. Embassy in Lithuania.

"It was a competition in my country. I had to go to the embassy and fill out forms and interview," Sidlauskas said.

There was not a lot of information available on other universities, but there are only three full-fledged canola programs.

"Five years ago, a program started in my country and, at the same time, K-State started its project. I found it very interesting and thought it would be a good chance to share ideas," Sidlauskas said.

His studies are important because of the need for an alternative crop in Lithuania. The winters there are too cold to grow soybeans or sunflowers, both alternative crops Kansas farmers grow.

Uses of canola benefit both humans and animals in Lithuania.

"It is used mostly for human purposes. Most have heard of canola oil. It can be used for fuel, drugs, plastic and, if you crush the seeds, it can be used as a protein additive for livestock," Sidlauskas said.

In Europe, studies are focusing on using canola as an alternative fuel. Using canola as fuel in the United States has not yet become economical. Canola is also useful in crop rotation because it helps to improve the quality of the soil and aids in the prevention and elimination of diseases.

"Wheat yields increase by 8 to 12 percent when it follows canola, as opposed to wheat following wheat," said Charlie Rife, research associate with agronomy at K-State, who is working on developing canola breeds that can withstand harsher winters.

Sidlauskas is working with Rife to improve canola breeds. Canola was originally introduced in the 1980s but failed because it would freeze in Kansas' harsh winters.

Sidlauskas works in three different greenhouses. Each is set at a different temperature, and he measures the canola's growth. He will take seeds back to Lithuania and try to grow them to see if he can help his country.

"Lithuania is having the same problem we had in the '80s. With the new breeds of winter canola, they could increase their yield by 20 to 30 percent," Rife said.

When Sidlauskas finishes his eight-month study, he will take home hope for his country, and he will leave a definite impression behind.

"Well, we have been just tickled to have Gvidas here. I have really enjoyed working with him," Rife said.

Program to survey quality of courses

Advisory Committee, a committee of regents universities' student body presidents.

Last fall, a Course Information Program committee was formed to administrate the pilot program. Student and faculty volunteers were solicited to conduct surveys as a small-scale test of the CIP concept. Hansen and others surveyed about 10 percent of the student body during the pilot program.

Hansen said last fall's pilot is wrapping up just as his committee asks for a student fee to fund the project.

"Right now we are at the end stages of putting the information from the surveys together," he said. "We submit our requests to Privilege Fee Committee on February 2."

Privilege Fee Committee Secretary Kimberly Peschka described what committee members would look for from the CIP proposal.

"We want to know how much money they need and where exactly the money is going to go. They need to be as specific as possible," she said. "We really have nothing to compare this idea to, because nothing like this has been developed in the past."

CIP committee members said the program won't be expensive.

"If we do get to publish the course information, it will be at very low cost to the students," Hansen said. "Right now we are estimating about 70 cents per student, per semester."

Academic Affairs Committee Chairman Rhett Trujillo said the proposal should limit the number of students who change courses after the first of the semester.

"Hopefully, we should be able to cut down on the number of students who drop-add at the beginning of the semester," he said.

If students know what a course is about beforehand, they won't have to go through the mess of dropping the course, Trujillo said.

"Some upperclassmen may be reluctant to pay for the course information, knowing that it probably will not benefit them. But they need to realize that prospective students to K-State and underclassmen will benefit," he said.

Marion Gray, professor of history and Faculty Senate representative on the CIP committee, said student leaders have worked hard to make the project a success.

"My job is mainly to support the students," he said. "This is a very energetic committee. Chris, Rhett and many others have put an incredible amount of work into this."

Gray also said he was surprised by how many faculty members supported the program.

Hansen said the committee doesn't just want to publish a book of students' opinions.

Other ideas include putting course information on the Internet and integrating the information with class syllabi, creating potential World Wide Web resources for advisers and students.

For now, though, Hansen said the ideas can't go anywhere without money behind them.

"If the Privilege Fee Committee decides to support the program, we will start our first real survey in fall 1998. The first published survey will be available to students in spring 1999. In the meantime, we can do nothing but wait for an answer," Hansen said.

Local author remains grounded in ideals

Surrounded by family photos, well-loved books and homemade throw pillows, Foveaux's comfortable living room shows almost no signs of her newly acquired wealth.

"I fixed up the house to be stormproof and bought some extras I needed," she said. "My life was great before, and it won't change much."

In fact, Foveaux still refuses to buy a dryer. She said she prefers the feel of clothes dried in fresh air.

Marion Foveaux, the seventh of Jessie's children and a retired crane operator who lives in Manhattan, calls her "Granny." After she fell and broke her hip a few years ago, his role in her daily routine increased.

"We laugh a lot," Marion said. "She can't work in her garden anymore but she spends a lot of time watching it grow, and if she sees a weed, you better believe it gets pulled."

Marion said throughout his life, his mother has never complained.

"She makes her life one day at a time. When a lot of people would groan, she grins and hops in there," Marion said. "It was interesting to see where she's been. There's never been a dull moment, she won't have one."

In addition to Marion, Foveaux's two surviving daughters rotate turns living with their mother in Manhattan. Sadie Rutledge, who lives in Georgia, will stay in Manhattan until after her mother turns 99 on March 18.

"We learn so much every day. She keeps such a good attitude," Rutledge said. "She has a great sense of humor and listening to her brings back a lot of good memories.

Her other daughter, Aleda "Dee Dee" Torgerson, lives in Minnesota.

Although none of Foveaux's children chose to attend K-State, she spent 15 years teaching a tatting class in her home through the university. She said this experience helped her understand the importance of family history.

"The biggest share of the girls did not even know their grandmother's given name," Foveaux said. "I wanted to let them know what they should guard against and to remember what is important."

The national acclaim garnered from this book has translated into countless interviews, a People Magazine article and early in January, a trip to New York City to appear on Rosie O'Donnell's daytime show.

"Rosie was very nice. I talked to her three different times, and the NBC people brought me to her room before the show. We talked about her children," Foveaux said.

"Then, two nice men brought me out to her desk and she asked me some questions. I've never seen so many people gathered together in one place before. There wasn't an empty seat in her audience."

Foveaux said she prefers the peacefulness of her Manhattan home to the Big Apple.

"New York City is too big. It's a lot like being Alice in Wonderland there," she said.

"I hope the Little Apple doesn't try to get so big. Sometimes, I think they're trying."

Her notoriety in the Little Apple has translated into meeting more neighbors. Since the book came out, Foveaux has autographed more than 452 copies of "Any Given Day" at her house.

Whether it's endless phone calls or reading letters from overseas, Foveaux said meeting new people is great.

"They say they feel they know me very well. I've got a basket full of good letters since the book came out. They're from everywhere," Foveaux said. "I have a basket for the bad ones, too, if they ever come."

Library continues search for periodical funding

able to raise no more than $300,000 per year."

On Tuesday, however, Hobrock said the $300,000 assumes that no significant fund-raising drive is under way. He said with a large drive, it would not be unreasonable to expect to raise $500,000 a year.

"I've talked with the president about this and he thinks with a targeted campaign there's no reason to think we can't move to a figure of $8-10 million in four or five years," Hobrock said. "My statement last night was rather misleading."

Last Thursday, the Collegian reported that administrators had not contacted the Foundation about library fund-raising efforts. The Foundation generally doesn't raise money for projects without administration input.

Though Wefald has said repeatedly that the library is a funding priority, he did not issue the priority notice to the Foundation until Monday. The Foundation executive board discussed the issues of library funding at its Tuesday meeting.

On Tuesday, Wefald said the administration has been meeting with the Foundation for the past five to six months discussing short- and long-term funding solutions for the library. He said he thinks a $10 million endowment is possible.

"We've got a beautiful new library," Wefald said. "Now the goal is that we have a critical mass of periodicals."

Wefald said fund raising for the contents of the library could not begin until the facility itself was capable of holding new materials. He said his first priority since coming to K-State in 1986 has been the library.

The administration, through internal reallocations, has funneled several million dollars to the library since 1986, Wefald said. But aside from the drive to raise $5 million in private money for the new building, there has been no significant fund-raising effort for the contents of the library.

While the administration is generally directly involved in private fund-raising drives, it isn't as involved with student privilege fees. Students create and maintain their own system of fees through the powers of the Student Governing Association.

Student Senate's privilege fee committee met Monday night with Hobrock to discuss several of the library's funding options, including a student fee. He will address the committee again at 7 p.m. Monday in the library's Hemisphere Room.

"Undergraduate students believe there's nothing in this for them," Hobrock said. "There's a lot to be said, but it's a more esoteric kind of argument."

Hobrock said the quality of research resources is reflected in the faculty, which further reflects in the quality of the classroom environment.

He said meetings with students are the beginnings of a discussion about how the money raised from a possible student fee would be used to purchase library resources that could be used directly by undergraduates.

"A student fee gives students more control than a tuition increase that could be absorbed by the Legislature," Hobrock said. "A privilege fee can be very strictly targeted."

Secretary of State might run unopposed in re-election bid

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. — Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh appears to have a relatively easy re-election campaign ahead of him.

No one has announced an intention to challenge Thornburgh in the Republican primary. No Democrat has come forward, either.

The secretary of state began this year with more than $87,000 in his campaign fund.

And, as Thornburgh noted during a Statehouse rally Tuesday, his name has not been much in the news during the past four years — usually a good sign for such a relatively low-profile office.

"He's an up-to-date, modern manager," said Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan. "Some of us in the political arena lose sight of the fact that people can recognize quality."

Thornburgh kicked off his campaign Tuesday. He touted what he said were the accomplishments of his administration.

He noted the office's spending of state tax dollars has decreased. During the state's 1997 fiscal year, which ended June 30, it was 11.2 percent lower than it was for the state's 1995 fiscal year.

Thornburgh also pointed to a smaller office staff — 6.7 percent smaller in fiscal 1997 than in fiscal 1995. But the difference is only four positions out of 60.

He also said Kansas was the first state in the nation to allow financial institutions and other businesses to file documents related to loans and liens electronically.

But other political insiders suggest Thornburgh is a strong candidate more because he is the incumbent in an office that does not naturally draw aspiring candidates.

"There's really not that much interest in that position," said Pete McGill, a former state House speaker who now operates the state's largest contract lobbying firm.

Rep. Ed McKechnie, D-Pittsburg, called the secretary of state a "glorified county clerk."

"I don't know why we elect them," McKechnie said.

Democrats do have some complaints. In particular, because they generally support efforts to allow people to register to vote on Election Day, they contend Thornburgh is not interested enough in making registration as easy as it should be.

"It's a relatively minor office," said Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka. "It's early yet."
